[4] Now Sir William Milbourne James, Knight, a Vice Chancellor.
[5] Now the Right Honourable George Ward Hunt.
[6] Now the Right Honourable Hugh C. E. Childers.

By a Royal Warrant under Her Majesty's Sign Manual, dated 22d October 1867, the Right Honourable Sir Robert Joseph Phillimore, Knight, Judge of Her Majesty's High Court of Admiralty, Sir George William Wilshere Bramwell, Knight, one of the Barons of Her Majesty's Court of Exchequer, and William Gandy Bateson, Esquire, were added to the Commission.

By a further Royal Warrant, under Her Majesty's Sign Manual, dated 25th January 1869, Sir Robert Porrett Collier, Knight, Her Majesty's Attorney General, and Sir John Duke Coleridge, Knight, Her Majesty's Solicitor General, were added to the Commission.

Central Criminal Court, Our High Court of Admiralty of England, the Admiralty Court of Our Cinque Ports, Our Courts of Probate and of Divorce for England, the Courts of Common Pleas of Our Counties Palatine of Lancaster and of Durham respectively, and the Courts of Error and of Appeal from all the said several Courts, and into the operation and effect of the present separation and division of jurisdictions between the said several Courts, and also into the operation and effect of the present arrangements for holding the sittings in London and Middlesex, and the holding of sittings and assizes in England and Wales, and of the present division of the legal year into terms and vacations, and generally into the operation and effect of the existing laws and arrangements for distributing and transacting the judicial business of the said Courts respectively, as well in Court as in Chambers, with a view to ascertain whether any and what changes and improvements,—either by uniting and consolidating the said Courts or any of them, or by extending or altering the several jurisdictions, or assigning any matters or causes now within their respective cognizance to any other jurisdiction, or by altering the number of Judges in the said Courts, or any of them, or empowering one or more Judges in any of the said Courts to transact any kind of business now transacted by a greater number, or by altering the mode in which the business of the said Courts or any of them, or of the sittings and assizes, is now distributed or conducted, or otherwise,—may be advantageously made so as to provide for the more speedy, economical, and satisfactory dispatch of the judicial business now transacted by the same Courts, and at the sittings and assizes respectively, and further to make inquiry into the Laws relating to Juries, especially with reference to the qualification, summoning, nominating, and enforcing the attendance of Jurors, with a view to the better, more regular, and more efficient conduct of Trials by Jury, and the attendance of Jurors at such Trials.

And for the better discovery of the truth in the premises We do by these Presents give and grant to you, or any six or more of you, full power and authority to call before you, or any six or more of you, such and so many of the officers and clerks of Our said Courts, and all such other persons as you shall judge necessary, by whom you may be informed of the truth in the premises, and to inquire of the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever.

And We do hereby give and grant unto you, or any six or more of you, full power and authority to cause all or any of the officers and clerks of any of Our said Courts to bring and produce before you, or any six or more of you, all rolls, records, orders, books, papers, or other writings belonging to any of Our said Courts, or to any of the officers within the same.

And Our further will and pleasure is that you do within nine calendar months after the date of this Our Commission, or as soon as the same can conveniently be done, (using all diligence,) certify unto Us in Our Court of Chancery, under the hands and seals of you, or any six or more of you, what you shall have done in the premises.

And We further will and command that this Our Commission shall continue in full force and virtue, and that you Our said Commissioners, or any six or more of you, shall and may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof, and of every matter and thing therein contained, although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment.

And for your assistance in the due execution of this Our Commission We have made choice of Our trusty and well-beloved Thomas Joseph Bradshaw, Esquire, Barrister-at-Law, to be Secretary to this Our Commission, and to attend you, whose services and assistance We require you to use from time to time as occasion shall require.

Given at Our Court at Saint James's the Eighteenth day of September One thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, in the Thirty-first Year of Our Reign.

By Her Majesty's Command.

GATHORNE HARDY.

FIRST REPORT.

TO THE QUEEN'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

We, Your Majesty's Commissioners, whose hands and seals are hereunto set, having been appointed by Your Majesty to inquire into the operation and effect of the present constitution of the High Court of Chancery of England, the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, the Central Criminal Court, the High Court of Admiralty of England, the Admiralty Court of the Cinque Ports, the Courts of Probate and of Divorce for England, the Courts of Common Pleas of the Counties Palatine of Lancaster and of Durham respectively, and the Courts of Error and of Appeal from all the said several Courts; and into the operation and effect of the present separation and division of jurisdictions between the said several Courts; and also into the operation and effect of the present arrangements for holding the sittings in London and Middlesex, and the holding of Sittings and Assizes in England and Wales, and of the present division of the legal year into terms and vacations, and generally into the operation and effect of the existing laws and arrangements for distributing and transacting the judicial business of the said Courts respectively, as well in Court as in Chambers, with a view to ascertain whether any and what changes and improvements,—either by uniting and consolidating the said Courts or any of them, or by extending or altering the several jurisdictions, or assigning any matters or causes now within their respective cognizance to any other jurisdiction, or by altering the number of Judges in the said Courts, or any of them, or empowering one or more Judges in any of the said Courts to transact any kind of business now transacted by a greater number, or by altering the mode in which the business of the said Courts or any of them, or of the sittings and assizes, is now distributed or conducted, or otherwise, —may be advantageously made so as to provide for the more speedy, economical, and satisfactory despatch of the judicial business now transacted by the same Courts, and at the Sittings and Assizes respectively; and further to make inquiry into the laws relating to juries, especially with reference to the qualification, summoning, nominating, and enforcing the attendance of jurors, with a view to the better, more regular, and more efficient conduct of Trials by Jury, and the attendance of jurors at such trials, do most humbly submit to Your Majesty this our First Report.

Introductory Observations.

In commencing the inquiry which we were directed by Your Majesty to make, the first subject that naturally presented itself for consideration was the ancient division of the Courts, into the Courts of Common Law, and the Court of Chancery, founded on the well known distinction in our law between Common Law and Equity.

This distinction led to the establishment of two systems of Judicature, organized in different ways, and administering justice on different and sometimes opposite principles, using different methods of procedure, and applying different remedies. Large classes of rights, altogether ignored by the Courts of Common Law, were protected and enforced by the Court of Chancery, and recourse was had to the same Court for the purpose of obtaining a more adequate protection against the violation of Common Law rights than the Courts of Common Law were competent to afford. The Common Law Courts were confined by their system of procedure in most actions, — not brought for recovering the possession of land,—to giving judgment for debt or damages, a remedy which has been found to be totally insufficient for the adjustment of the complicated disputes of modern society. The procedure at Common Law was founded on the trial by jury, and was framed on the supposition that every issue of fact was capable of being tried in that way; but experience has shown that supposition to be erroneous. A large number of important cases frequently occur in the practice of the Common Law Courts which cannot be conveniently adapted to that mode of trial; and ultimately those cases either find their way into the Court of Chancery, or the Suitors in the Courts of Common Law are obliged to have recourse to private arbitration in order to supply the defects of their inadequate procedure.

The evils of this double system of Judicature, and the confusion and conflict of jurisdiction to which it has led, have been long known and acknowledged.

The subject engaged the attention of the Commissioners appointed in 1851 to inquire into the constitution of the Court of Chancery. Those learned Commissioners, after pointing out some of the defects in the administration of justice arising out of the conflicting systems of procedure and modes of redress adopted by the Courts of Common Law and Equity respectively, state their opinion, that "a practical and effectual remedy "for many of the evils in question may be found in such a transfer or blending of "jurisdiction, coupled with such other practical amendments, as will render each Court "competent to administer complete justice in the cases which fall under its cognizance."

In like manner the Commissioners appointed in 1850 to inquire into the constitution of the Common Law Courts make, in their Second Report, a very similar recommendation. They report that "it appeared to them that the Courts of "Common Law, to be able satisfactorily to administer justice, ought to possess in all "matters within their jurisdiction the power to give all the redress necessary to protect "and vindicate Common Law rights, and to prevent wrongs, whether existing or likely "to happen unless prevented;" and further that "a consolidation of all the elements "of a complete remedy in the same Court was obviously desirable, not to say im-"peratively necessary, to the establishment of a consistent and rational system of "procedure."

In consequence of these Reports several Acts of Parliament have been passed for the purpose of carrying out to a limited extent the recommendations of the Commissioners.

By virtue of these Acts the Court of Chancery is now, not only empowered, but bound to decide for itself all questions of Common Law without having recourse, as formerly, to the aid of a Common Law Court, whether such questions arise incidentally in the course of the suit, or constitute the foundation of a suit, in which a more effectual remedy is sought for the violation of a common law right, or a better protection against its violation than can be had at Common Law. The Court is further empowered to take evidence orally in open Court, and in certain cases to award damages for breaches of contract or wrongs as at Common Law; and Trial by Jury,—the great distinctive feature of the Common Law,—has recently, for the first time, been introduced into the Court of Chancery.

On the other hand, the Courts of Common Law are now authorized to compel discovery in all cases, in which a Court of Equity would have enforced it in a suit instituted for the purpose. A limited power has been conferred on Courts of Common Law to grant injunctions, and to allow equitable defences to be pleaded, and in certain cases to grant relief from forfeitures. These changes, however, fall far short of the recommendations of the Common Law Commissioners, who in their Final Report expressed the opinion, that power should be conferred on the Common Law Courts "to give, in respect of rights there recognized, all the protection and redress which "at present can be obtained in any jurisdiction."

The alterations, to which we have referred, have no doubt introduced considerable improvements into the procedure both of the Common Law and Equity Courts; but, after a careful consideration of the subject, and judging now with the advantage of many years experience of the practical working of the systems actually in force, we are of opinion that "the transfer or blending of jurisdiction" attempted to be carried out by recent Acts of Parliament, even if it had been adopted to the full extent recommended by the Commissioners, is not a sufficient or adequate remedy for the evils complained of, and would at best have mitigated but not removed the most prominent of those evils.

The authority now possessed by the Court of Chancery to decide for itself all questions of Common Law has no doubt worked beneficially. But the mode of taking evidence orally before an Examiner, instead of before the Judge who has to decide the case, has justly caused much dissatisfaction; and Trial by Jury,—whether from the reluctance of the Judge or of the Counsel to adopt such an innovation, or from the complexity of the issues generally involved in the suit, or because the proceedings in Chancery do not give rise to so many conflicts of evidence as proceedings in other Courts,—has been attempted in comparatively few cases.

In the Common Law Courts the power to compel discovery has been extensively used, and has proved most salutary; but the jurisdiction conferred on those Courts to grant injunctions and to allow equitable defences to be pleaded has been so limited and restricted,—the former extending only to cases where there has been an actual violation of the right, and the latter being confined to those equitable defences where the Court of Chancery would have granted a perpetual and unconditional injunction,—that these remedies have not been of much practical use at Common Law, and Suitors have consequently been obliged to resort to the Court of Chancery, as before, for the purpose of obtaining a complete remedy.

Much therefore of the old mischief still remains, notwithstanding the changes which have been introduced; and the Court of Chancery necessarily continues to exercise the jurisdiction of restraining actions at law on equitable grounds, and even claims to exercise that jurisdiction in cases where an equitable defence might be properly pleaded at Common Law.

It may be further observed, in illustration of the evils of the double procedure, that whenever a new class of business arises, such as the litigation arising out of railway and other joint stock companies, proceedings, frequently of an experimental character, are commenced both at Law and in Equity by different suitors, leading to the inconvenience of protracted litigation, and the danger of conflicting judgments. We may refer to the litigation lately pending between the sellers of railway shares and the jobbers on the Stock Exchange, by which the sellers sought to obtain an indemnity from the jobbers against calls. The litigation began in a Court of Common Law. A suit in Equity soon followed, by a different plaintiff against the same defendants, both suits asking for similar redress. The Court of Common Law decided in favour of the plaintiff. The Court of Equity shortly after delivered judgment to the same effect. The defendants appealed in both suits; in the one case to the Exchequer Chamber, in the other to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. Both appeals were pending at the same time, but there was no official machinery by which the Judges of Appeal in Chancery and the Court of Exchequer Chamber could enter into communication with the view of arriving at a common result. The Court of Exchequer Chamber reversed the judgment of the Court below; the Court of Appeal in Chancery, acting independently of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, arrived at the same conclusion, and about the same time delivered its judgment, reversing the decision of the Vice-Chancellor. The Defendants were thus subjected to litigation (at the instance, no doubt, of different parties), carried on at the same time in different Courts, and exposed to the risk of conflicting decisions, those Courts operating under different forms of procedure, and being controlled by different Courts of Appeal.

The litigation arising out of Joint Stock Companies has constituted a very large proportion of the business which has engaged the attention of Courts of Law and Equity for some years. Directors of Joint Stock Companies fill the double character of agents and trustees for the companies and shareholders; and the effect of their acts and representations has frequently been brought into question in both jurisdictions, and sometimes with opposite results. The expense thus needlessly incurred has been so great, and the perplexity thereby occasioned in the conduct of business so considerable, as to convince most persons, who have followed the development of this branch of the law, of the necessity that exists for a tribunal invested with full power of dealing with all the complicated rights and obligations springing out of such transactions, and of administering complete and appropriate relief, no matter whether the rights and obligations involved are what are called legal or equitable.

We may refer also to the present condition of the High Court of Admiralty. A conflict, bearing some analogy to that which has so long existed between the Court of Chancery and the Courts of Common Law, seems likely to arise, if it has not already arisen, between the latter Courts and the Court of Admiralty. From ancient times the Courts of Common Law exercised a jealous supervision over the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, and by the issuing of frequent writs of prohibition took pains to confine the jurisdiction of that Court within the narrowest limits. The consequence was, that, except in time of war, when it sat as a Prize Court, there was very little business in the Court of Admiralty until its jurisdiction was extended by recent legislation. Now, however, by virtue of several Acts of Parliament, the first of which was passed so lately as 1840, but more especially by the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, the jurisdiction of the Court has been extended to a variety of cases, which had been theretofore considered as exclusively cognizable in Courts of Common Law. As the Court of Chancery, chiefly by means of its power of granting injunctions for threatened as well as actual injuries, has extended its jurisdiction over a large class of cases properly cognizable in Courts of Common Law, the Court of Admiralty, assisted by the recent legislation above mentioned, and enjoying the peculiar advantage of a Court enforcing the law of maritime lien by proceedings in rem, might be expected, if this system were continued, to extend its jurisdiction over many kinds of litigation relating to ships or cargoes, in respect of which the Courts of Common Law have a concurrent jurisdiction, but are not able to afford such convenient redress. The cause of this is manifestly the imperfection of the Common Law system, and the consequent necessity of seeking for a more complete remedy elsewhere.

Not only are the procedure of and the remedies administered by the Courts of Common Law and the Court of Admiralty different, but sometimes the redress to be obtained is regulated by different and conflicting principles. Thus in a collision suit the damages are, in some cases, assessed on one principle in a Court of Common Law, and on an entirely different principle in the Court of Admiralty. At Common Law, if both parties are found to be in fault, the Plaintiff fails. In the Court of Admiralty, the Plaintiff, under exactly similar circumstances, is entitled to recover half his damages from the Defendant; and there being generally in such cases a cross suit, the Defendant is also entitled to recover half his damages from the Plaintiff. This anomaly, if our recommendations are adopted, will require to be corrected by legislation.

The Court of Admiralty, even with the extended jurisdiction conferred on it by recent enactments, still labours under the same defect as the other Courts. It cannot, in many cases, give a complete remedy; the suitor may obtain one portion of his redress in the Court of Admiralty, but he must go into a Court of Common Law, or it may be into the Court of Chancery, for the rest. The Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over a claim for damage to cargo, where the owner is not domiciled in England, but it has no jurisdiction over the claim of the shipowner for the freight due in respect of the same cargo; the shipowner must proceed for that in a Court of Common Law. It seems plain that these are counter claims, which ought to be capable of being set off against each other in the same suit. In the same way, the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty over claims for necessaries supplied to a ship is restricted to the case of a foreign ship, and to that of a British ship where there is not any owner domiciled in England; but if it happens that for some other cause the ship is under arrest, or that the proceeds thereof are in Court, then the Court exercises jurisdiction over all claims for building, equipping, or repairing the ship. All these claims may at the same time be litigated by a different procedure in a Court of Common Law; and hence it may happen not unfrequently that litigation may be proceeding simultaneously in the Court of Admiralty and at Common Law for the adjustment of disputes arising out of the same transaction, between the same parties or those who are liable to indemnify them. The conflict of judicial decisions, which may be thus occasioned, is made more perplexing, by the want of a Common Court of Appeal, as the appeal from the Court of Admiralty is to the Privy Council, and from the Common Law Courts to the Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords.

The present state of the County Courts may also be appropriately referred to, as exhibiting the strange working of a system of separate jurisdictions, even when exercised by the same Court.

The County Court has jurisdiction in Common Law cases, up to 50*l.* in contracts, and to 10*l.* in torts. It has also equitable jurisdiction in certain cases when the value of the property in dispute does not exceed 500*l.*, and in at least one of such cases, namely an administration suit, it is now competent for any County Court Judge to restrain the prosecution of actions brought by creditors in any of the Superior Courts of Common Law. By an Act of Parliament of last session some of the County Courts have also been invested with Admiralty jurisdiction in a large class of cases, where the amount in dispute does not exceed, in some cases 150*l.* and in others 300*l.* There is an appeal in each class of cases, within certain limits, to a Court of Common Law, to the Court of Chancery, or to the Court of Admiralty. But these jurisdictions, though conferred on the same Court and the same Judge, still remain (like the Common Law and Equity sides of the old Court of Exchequer) quite distinct and separate. The Judge has no power to administer in one and the same suit any combination of the different remedies which belong to his three jurisdictions, however convenient or appropriate such redress may be. That can only be accomplished, under the County Court system, by three distinct suits brought in the same Court and before the same Judge, carried on under three different forms of procedure, and controlled by three different Courts of Appeal. In this case, therefore, although we appear at first sight to have obtained that great desideratum, which the Common Law Commissioners call "the con-" solidation of all the elements of a complete remedy in the same Court," yet, as that remedy can only be had in three separate suits, the evil is equally great.

We are of opinion that the defects above adverted to cannot be completely remedied by any mere transfer or blending of jurisdiction between the Courts as at present constituted; and that the first step towards meeting and surmounting the evils complained of will be the consolidation of all the Superior Courts of Law and Equity, together with the Courts of Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty, into one Court, to be called "Her Majesty's Supreme Court," in which Court shall be vested all the jurisdiction which is now exercisable by each and all the Courts so consolidated.

This consolidation would at once put an end to all conflicts of jurisdiction. No suitor could be defeated because he commenced his suit in the wrong Court, and sending the suitor from equity to law or from law to equity, to begin his suit over again in order to obtain redress, will be no longer possible.

The Supreme Court thus constituted would of course be divided into as many Chambers or Divisions as the nature and extent or the convenient despatch of business might require.

All suits, however, should be instituted in the Supreme Court, and not in any particular Chamber or Division of it; and each Chamber or Division should possess all the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court with respect to the subject-matter of the suit, and with respect to every defence which may be made thereto, whether on legal or equitable grounds, and should be enabled to grant such relief or to apply such remedy or combination of remedies as may be appropriate or necessary in order to do complete justice between the parties in the case before the Court, or, in other words, such remedies as all the present Courts combined have now jurisdiction to administer.

We consider it expedient, with a view to facilitate the transition from the old to the new system, and to make the proposed change at first as little inconvenient as possible, that the Courts of Chancery, Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer should for the present retain their distinctive titles, and should constitute so many Chambers or Divisions of the Supreme Court; and as regards the Courts of Admiralty, Divorce and Probate, we think it would be convenient that those Courts should be consolidated, and form one Chamber or Division of the Supreme Court.

We further recommend that in order to prepare for any changes that may hereafter be thought expedient in the constitution of these Chambers or Divisions of the Supreme Court, all future judicial and other appointments therein should be made subject to the possibility of such changes.

Between the several Chambers or Divisions of the Supreme Court so constituted it would be necessary to make such a classification of business as might seem desirable with reference to the nature of the suits and the relief to be sought or administered therein, and the ordinary distribution of business among the different Chambers or Divisions should be regulated according to such classification. For the same reason which induces us to recommend the retention for the present of the distinctive titles of the different Courts in their new character, as so many divisions of the Supreme Court, we think that such classification should in the first instance be made on the principle of assigning as nearly as practicable to those Chambers or Divisions such suits as would now be commenced in the respective Courts as at present constituted; with power, however, to the Supreme Court to vary or alter this classification in such manner as may from time to time be deemed expedient.

It should further be competent for any Chamber or Division of the Supreme Court to order a suit to be transferred at any stage of its progress to any other Chamber or Division of the Court, if it appears that justice can thereby be more conveniently done in the suit; but except for the purpose of obtaining such transfer, it should not be competent for any party to object to the prosecution of any suit in the particular Chamber or Division in which it is being prosecuted, on the ground that it ought to have been brought or prosecuted in some other Chamber or Division of the Court. When such transfer has been made, the Chamber or Division, to which the suit has been so transferred, will take up the suit at the stage to which it had advanced in the first Chamber, and proceed thenceforward to dispose of it in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the Chamber or Division to which it was transferred.

From the consolidation of all the present Superior Courts into one Supreme Court, it follows, that all the Judges of those Courts will become Judges of the Supreme Court; and thus every Judge (with the exception of those who are to sit exclusively in the Appellate Court herein-after recommended), though belonging to a particular Division, will be competent to sit in any other Division of the Court, whenever it may be found convenient for the administration of justice.

Here arises an important and difficult question, as to the number of Judges who should ordinarily sit in each Chamber or Division of the Supreme Court. Hitherto the constitution of the Court of Chancery and of the Courts of Common Law, in this respect, has been entirely different. Each division of the Court of Chancery is presided over by a single Judge, who adjudicates on all matters as a Court of First Instance, except in the few cases when he sits as a Court of Appeal from the County Courts. In like manner, a single Judge administers justice in the Courts of Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty respectively. On the other hand, in the Sittings of the Courts of Common Law in Banc, the Court is ordinarily constituted of four Judges. The matters adjudicated upon by the single Judge in the Court of Chancery are in many instances as important as the business transacted before the four Judges in the Courts of Common Law; so that there would seem to be either a want of power in the Court of Chancery, or an excess of power in the Courts of Common Law; but it must be borne in mind that a considerable proportion of the business of the Courts of Common Law is transacted by one of the Judges sitting at Chambers; much of the business of these Courts also consists of the review of trials which have taken place before a Judge and Jury; they also review the decisions of the Judge sitting at Chambers; they are also empowered to decide various important matters, some of which involve questions of general public interest, on which their determination is in some cases final.

With a Court of Appeal such as we propose to recommend, common to all the Divisions of the Supreme Court, constantly sitting, and easy of access, we think that matters of great importance may properly, as now in the Court of Chancery, be intrusted to the jurisdiction in the first instance of a single Judge; but, having regard to the principles which have guided us in our previous recommendations, and to the importance of avoiding any too violent transition from the modes of conducting judicial business to which the public have been accustomed, and in which they may be presumed to place confidence, we think it will be advisable to authorize a single Judge to exercise the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, in the despatch of all such business appropriated to the Divisions of the Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer respectively as by general orders, or by the special order of the Court, or the consent of the parties, may be remitted to him; and that all matters now disposed of in banco in those Courts shall be heard and determined by not more than three Judges. We also think that the Judges of each Division or Chamber in which there are several Judges should have power to sit in banco in two sub-divisions at the same time, with the assistance, whenever necessary, of a Judge or Judges from any other Division of the Court.

Procedure in the Supreme Court.

The next question that arises for consideration is that of the Procedure to be adopted in the Supreme Court as above constituted. We can only give a sketch in this Report of the leading principles of the system which we recommend, leaving for General Orders, or for a Code of procedure, as may appear most advisable, the fuller development and completion of the scheme proposed.

The present modes of procedure in the Court of Chancery, the Courts of Common Law, the Court of Admiralty, and the Courts of Probate and Divorce are in many respects different; the forms of pleading are different, the modes of trial and of taking evidence are different, the nomenclature is different, the same instrument being called by a different name in different Courts; almost every step in the cause is different. Each Court is confined to its own forms of procedure. Nor is this difference due entirely to the different nature of the cases which the Courts are called upon to try; for often the same question has to be tried, and the same remedy sought, by a totally different method, according as the proceeding is in the Court of Chancery, the Courts of Common Law, or the Court of Admiralty. This variety in procedure was originally due to causes connected with the origin and history of the different jurisdictions, and it has been influenced in more recent times by the almost complete isolation of the several Courts, and by the circumstance that in the Courts of Common Law the ordinary rule and practice is to refer the decision of disputed questions of fact to a jury, without any appeal except by way of reference to a new jury; whilst in the Court of Chancery the judge ordinarily, in the Courts of Divorce and Probate frequently, and in the Court of Admiralty invariably decides all questions of fact and law, subject to appeal.

We recommend, that as much uniformity should be introduced into the procedure of all the Divisions of the Supreme Court as is consistent with the principle of making the procedure in each Division appropriate to the nature of the cases, or classes of cases, which will be assigned to each; such uniformity would in our opinion be attended with the greatest advantages, and after a careful consideration of the subject, we see no insuperable difficulty in the way of its accomplishment.

Much may be done at the very commencement of a suit to prevent unnecessary litigation, delay, and expense. In a considerable number of suits there is no substantial question as to the right of the plaintiff to, at least, some relief. Frequently the object of the defendant is to gain time; sometimes he only disputes part of the claim, or of the amount sought to be recovered. In other cases, such as administration suits, suits to take partnership accounts, suits for specific performance, and suits for foreclosure or redemption, it is often from the first known what order must be made upon the hearing of the cause. In many such suits, notwithstanding improvements recently introduced, the proceedings are still conducted as they are in suits involving a real question as to the plaintiff's right to relief. Considerable delay is thus caused, and useless costs are incurred.

All suits, we think, should be commenced by a document to be called a Writ of Summons, and these writs of summons should be issued from one office. In all cases in which the plaintiff seeks to recover a money demand, whether founded upon a legal or equitable right, the practice established by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, should we think be adopted and the Writ should be specially endorsed with the amount sought to be recovered, and in default of appearance the plaintiff should be allowed to sign judgment for it. Further, in all cases in which a special endorsement has been made on a writ, and the defendant has appeared, the plaintiff should be entitled, on affidavit verifying the cause of action, and swearing that in his belief there is no defence, to take out a summons to show cause why he should not be at liberty to sign judgment; upon which summons such order may be made as the justice of the case may require.

In like manner, in cases of ordinary account, as in the case of a partnership or executorship, or ordinary trust account, where nothing more is required in the first instance than an account, the Writ should be specially endorsed, and in default of appearance, or after appearance, unless the defendant shall satisfy a Judge that there is really some preliminary question to be tried, an order for the account, with all usual directions, should be forthwith made. The Judge should also be empowered at any time, on summary application in Chambers or elsewhere, to direct, if he think fit, any necessary inquiries or accounts, notwithstanding it may appear that there is some special or further relief sought, or some special matter to be tried, as to which it may be proper that the suit should proceed in the ordinary manner.

When the Defendant enters an appearance, and the suit has to proceed further, the issues between the parties must be ascertained by pleading, or otherwise. The systems of pleading now in use, both at Common Law and in Equity, appear to us to be open to serious objections. Common Law pleadings are apt to be mixed averments of law and fact, varied and multiplied in form, and leading to a great number of useless issues, while the facts which lie behind them are seldom clearly discoverable. Equity pleadings, on the other hand, commonly take the form of a prolix narrative of the facts relied upon by the party, with copies or extracts of deeds, correspondence, and other documents, and other particulars of evidence, set forth at needless length. The best system would be one, which combined the comparative brevity of the simpler forms of Common Law pleading with the principle of stating, intelligibly and not technically, the substance of the facts relied upon as constituting the plaintiff's or the defendant's case, as distinguished from his evidence. It is upon this principle that most modern improvements of pleading have been founded, both in the United States and in our own colonies and Indian possessions, and in the practice recently settled for the Courts of Probate and Divorce. PLEAD

We recommend that a short statement constructed on this principle, of the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of complaint, not on oath, to be called the Declaration, should be delivered to the defendant. Thereupon the defendant should deliver to the plaintiff a short statement, not on oath, of the facts constituting the defence, to be called the Answer. When new facts are alleged in the Answer, the plaintiff should be at liberty to reply. The pleadings should not go beyond the Reply, save by special permission of a Judge; but the Judge should, at any stage of the proceedings, permit such amendment in or addition to the pleadings as he may think necessary for determining the real question or controversy between the parties, upon such terms, as to costs and otherwise, as he may think fit.

We think, that a defendant, having a right or claim against a plaintiff with reference to the subject matter of the suit, or arising out of the same transaction, which at present he cannot enforce without a separate or cross action or suit, should be at liberty to bring forward such right or claim by his Answer, which, in that case, should have the same effect as if it were a Declaration in a cross action or suit, so as to enable the Court or a Judge to pronounce a final judgment between the parties with respect both to the original and to the cross demand. The same principle might, we think, be extended to the recovery of other demands of the defendant, capable of being set off against the plaintiff's demand, when the balance is in favour of the defendant. But a Judge should be empowered, on application by the plaintiff before trial, to refuse permission to allow such cross right or claim to be brought forward, if he shall be of opinion that it cannot conveniently be adjudicated upon in the case to be tried.

We think also, that the Court should have power to direct that any person not originally a party to the suit, but who may have such an interest in the subject matter thereof as to make his presence necessary or expedient to enable the Court to do complete justice, should be summoned to attend the further proceedings and be bound thereby; and that, with this view, the plaintiff should be at liberty to make any person, against whom he may conceive himself to be entitled to relief, a party defendant to the suit. And, on the other hand, that, where the defendant is or claims to be entitled to contribution or to indemnity or other relief over against any other person or persons, or where from any other cause it shall appear to the Court fit that a question in the suit should be determined, not only as between the plaintiff and defendant, but as between the defendant and any other person, the Court should have power to make such order as may be proper for the purpose of having the question so determined.

We think, that either party should be at liberty to apply at any time, either before or after pleading, for such order as he may upon the admitted facts in the case be entitled to, without waiting for the determination of any other questions between the parties.

With regard to the trial and determination of disputed questions of fact, the mode of trial varies according to the Court in which the litigation happens to be pending, without any sufficient power of adaptation to the requirements of particular cases.

In the Court of Chancery, until recently, the Judge had no power to summon a jury, whatever might be the conflict of evidence or dispute as to the facts; all questions of fact as well as of law were generally decided by the Judge. In some cases, it was the practice to send issues to be tried by a jury at Common Law. This course, however, was taken, not as a mode of trial, but merely for the assistance or information of the Court, which still reserved to itself the ultimate decision of the facts, and if dissatisfied with the first verdict might send the case before a second jury, or decide the facts according to its own view, and without regard to the verdict. Substantially the practice of the Court of Chancery remains unaltered; but there is now a power, which is rarely exercised, of summoning a jury, and the practice of sending issues to be tried at Common Law has become less frequent.

The Court of Admiralty, which decides for itself all questions of law and fact, may in special cases call in the assistance of nautical or mercantile assessors, but it has no power to summon a jury. The Court, however, by a recent statute has power to direct any question of fact arising in a suit to be tried in a Court of Common Law, and, if it thinks fit, to order a new trial; but the verdict of the jury, when final, is conclusive upon the Court. This power, we understand, has been exercised in only one instance.

In the Courts of Probate and Divorce application is made to the Judge in each case to fix the mode of trial, either before himself or by a jury. In the Probate Court, if the parties agree in asking for a jury, the application is usually granted; if they do not agree, the Judge fixes the mode of trial which he considers best adapted to the case; but in the case of an heir-at-law cited, or otherwise made party to the suit, a jury may be demanded as of right. A similar rule of practice exists in the Court of Divorce. In that court also, in cases of dissolution of marriage, either party may demand a jury as of right.

In the Courts of Common Law a jury has always been regarded as the constitutional tribunal for trying issues of fact; and the theory is, that all such questions are fit to be tried in that way. It has, however, long been apparent, in the practice of the Courts of Common Law, that there are several classes of cases litigated in those courts to which trial by jury is not adapted, and in which the parties are compelled—in many cases after they have incurred all the expense of a trial—to resort to private arbitration. Until the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854, the parties could not be compelled to go to arbitration, and the power given by that Act is limited to cases where the dispute relates wholly or in part to matters of mere account, or where the parties have themselves before action agreed in writing to refer the matter in difference to arbitration.

The system of arbitration which has thus been introduced, is attended with much inconvenience. The practice is to refer cases which cannot be conveniently tried in court either to a Barrister or to an Expert. A Barrister can seldom give that continuous attention to the case which is essential to its being speedily and satisfactorily disposed of; and an Expert, being unacquainted with the law of evidence, and with the rules which govern legal proceedings, allows questions to be introduced which have nothing to do with the matters at issue. In neither case has the Referee that authority over the practitioners and the witnesses which is essential to the proper conduct of the proceedings. If the barrister or solicitor who is engaged in the suit, or even a witness, has some other engagement, an adjournment is almost of course. The Arbitrator makes his own charges, generally depending on the number and length of the meetings, and the professional fees are regulated accordingly. The result is great and unnecessary delay, and a vast increase of expense to the suitors. The Arbitrator thus appointed is the sole judge of law and fact, and there is no appeal from his judgment, however erroneous his view of the law may be, unless perhaps when the error appears on the face of his award. Nor is there any remedy, whatever may be the miscarriage of the Arbitrator, unless he fails to decide on all the matters referred to him, or exceeds his jurisdiction, or is guilty of some misconduct in the course of the case.

In the Court of Chancery questions involving complicated inquiries, particularly in matters of account, are always made the subject of reference to a Judge at Chambers. These references are practically conducted before the chief clerk, but any party is entitled, if he think fit, to require that any question arising in the course of the proceedings shall be submitted to the Judge himself for decision. In such a case the decision of the Judge is given after he has been sitting in Court all day hearing causes. It has been represented to us that this system does not give satisfaction, and that there is not sufficient judicial power to dispose of the business in Court, and at the same time to give that personal attention to the business in Chambers which was contemplated when references to the Judge in Chambers were substituted for the old references to the Masters in Chancery.

In the Court of Admiralty references are always to the Registrar, assisted if necessary by one or two merchants or other skilled persons as assessors or advisers; the Registrar, from his knowledge of law, is enabled to regulate the conduct of the case; the merchants—assuming them to be properly chosen—have that practical knowledge which enables them to advise him on questions of a commercial nature that may arise in the course of the proceedings. The reference proceeds like a trial at law until it is concluded, without adjournment, except for special cause, and there is an appeal at once to the Judge in case the Registrar miscarries.

It seems to us that it is the duty of the country to provide tribunals adapted to the trial of all classes of cases, and capable of adjusting the rights of litigant parties in the manner most suitable to the nature of the questions to be tried.

We therefore recommend that great discretion should be given to the Supreme Court, as to the mode of trial, and that any questions to be tried should be capable of being tried in any Division of the Court.

(1.) By a Judge.
(3.) By a Referee.

The plaintiff should be at liberty to give notice of trial by any one of these modes which he may prefer, subject to the right of the defendant to move the Judge to appoint any other mode. When the trial is to be by a Jury or by Referee, a Judge, on application by either party, if he think the questions to be tried are not sufficiently ascertained upon the pleadings, should have power to order that issues be prepared by the parties, and if necessary settled by himself. The Judge should also, on the application of either party have power to direct that any question of law should be first argued, that different questions of fact arising in the same suit should be tried by different modes of trial, and that one or more questions of fact should be tried before the others.

The system which, in all the Divisions of the Supreme Court to which it can be conveniently applied, we would suggest for the trial of matters suitable for trial by Referees, is as follows:

OFFICIAL REFEREES.

We think that there should be attached to the Supreme Court officers to be called Official Referees, and that a Judge should have power, at any time after the writ of summons, and with or without pleadings, and generally upon such terms as he may think fit, to order a cause, or any matter arising therein, to be tried by a Referee; and that whenever a cause is to be tried by a Referee, such trial should be by one of these Official Referees, unless a Judge otherwise orders. We think, however, that a Judge should have power to order such trial to be by some person not an Official Referee of the Court, but who on being so appointed should pro hâc vice be deemed to be and should act as if he were an Official Referee. The Judge should have power to direct where the trial shall take place, and the Referee should be at liberty, subject to any directions which may from time to time be given by the Judge, to adjourn the trial to any place which he may deem to be more convenient.

The Referee should, unless the Judge otherwise direct, proceed with the trial in open Court, de die in diem, with power, however, to adjourn the further hearing for any cause which he may deem sufficient, to be certified under his hand to the Court.

The Referee should be at liberty, by writing under his hand, to reserve, or pending the reference to submit any question for the decision of the Court, or to state any facts specially with power to the Court to draw inferences; and the verdict should in such case be entered as the Court may direct. In all other respects the decision of the Referee should have the same effect as a verdict at Nisi Prius, subject to the power of the Court to require any explanation or reasons from the Referee, and to remit the cause or any part thereof for reconsideration to the same, or any other Referee. The Referee should, subject to the control of the Court, have full discretionary power over the whole or any part of the costs of the proceeding before him.

In connection with the subject of trial, it seems proper to refer to the recommendation of the Patent Law Commissioners in their Report of the 29th July 1864, who, after observing, that the present mode of trying the validity of patents is not satisfactory, advise, that such trials should take place before a Judge, sitting with scientific assessors to be selected by himself in each case, but without a jury, unless at the desire of both parties to the suit; and that on such trials the Judge, if sitting without a jury, should decide questions of fact as well as of law. It appears to us that a plan similar in substance to that recommended by the Patent Law Commissioners, might with advantage be applied to the trial, not of Patent cases only, but of any cases involving questions of a scientific or technical character, in which the Judge, or the Referee by leave of the Judge, may think it desirable to have the aid, during the whole or any part of the proceedings, of scientific assessors.

VIDENCE. As respects the mode of taking evidence at the trial, the practice of the Courts varies considerably. The rule in the Common Law Courts always was and still is that the evidence at the trial should be taken by oral examination of the witnesses in open Court. Formerly, in the Court of Chancery, the witnesses were examined and cross-examined on written interrogatories by an officer of the Court, in the absence of the parties and their legal advisers. At present the evidence in chief is taken, either by affidavit, or orally before an examiner generally in the absence of the opposite party, who has however the power of cross-examination at a later stage, in some cases orally before an examiner, and in others in open Court. In the Court of Admiralty the practice of examining the witnesses in open Court has been recently introduced, and is now in general use. In the Courts of Probate and Divorce the witnesses are also, examined in open Court. There can be no doubt that whenever there is a conflict of evidence the best way of extracting the truth is by oral examination of the witnesses in open Court, in the presence of the Judge or jury who have to decide the case; but there are often formal and collateral matters necessary to be proved in the course of a suit which can be conveniently proved by affidavit, and written evidence may sometimes be combined with oral evidence so as to save expense, and facilitate a speedy trial.

We recommend, for these reasons, that, in the absence of any agreement between the parties, and subject to any General Order of the Court applicable to any particular class of cases, the evidence at the trial should be by oral examination in open Court, but that the Court should have power at any time to direct that the evidence in any case, or as to any particular matter at issue, should be taken by affidavit, or that affidavits of any witnesses may be read at the trial, or that any witnesses may be examined upon interrogatories or otherwise before a commissioner or examiner. Any witness who may have made an affidavit should be liable to cross-examination in open Court, unless the Court or a Judge shall direct the cross-examination to take place in any other manner. Upon interlocutory applications, the evidence should, we think, as a general rule be taken by affidavit, but the Court or a Judge should upon the application of either party have power to order the attendance, for cross-examination or otherwise, of any person who may have made an affidavit.

The existing practice as to requiring admissions of written documents should, in our opinion, be continued. We think also, that a similar practice might with advantage be extended to the admission of certain facts as well as documents; and therefore we recommend that if it be made to appear to the Judge, at or after the trial of any case, that one of the parties was a reasonable time before the trial required in writing to admit any specific fact, and without reasonable cause refused to do so, the Judge should either disallow to such party or order him to pay (as the case may be) the costs incurred in consequence of such refusal.

Incident Powers.

Some other incidental powers which the Court, in our opinion, ought to possess, may be conveniently mentioned in this place.

The Judge at the trial should, without consent of the parties, have power to reserve leave to the Court to enter a nonsuit or verdict, and when the Judge at the trial has reserved any question of law, he should have power to direct the cause to be set down for argument before the Court, without motion for a rule nisi. Upon motion for a new trial the Court should have power, although no leave has been reserved at the trial, to order a nonsuit or verdict to be entered.

The time within which an application must be made for a new trial should be regulated by General Orders of the Supreme Court.

We recommend that every Order of a Judge at Chambers or at Nisi Prius should have the same force and effect as a rule of Court now has, and that a Judge sitting in Chambers or at Nisi Prius should have the same power to enforce, vary, or deal with any such order by attachment or otherwise as is possessed by the Court, but the Court should have power, upon application in a summary way, to enforce, vary, or discharge any such order.

We think that a Judge should have power, at any time after writ issued, upon being satisfied that the plaintiff has a good cause of action or suit, and that the defendant is about to leave, or is keeping out of the jurisdiction in order to avoid process, to order an attachment to issue against any property of the defendant which may be shown to be within the jurisdiction; such property to be released upon bail being given, and in default of bail to be dealt with, as a Judge may direct. This power, which is analogous to that now vested in the Court of Admiralty, may make the use of writs of Capias and Ne exeat regno by the Courts of Common Law and Chancery (which are sometimes used oppressively) less frequent. It may also render the retention of the process of foreign attachment in the Lord Mayor's Court in the City of London unnecessary.

Costs.

In the Court of Chancery, the Court of Admiralty, and the Courts of Probate and Divorce, the Court has at present full power over the costs. We think that the absence of this power in the Courts of Common Law often occasions injustice, and leads to unnecessary litigation. We therefore recommend that in all the Divisions of the Supreme Court the costs of the suit and of all proceedings in it should be in the discretion of the Court.

General Orders.

Power should be vested in the Supreme Court to regulate from time to time by General Orders the procedure and practice in all its Divisions, and to make such changes in the duties of the several officers of the Court, as may from time to time be thought fit, and may be consistent with the nature of their appointments.

Sittings and Assizes.

We now proceed to consider the present general arrangements for the conduct of judicial business.

The Sittings during Term are occupied, together with a portion of those after Term, in the Courts of Common Law, by business in Banco, Nisi Prius Sittings going on at the same time. Some descriptions of business in the Courts of Common Law can only be transacted during Term. In all other Courts there is practically no difference in the business done at the Sittings during and out of Term.

We think that, unless it should be thought right wholly to abolish the division of the legal year into Terms, there should be three instead of four Terms, commencing respectively on the 2nd November, 11th January, and 1st May in each year, the duration of each Term to be four weeks.

There may be some convenience in retaining such fixed periods with a view to the necessary times of vacation, which immediately precede the autumnal and winter Sittings of the Courts, and which it might be expedient in the spring to regulate, so as to coincide as nearly as possible with the Easter recess of Parliament. But we are of opinion that there should not be in any Division of the Court any distinction between the business capable of being transacted in or out of Term, and that all the Courts should have power to sit at any time, in or out of Term, for the despatch of any business.

With respect to the business of the Common Law Courts in Banco, it is unnecessary to add anything here to the recommendations in the previous part of our Report. For the despatch of such part of the present Chamber business of the Common Law Courts as requires to be transacted by a Judge, we think that one Judge at least should sit continuously during the legal year.

We have next to consider the arrangements for holding Sittings for the trial of causes in London and Middlesex, and for holding Assizes in other parts of England and Wales.

ITTINGS IN ONDON AND IIDDLESEX.

The system at present prevailing in London and Middlesex is, that each of the three Superior Courts of Common Law holds separate Nisi Prius Sittings; those after Hilary, Trinity, and Michaelmas Terms, at which the more important business is transacted, being limited by Statute to periods of twenty-four days. Constant complaints have been made of the arrears at these sittings, and of the unequal distribution of business between the three Courts. To remedy this, we propose that all causes to be tried at these Sittings should be entered upon a common list or lists. These Sittings should be held continuously throughout the legal year, by as many Courts as the amount of business to be disposed of may render necessary; and we think it expedient that all issues of fact in the Chancery Division of the Supreme Court, to be tried by a jury, should, unless the Court otherwise order, be entered for trial at these Sittings, and be tried accordingly. During the time allotted to the circuits we propose that at least two Nisi Prius Courts should sit continuously in the Metropolis.

The present Home Circuit is composed of five counties in the immediate neighbourhood of London. Between these counties and London there is constant railway communication, and we have no doubt that the legal business usually transacted at Assizes in those counties can be more conveniently disposed of in the Metropolis than at separate Assizes held for each county. In Surrey, especially, it is notorious that nearly all the causes tried at the Assizes are causes which would have been tried in the Metropolis, if there had been an opportunity of trying them at the previous Sittings. We also think that the criminal business for the counties composing the Home Circuit, which, if that Circuit were continued, would be disposed of at the Assizes, might with advantage be transferred to the Central Criminal Court. That Court has already jurisdiction over certain portions of the counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey; and we think that any additional expense, that may be incurred by trying the prisoners from those counties at the Central Criminal Court, will be more than compensated by the speedy trial of prisoners, and the saving occasioned by the abolition of a separate Assize for each of the five counties, and of the Winter Assize. The extended area also, from which the jurors will be taken, will render the attendance of any particular juror, or class of jurors, less frequent, and the duties of the jurors on the whole less onerous.

We therefore propose that the counties composing the Home Circuit should, with Middlesex, constitute for all the purposes of trial, both in civil and criminal cases, one venue or county. As respects the City of London, we do not think it will be expedient, until the proposed new Courts of Justice shall have been erected, to disturb the existing arrangements for holding separate Sittings at the Guildhall for the trial of cases of a commercial character.

We think it desirable, as a general rule, that one Judge only, save in case of special need, should be appointed to attend at each Session of the Central Criminal Court.

CIRCUITS.

The arrangements for holding Sittings or Assizes in the other parts of England and Wales have been much considered by the Commission; but we are not prepared, without further deliberation, to submit to Your Majesty a detailed scheme on that subject.

We propose, however, to indicate briefly in our present Report the direction of the changes on this subject, which we are disposed to recommend, and some of the principles on which, we think, those changes should be founded.

Throughout England and Wales the extent of the venue depends entirely on ancient accidental divisions. All counties, including towns and cities which are counties of themselves, form separate venues. Power has been given by statute to try causes, arising within a county of a city or town, in the county adjoining by a jury of that county, the practical effect of which is, that where a county of a town is not an assize town, the jurors within such towns are exempted from serving altogether, and the burden of trying causes arising within those towns is thrown exclusively on the jurors of the adjoining county.

The necessity for holding Assizes in every county, without regard to the extent of the business to be transacted in each county, leads, in our judgment, to a great waste of judicial strength, and a great loss of time in going from one circuit town to another, and causes much unnecessary cost and inconvenience to those whose attendance is necessary or customary at the Assizes.

The distribution of a small amount of business among a large number of circuit towns is the cause of serious evil to the suitors. From the impossibility of ascertaining beforehand with accuracy the business likely to arise, the time allotted to some towns often proves insufficient, and complaints arise that the trial of causes is hurried, or that the parties are driven to dispose of their cases by reference, or otherwise, unless they submit to the loss and inconvenience of having their causes postponed until the next Assizes. The expense and trouble of bringing together judges, sheriffs, and grand jurors, and the time occupied in the preliminaries of an Assize, are the same at a small place, where there is but little business, as at a large one. The number of jurors, special and common, required to be in attendance, is much increased by the limited extent of the existing assize districts. If those districts were enlarged, a juror, who had once attended at the Assizes, would probably be relieved from future attendance for a considerable time.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the judicial business of the country should no longer be arranged and distributed according to the accidental division of counties, but that the venue for trials should be enlarged, and that several counties should be consolidated into Districts of a convenient size,—that such Districts should for all purposes of trial at the assizes, both in civil and criminal cases, be treated as one venue or county,—and that all counties of towns or cities should for the purposes of such Districts be included in an adjacent district or county.

In arranging the Circuits, we think that they should be so remodelled as to render the amount of business likely to be transacted on each Circuit as nearly equal as may be practicable; and in fixing the towns at which the Assizes should be held, we recommend that those towns should be chosen which are the most central,—with which there is the best and most rapid railway communication from all parts of the district,—and to which the inhabitants are most in the habit of resorting for the purposes of business. We may add, that after deducting the counties now forming the Home Circuit, we have reason to think that six Circuits for England and Wales would be found sufficient.

We think that in lieu of the ordinary Assize Commissions, one Commission only should be necessary for each Circuit; and that in place of the opening of the Commissions as now used, a notice should be inserted in the Gazette of such Commissions respectively, and of the days of holding the Assizes under them; and that all the Judges of the several Divisions of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer should be in the Commission for each Circuit, and should be auxiliary to each other so far as may be necessary, and may be prescribed by General Orders of the Supreme Court.

We also consider it advisable that all local venues in civil actions should be abolished, leaving it to the Court or Judge to control the choice of the plaintiff in case an inconvenient venue should be chosen.

In order to lighten the business on Circuit, we think it expedient that the jurisdiction of Quarter Sessions should be extended to Burglary, and some other offences which we do not think it necessary here to define; and that a classification of offences triable at the Assizes and at Quarter Sessions should be made, and that all Magistrates be directed to make their committals in accordance with such classification, unless it appear to the Magistrate, and he state in his warrant of commitment, that the case appears to him to be of such importance as to be fit for trial at the Assizes.

A Proviso* similar to that which is now introduced into the Commissions for the Winter Assizes should, in our opinion, be invariably inserted in the Commissions for every Assize, limiting the duties of the Judges to the trial of persons committed to the Assizes only.

Provided always, and our will and pleasure is, that wherever it shall be made to appear by the warrant of commitment or recognizance to prosecute, or otherwise, that the offence of any person or persons was intended to be inquired into and heard and determined at any sessions of the peace in the county aforesaid, it shall not be necessary for you our said justices hereby assigned, or for any of you, to inquire into or hear or determine such offences; provided also, and our will and pleasure is, that whenever it shall be made to appear by the warrant of commitment or recognizance to prosecute, or otherwise, that any prisoner in our said gaol has been committed thereto in order to his or her being tried at the next sessions of the peace for the said county, you our said justices hereby constituted, or any of you, shall not be required to deliver our said gaol of such prisoner, but shall be at liberty to order such prisoner to remain in our said gaol.

Juries.

We now proceed to the subject of Juries. Complaints have for some time been made, and more particularly by special jurors in the metropolis, of the inconveniences and inequalities of the present system. We believe that these complaints are well founded, and that they are chiefly attributable to the imperfect mode in which the jury lists are now framed, and to the numerous exemptions from serving which are now allowed.

We are confirmed in these views by the evidence recently taken by the Select Committee of the House of Commons. We do not propose to refer to this evidence in detail. It will suffice to notice the statement that for the whole county of Middlesex the number of special jurors is only 1,800, of whom it is stated that in consequence of the imperfect state of the list, at least one third are not available. It also appears that the total number of special jurors in the lists for the counties of Kent and Sussex are respectively only 400 and 197. It is manifest from these figures that the duty is not fairly distributed amongst those, who might be, and who, under an amended state of the law, ought to be duly qualified to serve. The existing state of the special jury lists is however not wholly due to the careless manner in which they are now framed and revised, nor to the existing exemptions from service on juries; but is in some measure attributable to the vague definition of "merchant" and "esquire" as qualifications for special jurors. When it is remembered that in each parish the duty of designating the common and special jurors devolves upon the churchwardens and overseers, it can hardly excite surprise if complaints are made that in some places those competent to serve are omitted from the list, whilst in others the designation of "merchant" or "esquire" is given to jurors, who have not those special qualifications which it is desirable that special jurors should possess.

The defects of the present system appear to be particularly felt in Middlesex, where the duties of special jurors have recently, from various causes, been greatly increased. We allude particularly to the establishment of the Courts of Probate and Divorce; to the growing tendency (doubtless arising in great measure from the increased facilities of communication) of trying in London causes which arise in different parts of the country; and to the numerous cases in which special juries are now summoned to assess compensation for property taken for the purposes of public undertakings.

We think that the burden thus thrown upon special jurors might, without prejudice to the suitors, be materially lessened by altering and extending the qualification of special jurors, and that, on the other hand, the qualification of other jurors should be somewhat raised. If the constitution of common juries is improved, it is not improbable that the resort to a special jury will be less frequent.

In the metropolis a rateable value as low as 30*l.* qualifies a juror, and in the country 20*l.* In Wales the qualification is three fifths of that in England. Having regard to the changes which have taken place in the value of property since these amounts were fixed, we think that the value of the rated house which qualifies the householder should be raised to 50*l.* in parishes wholly or in part within any town containing, according to the census next preceding the preparation of the jury list, 20,000 inhabitants and upwards, and to 30*l.* in other places. We think that the qualification in Wales should be the same as in England. In other respects we think that the qualification of a juror should be as at present.

We are of opinion, that aliens having been resident in this country for 10 years, if possessed of the requisite qualification, should be liable to serve as jurors, and that alienage should not be ground of challenge. We further recommend that the right of an alien to claim a trial by a jury de medietate linguæ should be abolished.

Our attention has been called to the numerous grounds upon which persons qualified to serve as jurors are now entitled to exemption. We recommend that all exemptions on the ground of charter, prescription, or otherwise than by statute, should be abolished, and that the list of exemptions should be narrowed as far as possible, the exemptions being limited to persons whose avocations render them undesirable as jurors, or whose duties are of such a character, and would be so far interrupted by their serving on juries, as to occasion practical detriment to the public.

We think that the special jurors should consist of those at present qualified, and such as occupy a private dwelling house rated at 100*l.* in a town of 20,000 inhabitants and upwards, or elsewhere at 60*l.*, or who occupy premises other than a farm rated at 200*l.*, or a farm rated at 500*l.* By this extension of the qualification of special jurors, we think that their duties would be distributed over a much larger proportion of the whole body of jurors, without lessening that amount of intelligence, which the suitors naturally expect when they have resort to a special jury.

On the other hand, we are of opinion that persons qualified as special jurors should continue on the general panel as common jurors, both in civil and criminal cases, and should not be exempted from serving on common juries as at present is the practice. This practice of excluding special jurors from the list of common jurors is inconsistent with the present state of the law; and it is remarkable that it should have been continued, notwithstanding the pointed manner in which attention has more than once been called to the subject. The Common Law Commissioners appointed in 1850, in their second Report, after recommending that the qualification of jurymen in the country should be raised (a recommendation which has not hitherto been acted upon), stated "that on every trial there should be an admixture of jurymen of the class from which "the special juries are now taken. This is indeed now the law, though in practice the "names of persons qualified to be special jurors are not placed on the common jury "panel. There is every reason why jurors of the higher class should assist in the "administration of justice to the same extent as those who constitute the common "juries. We think the higher class of jurors should bring the assistance of their more "cultivated minds and superior intelligence to the decision of cases which, though they "may not admit of the additional expense attendant under the present system on "having a special jury, may not be the less important to the parties whose interests "are involved. At the same time it should be understood that we do not propose to "abolish the right, which now exists, of having a special jury as at present appointed. "What we recommend is, that the general jury panel should be made up indiscriminately "from all persons qualified to serve on either jury."

The same learned Commissioners in their third Report, issued after an interval of several years, said: "We think it right to avail ourselves of this opportunity to invite "renewed attention to our former observations respecting the constitution of Juries. "More especially we would urge the consideration of that part of our recommendations, "which relates to securing the attendance on common juries of the class of persons, "who now serve exclusively on special juries, with a view to the improvement of the "former by the admixture of persons of higher education and intelligence. We are "strongly persuaded that a very great improvement would by this means be effected "in the constitution of Juries; and as we do not propose to do away with the right "of parties to resort to a special jury, or to deprive special jurors when serving, as "such, of the additional remuneration which they are in the habit of receiving, we "can see no ground why the liability of such persons to serve on common juries, which "already exists in law, though it is not required in practice, should not be enforced."

In these views we entirely concur.

We now proceed to refer shortly to the preparation and revision of the jury lists. It is clear that the lists should be prepared with more care than at present. The recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Commons, in their Report of 1868, as to, on the one hand, paying the overseers their expenses, and on the other making them liable to a penalty for negligence, seem to us well worthy of consideration. The lists should state after the name of each person, who, in the judgment of the overseers, is qualified as a special juror, that he is so, and the nature of the qualification, and we recommend that no person, whose name is in the jury book as a juror, should be excused from attendance on the ground of any disqualification or exemption not claimed by him at or before the revision of the list, and we would suggest that a notice to this effect should be printed at the bottom of the list.

We think that the revision of the jury lists should be by the justices at petty sessions, as at present, and that the justices should certify that they have examined the list, and that the same is, to the best of their knowledge and belief, a true and proper list of the special and common jurors, and that the jury book should be made up as at present from the lists thus revised. The decision of those who revise the lists as to the qualification of a special juror should as respects that list be final.

With the view of lessening the inconveniences, which result from deaths and removals, we recommend that the overseers should be required at intervals of three months to send to the office of the under sheriff a list of all persons on the list who have died or left the district, and that it should be the duty of the under sheriff to amend the list accordingly.

In order to secure the impartial summoning of Juries, directions should be given to the sheriffs and summoning officers not to summon a second time any person who has been summoned as a juror, so long as there are a sufficient number of jurors, who have not been summoned since he was. The performance of this duty should be enforced by a penalty, but no failure in its performance should form a ground of challenge, or of excuse to a juror summoned and not attending.

We recommend that in London and Middlesex the special jurors should be taken from a panel in like manner as they now are at the assizes, but the present power to order a special jury on the old system should be retained.

It is further, we think, important that either party should in all cases have the right to exclude from the jury as many as six names, or by leave of the judge a greater number. This right to be exercised by delivering to the associate, immediately before the cause is called on, a list of the names objected to.

In cases where a full available special jury are not in attendance, a tales should not be demanded as of right, but should be allowed by leave of the judge or by consent. In case of the non-attendance of a full special jury, the judge should have power to direct the trial to proceed with not less than nine special jurors, or to direct additional jurors qualified to act as special jurors to be obtained from another panel or otherwise.

We think that all special jurors summoned, and not in attendance when called, should pay, as of course, unless excused, a fine of 10*l.*, and that such fine should not be remitted or reduced except for cause shown. We further think that the judge should have power to impose an additional fine, and to order such additional fine to be applied in or towards the payment of any costs occasioned by the non-attendance of the jurors.

In the event of the death, illness, or default of attendance of any jurors during any trial, civil or criminal, the judge should have power, if he thinks fit, to allow the trial to proceed, and the verdict of the remaining jurors should be a sufficient verdict.

The question of remuneration to jurors appears to us to be one of some difficulty. It would manifestly be impracticable to fix an amount, which would adequately compensate special jurors for their loss of time. On the other hand it is important that the remuneration to common jurors should not be sufficient to make them desirous of serving for the purpose of obtaining it. We think that in fixing the remuneration regard should be had to the service being one which it is the duty of the jurors to render, and which is in some measure analogous to other public duties which are necessarily performed gratuitously. We think that the remuneration should be by day, and not by the cause tried, and should be confined to jurors actually serving. If remuneration is given upon this principle, it will be necessary, in order to provide a fund for the purpose, to fix a Court fee to be paid by the suitors in each cause.

The practice of depriving the jury of fire should, in our opinion, be discontinued; and we think that the judge should have power to allow reasonable refreshment to be supplied to them.

It is desirable that the Supreme Court should be empowered by General Orders to make rules as to the number of jurors to be summoned, and the duration of their attendance, and generally as to the mode of summoning jurors.

Appeals.

We now come to the important subject of Appeals. It follows, from the principles of our preceding recommendations, that the system of appeal from all the Divisions of the Supreme Court exercising jurisdiction in the first instance ought to be made, as far as possible, simple and uniform.

At present, the Appeal from orders or decrees made by the Judges of First Instance, in the Court of Chancery, is either to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, or to the House of Lords, at the option of the appellant; there is also an appeal to the House of Lords from the Court of Appeal in Chancery. Appeals and Errors from the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer must in all cases go to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, from whence a further Appeal, or Error, as the case may be, lies to the House of Lords. From the Court of Probate Appeal also lies to the House of Lords. From the decrees and orders of the Judge Ordinary of the Divorce Court an appeal lies to the Full Court, consisting of the Judge Ordinary and two Common Law Judges; and also in certain cases from the Full Court, or from the Judge Ordinary exercising the powers of the Full Court, to the House of Lords. From the Court of Admiralty, the sole appeal is to your Majesty in Council, or, practically, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Upon the constitution of the House of Lords, considered as a Court of Appeal, we do not consider it to be within the scope of our Commission to offer any other remarks than that it unavoidably impairs the efficiency of the Court of Chancery during the session of Parliament, by withdrawing the Lord Chancellor for the whole of four days in every week from his own Court. Upon the constitution of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council we also abstain from saying more, than that it has been, for many years, found impossible to discharge the appellate duties of that body without withdrawing one or more Judges (often the Lords Justices or the Master of the Rolls, sometimes the Judge of Admiralty or Probate, or one of the Chiefs of the Courts of Common Law) from their respective Courts, to the great inconvenience of suitors, and delay of business in those Courts, during the considerable, and continually increasing, periods of time occupied in every year by the transaction of Privy Council business. Any arrangements, therefore, which may tend to relieve the House of Lords, or the Judicial Committee, from any appeals which now go there will so far add to the strength of the Supreme Court.

The Court of Appeal in Chancery, consisting of the Lord Chancellor and the Lords Justices, is in practice generally divided into two Courts, in one of which the Lord Chancellor presides alone, in the other the Lords Justices; and, during the Session of Parliament, the Lord Chancellor's Court is closed, as has been already stated, except for two days in the week. When the Lord Chancellor happens to be less conversant with equity business than the Lords Justices, his decision, sitting alone in appeal from a Court of Equity, cannot be so satisfactory to the suitors, as if he had the benefit of their assistance; and when the Lords Justices, as has sometimes happened, differ in opinion, the appeal to them necessarily fails, the judgment of the Court below is affirmed, and a further appeal to the House of Lords frequently results. Cases of more than usual importance are, indeed, sometimes reserved for hearing, or are directed to be reargued, before the Full Court of Appeal; but the pressure of business, and the engagements of the Lord Chancellor for so great a portion of the year in the House of Lords, confine within very narrow limits the time which can be allotted to sittings of the Full Court.

The Court of Exchequer Chamber is formed by a combination of all the Judges of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, under such arrangements, that errors and appeals from each of those Courts are determined by Judges taken from the other two. The inconveniences of this system are, in practice, very serious. All these Judges having, during nearly the whole year, pressing demands upon their time for other purposes, are only able to devote a very limited number of days after each term to the hearing of appeals and errors; and each of these periods requires to be broken up into three parts, and the constitution of the Court to be three times changed, in order to dispose of a portion of the appeals and errors from each of the Courts of First Instance. The effect generally is so far to reduce the number of Judges, who are able to attend in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, as, in case of any difference of opinion, to render it possible that the majority of opinions, in the Court of Appeal and the Court of First Instance taken together, may be overruled by the minority,—a result which, as the Judges of Appeal are not appointed or selected specially to act as such Judges, and the Judges who have been overruled to-day may to-morrow themselves sit in appeal from some decision of the Judges who have taken part in overruling them, is eminently unsatisfactory. The same causes also lead, in many cases, to great and unavoidable delays in the disposal of Common Law errors and appeals.

The constitution of the Full Court of Divorce, by the addition of two Judges of the Common Law Courts, withdrawn pro hâc vice from their other duties, and associated with the Judge Ordinary, is liable to some of the same objections.

The conditions on which Appeals or Errors can be brought from the different Courts are also widely different.

To the Court of Appeal in Chancery and to the House of Lords from the Court of Chancery, an appeal lies from all Orders and Decrees, whether interlocutory or final, of the Courts below, and upon all questions, whether of fact or of law; except that the verdict of a Jury, or of a Judge exercising the functions of a Jury, can only be impugned by a motion for new trial. The jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, or of the Master of the Rolls or a Vice-Chancellor to rehear his own decree, a practice which is also allowed, may be excluded by a formal procedure called Enrolment, which takes place at the instance of any party, practically at any time within five years from the date of the decree or order enrolled, if nothing has been done in the meantime by the suitor with a view to bring the matter before the Court of Appeal. After this no error in the decree or order enrolled, except mere clerical mistakes, can be corrected by the Court of First Jurisdiction, or by the Court of Appeal in Chancery, without a new suit for that purpose, called a Bill of Review. The same formality, which shuts the door of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, opens to the dissatisfied suitor that of the House of Lords, which does not receive appeals from decrees or orders of the Court until after they have been enrolled. Both the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the House of Lords, proceed upon the same record and evidence, which were before the Court from which the appeal is brought; and the Court of Appeal in Chancery, both in what are technically called Rehearings of decrees and decretal orders, and upon appeal petitions or motions, has all the powers possessed by the Court of First Instance, and can therefore allow amendments of the record, and in some cases may receive new or further evidence; which is contrary to the practice of the House of Lords.

From the Courts of Common Law to the Exchequer Chamber, Error lies in certain cases, and Appeal in others. Error is brought, as of right, on matter of law apparent on the record, on judgments on demurrers, on bills of exceptions for the improper reception or rejection of evidence, or for misdirection by the Judge at the trial, on special cases, on judgments non obstante veredicto, and for arrest of judgment. Appeal lies, as of right, from decisions upon points of law reserved at a trial. It also lies, but not without leave of the Court, unless the Judges differ, on motions for new trial on the ground of improper reception or rejection of evidence, or of misdirection by the Judge. No judgment, rule, or order is appealable which does not fall within one or other of these classes of cases. From all judgments of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, a further Appeal or Error, as the case may be, lies to the House of Lords.

Among the inconveniences of this system are the following:—Error cannot be brought from any interlocutory judgment, e.g., a judgment allowing a demurrer, before the final determination of all issues of law and of fact joined upon the record. The point of law decided on the demurrer may be sufficient, if the judgment stands, to determine the whole controversy between the parties; yet if, as is commonly the case, issues of fact, as well as law, have been joined in the pleadings, it is necessary to go through the expense and delay of trying all those issues, though according to the judgment on the demurrer they are wholly immaterial, in order to get into the Court of Error. As to Bills of Exceptions, the rule is that they must be tendered at the time of trial, and before verdict given, excluding all opportunity for deliberate consideration, and giving occasion to difficulties as to the proper mode of stating the terms, or substance and effect, of the Judge's ruling; no bill of exceptions being admissible unless signed by the Judge, and no proof of his ruling, extrinsic to the bill of exceptions itself, (i.e., by shorthand note or otherwise,) being allowed. The practice has been to hand in a hasty and imperfect note at the trial, leaving the bill of exceptions itself to be afterwards agreed upon by the parties, or settled by the Judge. In some cases it is found difficult, in others impossible, to come to any agreement or settlement, and, whenever any difference arises, it leads to great delay and expense. The cases are so few in which the points of law really intended to be raised can be satisfactorily taken by this form of proceeding that it is of little use. The convenient mode, and that generally adopted, of raising those points, except when the parties agree to have a special case stated, a practice attended with its own inconveniences, is either by reserving them at the trial, which depends on the leave of the Judge, and the consent of the parties, or by motion for a new trial. The power of appeal when the latter mode is adopted, if the Court gives a unanimous judgment, is not of right, but depends upon the will and discretion of the Court.

When Appeal is brought, the Court of Exchequer Chamber does not proceed simply upon the materials which were before the Court below, but a Case must be made up between the parties, which must be settled by the Judge if the parties differ; and, as such difference often happens, this is apt to lead to considerable expense and delay.

Appeals lie to the House of Lords, as of right, from all final Orders or Decrees of the Court of Probate, whether depending on questions of law or of fact only, and from all interlocutory decrees or orders of that Court, by the leave of the Court, but not otherwise.

In the Divorce Court, every decision of the Judge Ordinary, whether on law or on fact, is subject to an appeal to the Full Court, whose decision is final, except in cases of dissolution of marriage, nullity of marriage, or declaration of legitimacy, in which excepted cases only an appeal lies from sentences and final judgments of the Divorce Court to the House of Lords.

In the Court of Admiralty, as in the Court of Probate, all final sentences are appealable as of right, and all interlocutory judgments are appealable by the leave of the Court only.

The rules as to the time for appealing, in the different Courts, are also different.

For appeals and rehearings in Chancery, a period of five years from the date of the decree or order appealed from is allowed, after which the leave of the Lord Chancellor or Lords Justices is necessary, and such leave may be given at any time, but will only be given if it shall "appear, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, to be just "and expedient."

For appeals to the House of Lords from the Court of Chancery, two years from the date of the enrolment of the order appealed from, and thenceforth until the end of a fortnight after the beginning of the next session of Parliament, are allowed; and when a final decree is appealed from, all prior interlocutory orders in the same cause, though enrolled for more than the prescribed period, may be included in the appeal.

At Common Law, six years from the date of final judgment are allowed for bringing error to the Exchequer Chamber, and a like period of six years for bringing error from the Exchequer Chamber to the House of Lords. In cases of appeal, as distinguished from error, in the Common Law Courts, notice of appeal must be given within four days after the decision appealed from, unless the time is enlarged. When such notice is given, as for want of the opportunity of full consideration it generally is, no time is limited within which the party must proceed to prosecute his appeal.

In the Probate Court application for leave to appeal from an interlocutory decree or order must be made within a month after the delivery of the decree or order, or within such enlarged time as the Court may direct; and it may be doubtful whether any time is limited for appealing from Final Decrees or Orders.

In the Divorce Court, the appeal from the Judge Ordinary to the Full Court must be filed within three months from the date of the decree appealed from; and that to the House of Lords, whether from the Full Court or from the Judge Ordinary, within one month.

Appeals from the Court of Admiralty must be founded either on notice given to the Registrar immediately after the delivery of the judgment, or upon a declaration, called a Protocol of Appeal, made before a notary and witnesses within fifteen days, and must be prosecuted by presenting a petition of appeal to your Majesty in Council within one year from the date of the sentence or decree appealed from.

As to security for the costs of appeal:—

In the Court of Chancery none is required beyond a deposit of 20*l.* with the Registrar, when the petition is for rehearing of a decree or decretal order. Upon interlocutory appeals no deposit is made. In the Courts of Common Law, every appellant (in an appeal technically so called) and every defendant in an action who brings error is required to give substantial bail to pay costs; but a plaintiff who is also plaintiff in error gives no security. In the Courts of Probate and Divorce no security for costs is taken, but the general orders of the House of Lords require all appellants to that tribunal to enter into their own recognizances, without sureties, for 400*l.* Appellants from the Court of Admiralty, if resident out of the jurisdiction of the Court, may be required to give bail in 300*l.*; if within the jurisdiction, they give no security.

In the Court of Chancery and the Probate Court an appeal does not operate as a stay of execution unless the Court, upon a special application, so directs. In the Divorce Court it does, practically, so operate. In the Courts of Common Law appeal or error operates always as a stay of execution as soon as security is given. In the Court of Admiralty an appeal is followed, as of course, by an inhibition, which has the same effect.

Court of Appeal.

For these various and discordant systems of appeal we recommend the substitution of the scheme embodied in the following suggestions:

First, we propose that in the place of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, both which Courts, as now constituted, would cease to exist, there should be established, as a part of the Supreme Court, a Court of Appeal, consisting of— Constitution of Court

The Lord Chancellor,
The Lords Justices,
The Master of the Rolls, and Three other permanent Judges, with Three of the Judges of the Supreme Court to be nominated annually by the Crown; an additional Vice-Chancellor being substituted, as a Judge of First Instance, for the Master of the Rolls. The Court of Appeal thus constituted should be empowered to sit either as a Full Court, or in Divisions, but the number of Judges sitting together in any Division ought never to be less than three. The Judges of the Court, other than the nominated Judges, should always form a majority of the Court.

We propose further, that to this Court an appeal should lie from all judgments, decrees, rules, and orders, in suits or proceedings not strictly criminal, of any division or Judge of the Supreme Court, with certain exceptions which we shall afterwards specify. It may hereafter deserve consideration, after experience of the working of the Court thus constituted, whether its decisions may not be made final, unless leave to appeal from them be given, either by the Court itself, or by the House of Lords. In the meantime, we recommend that there should be a right of appeal to the House of Lords.

A direct appeal to the House of Lords, without going through the Court of Appeal, might, we think, be allowed in all cases in which an appeal on matter of law would lie to the Court of Appeal, if the respondent consents to that course being taken, but not otherwise.

The limitations or exceptions to which we think the right of appeal ought to be subject are the following: Judgments, Decrees, or Orders founded upon and applying the verdict of a jury, or the verdict of a Judge discharging the functions of a jury ought not to be appealable, except upon matter of law. Interlocutory orders, if made by any division of the Supreme Court, consisting of three or more Judges, should not be appealable, except in case of difference of opinion among the Judges, or by special leave of the Court; and, if made by any Division or Judge with respect to any question of procedure or practice, as to which the Court or Judge had power to make the order, should be appealable only under such regulations as may be made by General Orders. As a general rule, no appeal should be allowed as to costs only.

The time for appealing from interlocutory orders made in the progress of a suit, before the final decision upon the merits between the parties, ought to be regulated by General Orders. In all other cases a fixed period, not exceeding six months from the time when any judgment, decree, rule, or order is made or entered upon the record, should, we think, be allowed for appealing against it. These rules, as to the time for appealing, should apply both to appeals to the Court of Appeal, and to appeals to the House of Lords; and the office of the Clerk of the Parliaments ought to be open for the reception of appeals at all times of the year, whether Parliament be or be not sitting.

All proceedings in error and bills of exceptions should be abolished; and every appeal to the Court of Appeal should be brought by notice of motion, by way of appeal, in a summary way, without any petition or formal procedure. No enrolment of any judgment, decree, rule, or order should be necessary in order to enable any party to appeal therefrom to the House of Lords; and every appeal to the House of Lords should be brought by a petition in a short form, stating the title of the cause or matter, with the names of the parties thereto, and the date of the order appealed from, and when the same was made or entered on the record; and also, who are the respondents to the appeal, and whether a general reversal, or a variation in any and what particulars, of the order appealed from is sought, but without setting out at length any of the proceedings.

The right of appeal should, we think, as a general rule, be conditional on substantial security being given by the appellant for the costs of the appeal. Inasmuch, however, as there may be cases to which this rule could not be applied without inconvenience or injustice, we think, that both the nature and the amount of such security, and the regulations according to which it may be required or dispensed with, are subjects which may properly be dealt with by General Orders of the Court.

No appeal should operate as a stay of execution, or of proceedings under the order appealed from, unless the Court, or a Judge of the Court, from which the appeal is brought, or the Court of Appeal, shall so order. But such stay of execution should be granted, as of course, when the order under appeal is for a money payment, on the terms of payment of the money into Court, or of security being given to the satisfaction of the Court.

With respect to the hearing of appeals, we would propose, that the following Rules should be established and made applicable both to the Court of Appeal and to the House of Lords.

Every appeal should be deemed to be in the nature of a rehearing, and the Court of Appeal should have power, if the justice of the case shall appear so to require, to allow any pleading or any special case to be amended, or any supplemental pleading or statement to be added to the record; or, upon any question of fact, to admit further evidence. Upon appeals and motions for new trial, proof of a Judge's ruling by a shorthand writer's notes ought, in our opinion, to be received. Upon the hearing of the appeal the Court should have jurisdiction over the whole record, and no interlocutory order, from which there has been no appeal, should operate so as to bar or prejudice a decision upon the merits.

The Court should also have power, upon the hearing of any appeal, to vary or alter the order under appeal in favour of the respondent, in any manner which may appear proper to do complete justice between the parties, as if the respondent had presented a cross appeal, complaining of any part of the order by which he may deem himself to have been aggrieved.

If these recommendations are adopted, we think that there should be no rehearing of any cause or matter before the Court by which it was originally heard, except by leave of the Court, nor, unless by consent of all parties, after the expiration of the time limited for appealing; and that Bills of Review for error apparent on the record should be abolished. Nothing, however, in these rules should take away or abridge the power of the Court to rectify any error which may have occurred in drawing up any judgment, decree, rule, or order.

We shall proceed, with due diligence, to consider the other matters embraced in Your Majesty's Commission; and we humbly submit to Your Majesty's gracious consideration this our First Report.

* Agreeing with the general spirit and with most of the recommendations of the Report, I have subscribed it.

There are two subjects on which I desire to guard the expression of my opinion:

(1.) I think it is not expedient to destroy the special jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty. That Court has always administered in peace and war maritime international law. To no other Court has the Crown ever granted a commission of prize; and even before the issue of such commission, it has, in the opinion of Lord Stowell, an inherent jurisdiction in these matters. I may observe that the forms of pleading now in use in the High Court of Admiralty are as nearly as possible those which this Report recommends to be generally adopted by all Courts.

(2.) I think that the want of power in the Commission to consider the composition of the Final Court of Appeal has been unfortunate, because it has practically excluded from our consideration—

(a.) Whether it be expedient that two Final Courts of Appeal, namely, the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, should still continue :

(b.) Whether, if so, the composition of either or both should remain unaltered.

Yet the consideration of both these questions ought, in my judgment, to have preceded, and would perhaps have considerably modified the suggestions for the intermediate Court of Appeal made in this report. I think it also very doubtful whether that Appellate Court should be composed for the most part of Judges exercising appellate jurisdiction only.

ROBERT J. PHILLIMORE.

† CIRCUITS: I cannot concur in this recommendation to its full extent.

G. BRAMWELL.

‡ We are not able to concur in the recommendation that several counties should be consolidated for assize purposes to the extent indicated in the Report. Our general view is, either that the present system of holding assizes, which is based on the existing divisions of counties, and which brings justice reasonably near to the homes of suitors, witnesses, and jurymen, should, with some modifications, be retained ; or that the present system of Circuits should be altogether discontinued, and Provincial Courts established with assigned districts, having Judges who should go frequent circuits to convenient places within such districts; and with appeal from the Provincial Courts in certain cases to the Metropolitan Courts of Appeal.

MONTAGUE SMITH.
JOHN DUKE COLERIDGE.

§ I desire to record my opinion, that the following questions should be further considered :—

Whether all proceedings should not be commenced and prosecuted in the County Courts, unless it appears from the nature of the case that it is proper to remove it into the Supreme Court.

Whether it is desirable to allow such facilities for appealing, and repetition of appeals.

Whether, having regard to the unequal means of litigants, the changes proposed might not render it desirable to establish a new system of legal remuneration, and to limit the claims of suitors against each other for costs.

Whether it might not be desirable to substitute for the discretion of the Judges in respect of costs certain rules of positive application.

Whether the qualification of jurymen should not rather be lowered than increased.

Whether sufficient consideration has been given to the other elements in the administration of the law beyond that of excellence of judicial decision, namely, the time of the suit, the expense to the suitor, and the influence of the administration of justice on the social and political condition of the people.

Whether the House of Lords, if it is to continue a Court of Appeal, might not be rendered efficient for the purpose by legal peerages conferred on Judges of a certain standing, so as to make the Bench independent of the pleasure of the Crown, and by constituting a permanent Committee of such Peers, on the principle of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

COMMISSION.

VICTORIA, by the grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith:—To our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor DUNCAN, BARON COLONSAY; our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor JOHN INGLIS, Lord Justice-General, and President of the Court of Session in Scotland; our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor Sir WILLIAM PAGE WOOD, Knight, a Judge of the Court of Appeal in Chancery; our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor GEORGE PATTON, Lord Justice-Clerk; our trusty and well-beloved Sir JAMES SHAW WILLES, Knight, one of the Justices of the Court of Common Pleas; our trusty and well-beloved EDWARD FREDERICK MAITLAND, Esquire, one of the Senators of our College of Justice in Scotland; our trusty and well-beloved EDWARD STRATHEARN GORDON, Esquire, our Advocate in Scotland; our trusty and well-beloved Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE, Baronet; our trusty and well-beloved Sir ROUNDELL PALMER, Knight, one of our Counsel learned in the Law; our trusty and well-beloved JAMES MONCREIFF, Esquire, one of our Counsel learned in the Law, Dean of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland; our trusty and well-beloved GEORGE SCLATER BOOTH, Esquire, one of the Secretaries of our Treasury; our trusty and well-beloved ANDREW RUTHERFURD CLARK, Esquire, Sheriff of the County of Berwick; our trusty and well-beloved HUGH BARCLAY, Esquire, Sheriff-substitute of the County of Perth; our trusty and well-beloved JAMES CAMPBELL, Esquire, Sheriff-substitute of Edinburgh; our trusty and well-beloved WILLIAM SMYTHE, of Methven, Esquire, Convener of the County of Perth; our trusty and well-beloved ARCHIBALD ORR EWING, Esquire, Dean of Guild of Glasgow; our trusty and well-beloved GEORGE HARRISON, Esquire, Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, Edinburgh; our trusty and well-beloved JAMES ADAM, Esquire, Advocate; our trusty and well-beloved ALEXANDER BURNS SHAND, Esquire, Advocate; our trusty and well-beloved THOMAS GRAHAM MURRAY, Esquire, Writer to our Signet; our trusty and well-beloved CHARLES MORTON, Esquire, Writer to our Signet; our trusty and well-beloved JAMES WEBSTER, Esquire, Solicitor before the Supreme Courts; our trusty and well-beloved JOHN BOYD BAXTER, Esquire, President of the Council of Procurators in Scotland; and our trusty and well-beloved ADAM PATERSON, Esquire, Writer in Glasgow, greeting:—WHEREAS, We did, by letters-patent, dated second day of October 1868, made and passed under the Seal appointed by the Treaty of Union to be kept and made use of in place of the Great Seal of Scotland, appoint you, the said Duncan, Baron Colonsay, John Inglis, George Patton, Sir Roundell Palmer, Edward Strathearn Gordon, Edward

Frederick Maitland, James Moncreiff, George Sclater Booth, Andrew Rutherfurd Clark, Hugh Barclay, William Smythe of Methven, Archibald Orr Ewing, George Harrison, Thomas Graham Murray, Charles Morton, James Webster, John Boyd Baxter, and Adam Paterson, together with our right trusty and well-beloved Councillor RICHARD BARON WESTBURY, to be our Commissioners to inquire into the Constitution and Jurisdiction of the various Courts for the Administration of Justice—Civil and Criminal—in Scotland; to wit, the Court of Session, the Court of Justiciary, the Commission for Plantation of Kirks and Valuation of Teinds, the Sheriff Courts, Commissary Courts, Burgh Courts, Dean of Guild Courts, Baron and Regality Courts, Police Courts, and Justice of Peace Courts; and also to inquire into the forms of Writs and Pleadings, and the Rules of Procedure, and the Privileges of Agents in the said several Courts; and also to inquire into the system of Review of, and Appeal from, the Decrees, Interlocutors, and Orders issued by these Courts respectively:

Now, know ye that We have revoked and determined, and do by these presents revoke and determine, the said Commission, bearing date the second day of October 1868, and every matter and thing therein contained:

And We, reposing great trust and confidence in your zeal, ability, and discretion, have authorized and appointed, and do by these presents authorize and appoint you, the said Duncan, Baron Colonsay, John Inglis, Sir William Page Wood, George Patton, Sir James Shaw Willes, Edward Frederick Maitland, Edward Strathearn Gordon, Sir Edward Colebrooke, Sir Roundell Palmer, James Moncreiff, George Sclater Booth, Andrew Rutherfurd Clark, Hugh Barclay, James Campbell, William Smythe of Methven, Archibald Orr Ewing, George Harrison, James Adam, Alexander Burns Shand, Thomas Graham Murray, Charles Morton, James Webster, John Boyd Baxter, and Adam Paterson, or any six or more of you, to make diligent and full inquiry into the constitution and jurisdiction of the said several Courts, and into the forms of writs and pleadings, and the rules of procedure, and the privileges of Agents, at present in use and force in the said several Courts, and into the operation and effect of the existing laws and arrangements for distributing and transacting the judicial business of the said Courts respectively, as well in Court as in the various Offices of the Clerks of the said Courts, and other Offices connected with the said several Courts, and into the duties and emoluments of all Officers acting under us before said Courts, and into the system of review of, and appeal from, the Decrees, Interlocutors, and Orders issued by the said Courts respectively, with a view to ascertaining whether any, and what changes and improvements, either by altering the constitution or jurisdiction of, or the forms of writs and pleadings, and procedure, and privileges of Agents in the said Courts, or any of them, or otherwise, may be advantageously made, so as to provide for the more speedy, economical, and satisfactory despatch of the judicial business now transacted by the said Courts: And for the better discovery of the truth in the premises, WE DO, by these presents, GIVE and GRANT to you, or any six or more of you, full power and authority to call before you, or any six or more of you, such Judges and so many of the Officers and Clerks of our said Courts, and all such other persons as you shall judge necessary, by whom you may be informed of the truth in the premises, and to inquire of the premises by all other lawful ways and means whatsoever: AND WE DO HEREBY GIVE and GRANT unto you, or any six or more of you, full power and authority to cause all or any of the Officers and Clerks of any of our said Courts to bring and produce before you, or any six or more of you, all records, orders, books, papers, or other writings belonging to any of our said Courts, or in the custody of any of the Officers within the same: AND our further will and pleasure is, that as soon as the same can conveniently be done (using all diligence), you certify unto us, under the hands and seals of you, or any six or more of you, what you shall have done in the premises: AND We further will and command that this, our Commission, shall continue in full force and virtue, and that you our said Commissioners, or any six or more of you, shall and may from time to time proceed in the execution thereof, and of every matter and thing therein contained, although the same be not continued from time to time by adjournment: And for your assistance in the due execution of this our Commission, we have made choice of our trusty and well-beloved Norman Macpherson, Advocate, Professor of Scots Law in the University of Edinburgh, to be Secretary to this our Commission, and to attend you, whose service and assistance we require you to use from time to time, as occasion may require. IN WITNESS whereof, we have ordered the Seal, appointed by the Treaty of Union to be kept and made use of in place of the Great Seal of Scotland, to be appended hereto. GIVEN at our Court at Saint James's, the nineteenth day of November, in the year One thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, and in the Thirty-second year of our reign.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

HENRY GLASSFORD BELL, Esq., LL.D., Advocate, examined.

Henry Glassford Bell, LL.D.

1. The Chairman.—You are the Sheriff of Lanarkshire?—I am.

2. How long have you been so?—For nearly two years.

3. Before that you were one of the Sheriff-substitutes at Glasgow?—Yes, for twenty-six years. I was the senior Sheriff-substitute from 1839 till two years ago.

4. Will you explain to the Commissioners the nature of your duties as Sheriff of Lanarkshire, first in regard to your judicial functions in civil causes?—The duties are very extensive and very multifarious. They are substantially the same in kind as the duties of all the other Sheriffs of Scotland; but in degree they exceed very considerably, I believe, those of any other Sheriff. Of course I need not explain to the Commission the general character of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts of Scotland. I may mention, however, that in Glasgow the Sheriff and the four resident Sheriff-substitutes hold eleven courts every week, which comprise four ordinary courts—viz. the courts held by the respective Sheriff-substitutes, each of whom holds what we call an ordinary court; three appeal courts, which are held by myself, two being appeal courts from judgments pronounced by Sheriff-substitutes of the Lower Ward in Glasgow, and one being an appeal court from judgments pronounced by the Sheriff-substitutes of the Middle and Upper Wards. There are also held weekly one Debts Recovery Court; and weekly all the year round, without any intermission, three Small Debt Courts. Over and above these, we have numerous bankruptcy courts and criminal courts, both for summary trials and trials by jury. I may likewise mention that, in our ordinary courts, in the year from 1st October 1867 to 1st October 1868, 1292 cases (summonses and petitions) were tabled; and there were in addition 209 in which summonses were taken out, but not proceeded with. The decrees in absence were 346, and there were 737 litigated cases. In addition to these, for that year, which is the first year of the institution of the Debts Recovery Court, there were in that court 944 cases, the summonses in which concluded for about £30 on the average; these were sometimes to the full extent of £50 permitted by the Act, and a good many were below the average of £30. In consequence of the business thrown in by the Debts Recovery Court, there has been, in the course of last year, in Glasgow an increase of 860 cases in the sum-total of civil causes above £12. I am not speaking just now of the small debt jurisdiction at all. I may farther mention, that the Sheriff-substitutes, whose duty it is to take, in their own hands, notes of the whole evidence in all causes in which proof is allowed, had occasion to fix, during the course of last year, 1811 diets for taking proof, and they fixed 2142 diets for hearing debates.

5. Mr. Baxter.—Is that for the whole county?—No; in Glasgow alone. I wish to explain that while 1811 diets were fixed for taking proofs, some of these diets were continued, proofs not having been actually taken at all of them, so that there must be a deduction of 200 or 300 from the 1811 diets of proof. In the same way some of the 2142 diets for hearing debates were simply diets at which continuations took place. It is right also to explain that whilst it is enacted that the Sheriff-substitutes are to take 'a note of the evidence,' in point of fact they must take the full and complete evidence, because all these cases are subject to appeal both to the Sheriff and to the Court of Session; and it would be in vain to attempt merely to take such notes, or jottings, or memoranda of evidence as might be satisfactory to the Sheriff-substitute's own mind, but would not give a full and complete view of the evidence in the court of appeal. The duty of taking this evidence, which extends, I believe, to not fewer than 1800 or 2000 pages a year for each Sheriff-substitute, is a very laborious one. There have been also during the above year, in the two courts of appeal which I hold twice a week for the Lower Ward alone, 1246 appeals. Of course that includes many appeals upon incidental points, — not appeals from final judgments; but as there are three or four stages of a case at which an appeal may be made to the Sheriff, advantage is taken of that very frequently, and there are a great many appeals upon incidental points. In the courts for the Upper and Middle Wards, which I hold once a week, there were 224 appeals; so that, in all, the number of appeals brought before me last year in my appeal courts was 1470. I have made it a rule in these courts that I will not continue any case more than twice, except upon very special grounds, which must be expressly stated and recorded. I am glad to say that I have been able, though by very incessant labour certainly, to keep abreast of all the appeals; and that at the date when I made a statement of these figures in public court, on 1st October last, I had no case at avizandum. During the year there were 773 final judgments pronounced which admitted of advocation, or nearly all of which admitted of advocation; but caution, with a view to advocation, was found in only 24 of these, and advocation was actually proceeded with in a very few of the 24. By the recent Court of Session Act a change has been made as regards the necessity of finding caution for expenses in advocations, and an unsuccessful litigant may now go at once from the Sheriff Court, on a simple note of appeal, without finding any caution. I thought it very likely that this would very considerably increase the number of appeals to the Court of Session; but the change has only been in operation since October last, and we have not yet had time to ascertain exactly how it will affect the business. I was, however, informed recently by the Sheriff-clerk that there had not been a great many more appeals intimated than there used to be advocations. I am speaking of the ordinary civil business, involving questions in which sums of an unlimited amount may be at stake, and in the Sheriff Court at Glasgow our civil business is often of a high and important class. It is not unusual for the direct conclusions of an action to extend to thousands of pounds, and very frequently to hundreds; while there are other cases which involve indirectly patrimonial interests to a very large extent, and affect various important rights and interests. Then with regard to what is called our summary jurisdiction, we had last year 558 applications, in which deliverances were given in connection with sequestrations for rent, interdicts, lawburrows, and higher class ejections. There were, besides, 1739 applications for ejectment where the rent did not exceed £30, and the premises were let for less than a year. Entirely distinct from these, we had 550 applications under particular statutes, which statutes confer special and different kinds of jurisdiction upon the Sheriff. Of these 550, 108 were at the instance of Inspectors of the Poor, for orders for the removal to England and Ireland of paupers who had become burdensome in Scotland without having acquired a settlement. Four appeal courts were likewise held under the Glasgow Corporation Water Company's Act, in which several hundred appeals were disposed of. Under the Lunacy Statutes there have been 396 petitions for the commitment of persons of unsound mind to asylums. Under the Registration of Births, Deaths, and Marriages Act there were 129 warrants issued, authorizing the correction of entries and the registration of births neglected to be timeously reported. Under the 19 and 20 Vict. c. 96, there were 23 warrants permitting the registration, and thereby affording full legal evidence of the marriage of persons who had entered into irregular marriages. All these required very careful procedure. Forty-four warrants were granted to apprehend persons in meditatione fugæ, and some of these persons were brought up and examined. Daily attendance was given by a Sheriff-substitute, at a certain hour, to receive the personal applications of poor persons who were claiming parochial relief, but who had been refused by the Inspectors, and out of these applications orders for relief were given in numerous instances. Then we have a very important and serious jurisdiction under the Bankruptcy Acts, and I believe we do almost as much work in bankruptcy in Glasgow as in all the other bankruptcy courts in Scotland put together. We had, in the course of last year, 178 judicial sequestrations, a large number of appeals against trustees' deliverances and resolutions of creditors, and a good many competitions for the office of trustee. The Sheriff's judgment now, in matters of competition, is final; so that a trusteeship depends on his judgment where there is a competition. His judgments upon appeals from the deliverances of trustees, and resolutions of creditors, are subject to review; but I believe there have not been many appeals taken to the Court of Session from the local courts upon these matters. I may state that ever since jurisdiction in bankruptcy was extended to the Sheriff Courts, I have exclusively taken charge of the working of the Bankruptcy Acts, with the exception of the more formal duty of presiding at bankrupt examinations, which has been shared with the other Sheriffs; but all matters involving argument, or debate, or interpretation of the Acts, I have taken exclusively the charge of. I did so originally as Sheriff-substitute, with the consent and approbation of the late Sheriff, Sir Archibald Alison, and I have continued it since I became Sheriff, upon the footing that from the large experience which I have now acquired, and the knowledge that the agents in Glasgow have of the views I take, there is less chance of any discrepancy in the judgments under these important statutes. Then our Small Debt Court is a very remarkable court, but not more remarkable than perhaps the enormous population of Glasgow might lead one to expect. Last year there were disposed of in the Small Debt Court, 24,688 new cases, and 643 sists, making a total of 25,331, which is a very considerable increase over the preceding year, and that notwithstanding of the introduction of the Debts Recovery Act. The Small Debt Court in Glasgow is now exclusively conducted by the Sheriff-substitutes, who sit alternately in it; but it would be impossible for the four Sheriff-substitutes in Glasgow to overtake the whole of that and their other business, and therefore, for a good many years back, the Sheriff-substitute at Airdrie has had imposed on him the duty of taking a share of the Small Debt Court business in Glasgow, along with the Sheriff-substitutes there. Of course, when any points of nicety or difficulty arise, on which the Sheriff-substitutes who sit in the Small Debt Court may be disposed to take opposite views, they commonly think it right to consult with me, and we consider the whole matter, and come to such a view as makes the judgments in the Small Debt Court of Glasgow uniform. Then our criminal jurisdiction is very large and important. Last year, in the criminal department, there were 341 trials before the Sheriff and a jury, and 113 without a jury. Our summary criminal jurisdiction is not so large as in many other counties, because a great deal of it proceeds before the Justice of Peace Court of Glasgow, and I believe the Procurators-fiscal of Glasgow are very well pleased with that arrangement. The criminal trials, however, are very numerous, being for last year, as I have stated, 341 with a jury; and from persons accused of crimes last year there were 671 judicial declarations taken. There were also 154 investigations into cases of sudden death. That is a duty performed under the superintendence of the Sheriff in his capacity as coroner. There has been a good deal of writing lately in the newspapers about the introduction of the English system of coroners' inquests into Scotland; but some of these writers do not seem to be aware of the fact that a coroner's jurisdiction is exercised by the Sheriff, and very much in the same way as it is exercised in England, with this distinction, that in Scotland it is not conducted in open court; it is conducted judicially at the instance of the Procurator-fiscal under the warrant of the Sheriff. If a sudden death takes place, and there is anything suspicious about it, the Sheriff grants his warrant immediately for a medical inspection, and he also grants warrant to the Procurator-fiscal to cite such witnesses as seem to him proper to be examined, in order to investigate into the causes of the death. The precognition is submitted to the Sheriff, and if he is satisfied that there is any ground for making a charge against any one, he grants his warrant for the apprehension of that person; if, on the other hand, he is satisfied that there is no ground for proceeding further, and that the death has been purely accidental, no procedure is instituted. It appears to me that this system is probably fully more congenial to the feelings of the Scotch people than the English system; because, while now and then a case may occur where it is right that publicity should be given to the procedure, I think that in the great majority of cases, it would just harrow the feelings of innocent persons connected with the deceased, to bring the whole particulars of the sudden death prominently before the public. Then I have to say finally, that the Sheriffs in Scotland do the work of the revising barristers in England, and that we have had, more especially lately, very important duties to perform in the Registration Court in making up the roll of electors. We are also returning officers in elections, and we have the regulation and superintendence of all the arrangements for conducting, in a regular and proper manner, the elections of Members of Parliament. These are the principal duties that we have to attend to in Glasgow, and in a lesser degree they are the duties that all the Sheriffs in Scotland have to perform.

6. The Chairman.—Are the duties of the Sheriff-substitutes in Glasgow distributed among them upon any principle?—Yes; they are equalized as far as possible, both as regards civil and criminal business. We find it practically not quite possible to equalize it; but that is the theory on which we proceed.

7. Who makes the distribution?—It is made under the superintendence of the Sheriff, with the consent of the Sheriff-substitutes. I requested the then senior Sheriff-substitute (Mr. Strathern) to draw out a scheme for the proper allocation of the business to the Sheriff-substitutes; we consulted together about it, and it was approved of.

8. After what you have said, I need hardly ask whether your time is very fully occupied in Glasgow?—It is very fully occupied. I go to my work every day at ten o'clock, and I remain almost every day till five, and frequently till six; and at night I am very often obliged to work at home for three or four hours.

9. I presume you have as much to do as you can well accomplish?—Yes; and I think that unless a man had a good constitution he could not do it.

10. Does it appear to you that the number of substitutes you have in Glasgow is more than adequate to the discharge of the duties?—Certainly not.

11. They are fully occupied?—They are; and with a very little additional duty thrown into the Sheriff Court, the number would not be enough.

12. Does it occur to you that any additional duty should be thrown into the Sheriff Court?—Certain heads of subjects of inquiry were submitted to me, and one of these, I see, suggests the question whether there should be an extension of the jurisdiction given to the Sheriffs; but the first matter referred to in these heads or notes, is the constitution of the court as consisting of Sheriffs and Sheriff-substitutes. Of course, if no questions are asked of me on that subject I have nothing to say; but that was at the head of the list of subjects, and I thought it my duty to consider it.

13. What is the result of your consideration of it?—I should wish to be allowed to say, as even anterior to that question, that I think it will be incumbent upon this Commission to make up their minds as to what they should hold of the value and character of the Sheriff Courts generally,—whether they should be promoted, fostered, and strengthened, or whether they have already become too large in jurisdiction, and whether that should be diminished. If they come to be of opinion that they are courts of great utility, and that the country is very much disposed to support and foster these courts, then that view would materially influence the details of the evidence which may be given. I may be permitted to state that from all I have seen of the working of Sheriff Courts, I am of opinion that they are the most useful local courts, as far as I know, that exist in any country, and that they have a very strong hold on the feelings of the community. I mean generally; of course there may be defects in their constitution; but I think that generally that is the feeling in Scotland with reference to them. I should like also to state that there are, in my opinion, no termini habiles for making any comparison between the Sheriff Courts of Scotland and the County Courts of England. The jurisdiction of the County Court Judge is an altogether trifling and unimportant matter in comparison with the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and these courts dispose of matters infinitely inferior in importance to those disposed of by the Sheriff Courts in Scotland. Some years ago I had the pleasure of visiting an old acquaintance of mine who had been in very great local practice as a barrister, and who had afterwards accepted the office of County Court Judge at Preston, and he told me he was ashamed of his office—that it was not an office for an intellectual lawyer at all—and that he had next to nothing to do that was worth a lawyer's doing. I went with him to his court at Wigan, and it fully bore out his representation of the character of the business, for the cases were of the smallest class of our smallest small debt cases; and he told me he had little or nothing to do but decide such cases. I speak of a period ten years ago. Since then, the jurisdiction of the County Courts in England has been increased to a certain extent, and a certain amount of bankruptcy business has been thrown into them; but, as far as I understand, even now these courts can bear no comparison with the Sheriff Courts of Scotland. With regard to the question which your Lordship has put as to the constitution of our Sheriff Courts, a very considerable amount of agitation, I may say, has sprung up of late years on that subject, and I think there are three views entertained. There is a party who have made up their minds very decidedly that what they call the double Sheriffships are unnecessary, and should be abolished; that it is an unnecessary expense to get one gentleman of the same profession, of probably very much the same standing, to review the judgments of the resident Sheriff; and that it is not a court of appeal of sufficient strength to justify the appeal. That is one view which is very strongly entertained by a number of gentlemen. They think it leads to unnecessary delay and expense; and they think it results also in this, that not so good a lawyer as might be got, supposing there was only one Sheriff, is sent down to do the resident business, and that another lawyer, who is often not a superior lawyer, walks up and down the Parliament House in Edinburgh, and acts as the court of review to the resident judge. They think that in all courts of review, ex facie of their constitution, there should be a greater weight in the appellate jurisdiction than in the original one, and that this does not exist in the Sheriff Courts as presently constituted. I am merely stating that as one view which is entertained. After getting the heads of inquiry from the Commission, I submitted them to the Sheriff-substitutes in Glasgow, in whose judgment I have very great confidence, for they are all able men. I did not submit them to Mr. Galbraith, for he has at present got leave of absence on account of ill health, unfortunately, and his medical man said that he required total cessation from all labour, and therefore I did not consult him; but the senior Sheriff-substitute, Mr. Dickson, who has had large experience as a lawyer, says, in the memoranda with which he furnished me, 'Two axioms may be laid down with regard to courts of appeal, viz.—1*st*, That they should be, in a decided and marked manner, superior to the courts whose judgments they review; and 2*d*, That they should be so constituted as to secure uniform and authoritative expositions of the law. Neither of these objects, it is thought, is secured under the present system. Considering that frequently the Sheriff-principal is appointed on merely political considerations, with but little practical knowledge of law, it may well be doubted whether, on the average, the Sheriffs who sit on appeal are superior in legal attainments to the substitutes. In some cases, no doubt, they are; but among the accidents of political patronage, it must not unfrequently happen that the substitute is the better trained and more experienced lawyer of the two. Even where it is otherwise, the difference between them cannot be so great that, as a rule, the judgment of the principal is decidedly superior to that of the substitute. Again, a uniform and authoritative exposition of the law is impossible where the courts of review consist of twenty-four single judges, each deciding on his individual responsibility, in general with meagre argument, not unfrequently without any at all. It is no answer to this to say that the Sheriffs confer together in the Parliament House, and that their decisions are often a kind of exposition of the law as generally understood there among the body. Such a practice is useful, and modifies evils which otherwise would be intolerable under the present system. But it is a poor substitute for the deliberate and responsible decision of a properly constituted tribunal, the judges of which would hear the argument together, and decide after joint deliberation and conference.' Then he says: 'The result of the present system is, that among the many hundreds of decisions pronounced every year by the Sheriffs-principal on appeal, none are authoritative. The law is not expounded or explained by them, for the benefit of the profession and the public generally; and there is a vast expenditure of judicial labour in the repeated examination and decision of the same questions of law. It is sometimes said that, in a poor country like ours, there would not be sufficient inducement for men of ability to join the legal profession, and the administration of justice would therefore suffer, if the principal Sheriffships were abolished. This prospective and speculative advantage appears to me not to be a good reason for keeping up a number of ill-constituted courts of appeal, and that, too, at an unnecessarily great expense.' Then he suggests a somewhat middle course,—for I think there are three views entertained on this subject. The one view is that there should be one Sheriff, with a direct appeal from him to the Court of Session; another view is that there should be a new appellate jurisdiction constituted for the Sheriff Courts; and the third view is, that the present system is better than either of these. Now Mr. Dickson makes this suggestion: 'Apart from this, I think that the same end would be much better attained by constituting proper courts of appeal. These courts I think should hold an intermediate place between the courts of first instance and the Court of Session,—deciding finally on matters of fact, but subject to review on matters of law, except in small cases. Each should be constituted of three judges, the country being divided into about four districts. The judges should be well paid, and should give their whole time to their public duties. The effect of such a change would be to diminish considerably the work of the Supreme Court. I would therefore propose that two or three of the present Lords Ordinary should be detached from the Court of Session and made presidents of the several courts of appeal. The resident Sheriffs should be qualified to be appointed to the appellate courts, as well as to sit occasionally to make up a quorum; and the appellate Sheriffs should be qualified for appointments as Lords of Session. Such prospects of promotion would give the local Sheriffs such an inducement to cultivate superior attainments as they do not now possess; and it would help to secure good men for the office. A system of this nature works well in France.' On the same subject Sheriff Murray says: 'While, with regard to the country generally, the double Sheriffship is undoubtedly useless, and even hurtful, the peculiar circumstances of Glasgow render some sort of local review necessary. If the present rule of law, by which a Sheriff-substitute has only power to correct purely clerical errors in his judgments within a limited time, is to be maintained, then the double Sheriffship is, as regards Glasgow, almost a necessity; for, in the great press and rush of work, it is unavoidable but that every now and then there should occur some slip, either in point of form, or in some matter of detail, especially in questions of accounting, for which the best remedy is a rapid review on the spot. But if, as seems expedient, power were given to the Sheriff-substitute himself to correct within a limited time such minor matters, on his attention being called to them, and if, as I think ought also to be the case, the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute were final as regards matter of fact, the best local tribunal of review would be one composed of the various Sheriffs-substitute of the district sitting together to hear appeals.' I go a good deal further than this with reference to the case of Glasgow. It appears to me that Lanarkshire is a case per se. It has an enormous population, including Glasgow, and it has an amount of work which is altogether distinct from the work of Sheriff Courts in ordinary rural districts. Therefore, whatever view the Commission may take generally of the subject, I would rather be inclined to expect that it would be necessary to legislate in some separate way for Glasgow. It is quite true that a good deal of the appellate work done by Sheriffs is in correcting slight mistakes, and in putting right something that has intervened since the judgment was pronounced, and which, if the matter were brought before the Sheriff-substitute himself, he would do equally well with the appeal Sheriff; but, unfortunately, under the present system, the Sheriff-substitute has no power of doing anything, except correcting clerical errors. I do not wish to introduce the old form of reclaiming petitions; but I would strongly recommend that, after the Sheriff-substitute has pronounced an interlocutor, he should be entitled, on a motion made by either party, to authorize a rehearing, and to consider that particular interlocutor. That would save the necessity for a great many appeals to put right casual mistakes in a matter which had not been brought under the Sheriff's attention when he pronounced the particular interlocutor. There is undoubtedly a strong party who either wish the double Sheriffship abolished at once, and a good man sent down to do the whole work in the county, and, subject to his right to review himself occasionally, with a direct appeal from him to the Court of Session, or the intermediate system of an appellate court, stronger than a mere appeal from one lawyer to another,—an appellate jurisdiction, consisting perhaps partly of the Sheriffs, and occasionally also of the Sheriff-substitutes themselves. That may work in certain counties; but it would not do in Glasgow. It is utterly impossible to remove the Sheriff-substitutes from their duties as Sheriffs in the first instance, and make them sit also in a court of appeal; but there might be more Sheriffs, or the appeal court might be strengthened in some way if the present system were abolished. On the other hand, it is right to say that some parties do not see any such great objections to the present system as have occurred to other minds. In particular, I find that one of the Sheriff-substitutes of Glasgow, a lawyer of distinction, and author of a very excellent book on Mercantile Law, Mr. Clark, takes this view: 'I am of opinion that the existing constitution possesses advantages of a very important kind, and ought not to be changed for any other which would involve the abolition of the principal Sheriffship. I rest this opinion on the following considerations: 1. The office of Sheriff affords an admirable training for such as may afterwards be called to act as judges in the supreme courts. With the exception of the Sheriffs of Midlothian and Lanarkshire, all the Sheriffs in Scotland are practising advocates, and are thus inured to the discharge of the judicial function at the very time when they are in full practice at the bar. The advantages of this combined system of training, in fitting them for the supreme bench, are too obvious to require comment. 2. The system of the double Sheriffship is probably a means of securing greater judicial ability for the local judicatories than could be attained in any other way. Few men of high legal attainments would be got to accept the position of resident Sheriffs, except in large towns, unless their incomes were vastly increased; because not only would they be removed from the society in which they had been accustomed to move, but their families would have to be educated away from home at great expense. As it stands at present, men of the first position at the bar are ready to become principal Sheriffs for comparatively small emoluments, because that office does not injure, but rather improves their position as practising advocates. Now, though their substitutes may not be, and cannot be expected to be, men of the same standing as lawyers, the work is satisfactorily done under the direction and control of the principal Sheriffs. If you were to divide the existing emoluments of the latter among their substitutes, you would add but little to their incomes, and would fail to secure men for the office such as those who at present act as principal Sheriffs. 3. One great cause of proficiency in a judge is the amount and variety of practice in which he is engaged. Now, with the exception of Glasgow, and one, or perhaps two other localities, the local judicatories in Scotland do not present this variety or amount of practice; so that, if the local judges be originally deficient in experience, they are not likely to improve by the exercise of their function, and if originally men of high attainments, are apt to retrograde instead of improving. By the present practice, men of the highest standing are secured as Sheriffs for the remotest counties in Scotland. 4. The Sheriff-principal forms the connecting link between the central tribunals and the remotest judicatories in the kingdom. He imports the practice of the former in its latest and most improved form into the latter, and tends to arrest the growth of local customs, which, unless checked, are always ready to develope themselves. In this way he does for Scotland very much what the Assizes do for England. Stephen's Com. on the Laws of England, vol. iii. pp. 620–21. These are considerations which apply to Scotland generally, but the case of Glasgow is in many respects exceptional; and there seem to be special reasons why the principal Sheriffship should, at all events, be retained in Lanarkshire. There are four substitutes by whom the business of Glasgow is carried on, a fifth from Airdrie assists in the Small Debt Court. The amount of business done in this large centre of trade is enormous; yet there have been greatly fewer advocations from Lanarkshire than from any other county in Scotland, proportionally to the population; and it may therefore be inferred that the public have been satisfied with the local courts. Now one great cause of this is, that the substitutes work under the Sheriff in a uniform manner, which it is probable they would not do if their decisions, instead of being, in the first instance, reviewed by him, were to be taken direct to the supreme court. Again, there are always little inaccuracies in matters of form, and even mistakes in substance, which will creep into interlocutors, be the judge ever so able and careful, and yet which, though trifling in themselves, must be corrected somehow. These, according to the present practice, are set right by an appeal to the Sheriff, which seldom involves the delay of many days, sometimes of only a few hours. Much time and expense are thus saved. Alter the system, and such corrections would have to be made by the Supreme Court, after an amount of expense and delay which, however much the forms may be simplified, must always be considerable. The Sheriff is resident in Glasgow, and therefore it may be said that he has not the advantages to be derived from being an advocate in actual practice. But any one who is acquainted with the amount and variety of the work which he accomplishes will see that, in this respect, he is more advantageously placed than men who enjoy the largest practice in the Supreme Court.' That is the view of Sheriff Clark; and these are substantially the heads of the separate views on this question of the constitution of the Sheriff Courts.

14. Would you give us your own opinion on the subject?—Well I really have not had an opportunity of judging how the matter stands in the several counties. I have not been acquainted with them practically; and I think, whatever legislation may be adopted, Glasgow will require to be treated differently from the rest of Scotland. Whatever changes may be introduced elsewhere, and whatever changes may be introduced with reference to Lanarkshire, they would require to proceed upon a different system. I think that in so far as Lanarkshire is concerned, the system of having the Sheriff to review has hitherto worked satisfactorily. At the same time I quite feel the weight of the argument, that the judgment by the reviewing Sheriff may not be a whit more entitled to public estimation than the judgment by the Sheriff-substitute; and therefore there is a weakness in the court of appeal. All that I can say is, that substantially that weakness has not been much felt, because in most cases, where the Sheriff acts judiciously, if he is satisfied with the soundness of the substitute's judgment, he adheres to it, and the public seem satisfied with the two judgments together. Where there is an alteration, which is greatly the exception, the public have the right of appealing to the Supreme Court.

15. The Lord Justice-General.—The appeal to the Sheriff from the Sheriff-substitute is a very cheap process of review, is it not?—Very cheap, and in Glasgow very speedy.

16. Can you state the cost of it?—The expense is merely some trifling clerks' fees, and the expense of attending the debate.

17. What is the amount of the court fees?—They must be very trifling. They do not amount to 10s.

18. The Lord Advocate.—Are they not only 1s.?—I am talking of all the fees—fees of noting the judgment, and extracting it afterwards.

19. But does lodging the appeal cost more than about 1s.?—I am not very well versed in the subject of the clerks' fees; but the fee for the debate varies from two to three guineas.

20. The Dean of Faculty.—For an oral debate?—Yes. It is in the option of the party appealing not to ask for an oral debate, but to put in a reclaiming petition; and if he does so, it is usual to order it to be answered, and then the fee will be the fee for the reclaiming petition and answers, which will be about the same as the fee for the debate.

21. Mr. Campbell.—But the reclaiming petition is quite exceptional?—Yes.

22. Mr. Webster.—That is in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow?—Yes. I believe it is not exceptional in other courts; and where the agent wishes to save himself the trouble of coming to Edinburgh to debate orally, he puts in a reclaiming petition; but I cannot speak as to that from personal knowledge.

23. Mr. Clark.—The appellant has a right to appeal without asking to be heard, or putting in a reclaiming petition?—Yes.

24. Does that occur very frequently in Glasgow?—No; but this perhaps raises the question of whether, under the present forms of procedure, the appeals are too numerous from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff. I think a very great improvement might be introduced upon that. The existing Sheriff Court Act considerably diminished the number of appeals that were competent, but still it allows four or five appeals before a final judgment. Now, I think, in the first place, it would be an improvement—and I would have perfect confidence in the Sheriff-substitute in regard to that matter—if, until a final judgment, all appeals taken on interlocutory deliverances should be taken with consent of the Sheriff-substitute. There are many cases where the parties are merely fighting for delay, and they state preliminary pleas which are plainly unfounded, on purpose that when they are repelled they may appeal them, and thus create delay. They know they are unfounded; but they invariably appeal against the repelling of these pleas. Now I would leave it very much to the Sheriff-substitute to say whether he would allow the appeal in that case. In the same way they are entitled to appeal in a case where the Sheriff-substitute allows a proof. They are quite aware that a proof is necessary; but they are fighting for delay, and they appeal against the Sheriff-substitute allowing the proof. That also I would leave with the Sheriff-substitute. Every resident Sheriff-substitute, if he saw that there was any nicety in the question, would allow the appeal; but if it was luce clarius that the party was merely fighting for delay, he would not allow the appeal. Then there are appeals competent against all judgments pronounced in the course of the proof. In the same way I think the Sheriff-substitute should be allowed to say whether he would allow these appeals or not. I believe some people go further, and say that you might disallow all appeals, except from the final judgment, when the appeal would take up the whole case. I would have some hesitation in going that length, because a really well-founded preliminary plea might be repelled, and then there might be a long and voluminous proof, and a final judgment given on the proof, and if, when it came up to the court of appeal it was held that the preliminary plea was good,—that the case was radically bad ab initio, and that the whole subsequent labour had been thrown away, I think it would be a little dangerous to check an appeal there; but I think it would be quite sufficient to allow the Sheriff-substitute to judge of the importance or nicety of the point, and permit an appeal if he thought proper.

25. But whether the appeal be on a preliminary matter, or on the final judgment, the appellant has practically the right to decide whether the judgment shall be reviewed with or without a re-hearing?—He may simply appeal; and then the system in Glasgow invariably is to send the case to the appeal debate roll.

26. But if he appeals, and says that he neither wants to put in a reclaiming petition nor to debate orally, the Sheriff may dispose of the case without hearing parties?—Yes; but I think that almost never occurs in Glasgow, because they almost invariably add that they crave to be heard orally. If they did not crave to be heard orally, or put in a reclaiming petition, I would glance at the case to see the character of the appeal, and if I thought it involved matter of nicety, I would, proprio motu, send it to the appeal debate roll.

27. But practically the Sheriff may dispose of a case and alter a judgment without the successful party before the Sheriff-substitute having the power of being heard?—I am not at this moment quite sure about that. It depends on the construction of one of the clauses of the Sheriff Court Act whether the Sheriff is bound to give them an opportunity of being heard or not. Certainly I would never alter a judgment appealed against without hearing the parties.

28. Mr. Campbell.—Has it ever occurred in your practice that considerable awkwardness arises from the fact that the Sheriff-substitute has not the power of opening up the record?—That is one matter that I was going to mention. I think there is a great anomaly in that. There is a clause in the Act which says that the Sheriff-depute, at any time when the cause is before him on appeal, may open the record and allow amendments or additions. Cases are occurring every fortnight in Glasgow where the Sheriff-substitute says, 'I consider this summons, as it stands, irrelevant; and if I had power to open up the record and allow an amendment, I would do so, and then sustain the case.' But he has no such power, and must dismiss the action. The case then comes up on appeal to the Sheriff, and he at once proceeds to exercise the power which he has. He opens up the record, allows the amendment, and sends the case back to the Sheriff-substitute. In other words, he does the very thing which the Sheriff-substitute wished to do. Now, why that power should be limited to the Sheriff, and not given to the Sheriff-substitute, I cannot see. Of course, if the Sheriff-substitute went wrong, what he did would be subject to appeal; but his judgment would be acquiesced in in nine cases out of ten.

29. The Dean of Faculty.—You have said you think the system a very good one by which, except in the case of Glasgow and Edinburgh, the Sheriff must be a practising advocate. Can you tell me the foundation of the rule, and the reason for it?—I don't know, as a matter of certainty, either the foundation of the rule, or the reason for it.

30. Was there not a statute upon the subject?—I believe so.

31. Can you tell me the principle upon which that enactment proceeded?—I have no doubt it proceeded on this, that it was necessary to limit the choice of Sheriffs to men who had got a good legal education, and belonged to the highest branch of the profession.

32. Would there not be an inconvenience under the present system if the Sheriff-principal were to desert the Parliament House, and go and reside in his county?—I don't exactly understand what may be meant by inconvenience. He would cease to practise in the Parliament House, and he would transfer his practice to the Sheriffship in which he resided.

33. Are you not aware that it was found that in some instances the Sheriff lost his law, became a country gentleman, mixed up with the politics and local associations of the county, and that that was one reason for the passing of the statute?—I have no knowledge of that.

34. Don't you think that might possibly be the result?—If the Sheriffship was devoid of all legal business, that might possibly follow.

35. The Lord Justice-General.—But you cannot realize that view?—I have had no experience of it.

36. The Dean of Faculty.—Are there not many counties in Scotland where a resident Sheriff might possibly fall into that state?—I have heard certain resident Sheriffs say, when they heard me complaining of the amount of business I had to perform, that they had a much more tedious and irksome duty to discharge in waiting for business which never came.

37. What I meant to put to you was this: Is there not a distinct advantage in having as Sheriff a man who is constantly on the boards of the Parliament House?—There must be certain advantages derived from that. Whether the advantages are equal to the disadvantages in connection with the system of double Sheriffships in these counties, I cannot pretend to say.

38. In one of the papers you read, it seemed to be assumed that the Sheriff-substitute was generally a more experienced man than the principal under the present system?—Often as experienced a man.

39. Does your experience suggest that that is so?—Well, comparisons are rather disagreeable, and I don't like to make them. I think I could mention certain instances where, upon the whole, I would have greater confidence in the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute than of the Sheriff, and a good many instances where it is vice versa.

40. But, as a general rule, have the Sheriff-substitutes been taken from men in large practice at the bar?—In a good many instances they have, but not in all.

41. Not on the average?—I think there is a considerable minority who have not been taken from large practice to become Sheriffs of rural counties.

42. But I am speaking of substitutes: Have they, as a rule, been taken from persons in large practice at the bar?—No, not in what you would understand by large practice; but many of them have been rising and promising young barristers.

43. But not men who had risen for the most part?—No. You could hardly expect that such men would accept the office.

44. The greater number of those who are in large practice are Sheriffs-principal at this moment?—Yes.

45. Have you found the new Sheriff Court form of 1853 an improvement upon the former system?—Beyond all doubt a great improvement.

46. On the whole, has it worked well?—Oh yes.

47. The Chairman.—Does it appear to you that there ought to be an addition made to the duties of the Sheriffs?—Connecting that with what I formerly remarked, as to what I conceived to be the beneficial and important character of the Sheriff Courts, and that they do a great deal of good in the country in cheapening litigation, and bringing it home to every man's door, I am inclined to think that there should be a very considerable addition given to the jurisdiction of Sheriff Courts. In civil matters I see no reason why they should not have what we understand by a heritable jurisdiction, up, at all events, to a certain amount. It would, probably, not do at once to begin to give them unlimited jurisdiction; but in questions not involving a larger interest than £200 or £300, I think they might safely exercise a heritable jurisdiction. I do not see why there should be any particular difficulty attaching to numerous classes of jurisdictions which are at present excluded from the Sheriff Court,—such as certain classes of reductions—reduction on the ground of fraud, or of minority and lesion, or ex capite lecti. Perhaps the same observation would apply there, that in the first instance, if that jurisdiction was conferred, it should be limited in amount, in order that it might be seen how it worked. I apply the same observation to suspensions, and to a certain extent it has been given effect to in suspensions, for to a limited amount they are now competent in Sheriff Courts; but I think they are much too limited in amount. It is only where the interest does not exceed £25 that they are competent; but I do not see why they should not be competent to a much larger extent. I think questions of aliment might also be safely entrusted to the Sheriffs. I don't see why a proving of the tenor of a lost writ should not also be competent in the Sheriff Court, as well as the taking proof ope exceptionis with reference to a lost writ. Nor do I see why, to a limited extent, the Sheriff should not be allowed to have jurisdiction against foreigners, if they are within his jurisdiction at the time, and if the matter arising is one which requires immediate attention. I believe that good claims against foreigners have often been lost in consequence of the rule that they could only be proceeded against in the supreme court. It has led to great vexation and great trouble. Then, as to the bankruptcy jurisdiction, it was thought for many years that it should be exclusively confined to the supreme court; but I am sure everybody feels that it has worked well by being extended to the Sheriff Courts. We have every year imposed upon us statutory jurisdictions, often of very great importance; in point of fact, the Sheriff Court is the court on which all these statutory jurisdictions are thrown in general; and looking at the confidence which has been already reposed in the Sheriff Court, and the confidence which the public seems to have in the manner in which its present jurisdiction is used, I do think it would be a great boon to the public to allow some of those jurisdictions which are at present exclusively in the Court of Session to be extended, at least to a certain extent, to the Sheriff Courts. With reference to criminal jurisdiction, I think there are two things well worth the consideration of this Commission, the first and most important being, whether the Sheriff's criminal jurisdiction should be limited, as it substantially now is, to imprisonment for two years. We almost never inflict a higher punishment than a fine of £50, or imprisonment for a period of two years. On one occasion since I went to Glasgow I inflicted the punishment of imprisonment for three years; but that was a solitary instance. Of course the Sheriff has power to sentence to a longer period of imprisonment; but these long periods of imprisonment are now rather discountenanced; and why the Sheriff should not be entrusted with the power of sentencing to penal servitude for five or seven years, I don't very well see. I think the Sheriff might very well safely be entrusted with that power. He acts under this modification, that it is in the power of the Crown counsel to send a criminal charge either to the Circuit Court, or to the High Court of Justiciary, or to the Sheriff Court; and they not unfrequently, in remitting the case, indicate the character of the offence to be charged, leading very much to the suggestion as to the proper punishment. The common course is this: If a party has been convicted two or three times before the Sheriff Court, he is then commonly sent either to the Circuit Court or to the High Court of Justiciary, where he is sentenced to penal servitude. The judge there tells him that imprisonment has failed in his case, that he has been imprisoned two or three times by the Sheriff, and that he must now be sentenced to penal servitude. In the same way the Sheriff tells the prisoner that he has been sentenced to imprisonment two or three times in the Justice of Peace Court or the Police Court, or in his own court, that these short terms of imprisonment have not reformed him, and that he is now to be imprisoned for a longer period. He comes back a third or a fourth time, and at length gets eighteen months' or two years' imprisonment, and then he is handed over to the Court of Justiciary. A great deal of that might be saved if the Sheriff were allowed to sentence to penal servitude for five or seven years. The other point in criminal jurisdiction is this. At present the Sheriff, in summary trials, can only impose a fine of £10, or imprisonment for sixty days; and it has been suggested to me by some of the Sheriff-substitutes, who take these summary trials, that they might safely be entrusted with the power to imprison for six months. There is some delicacy about that, and I believe that uniformity of opinion does not exist with reference to it. Therefore I merely mention it for consideration. It is said that where the liberty of the subject is involved to the extent of six months, it is safer to go before a jury; but I believe that summary jurisdiction in certain courts extends to imprisonment for six months, and I think it would not be attended with very much evil if that were allowed.

48. The Lord Justice-General.—What summary jurisdictions extend to six months?—I mean in England. Then, with reference to forms, I have had one or two suggestions made to me by the Procurators-fiscal in Glasgow on matters of detail as to the form of procedure in the criminal court, which I think worthy of attention. If these suggestions were adopted, they would go greatly to the shortening of the procedure.

49. The Chairman.—Before going on to that, when you spoke of giving extended jurisdiction in heritable subjects, did you comprehend in that the power to decide upon titles to land?—Up to a certain extent. For example, I have a case before me just now, in which I have considerable doubt whether I can entertain it at all. It is a mere dispute about a gable. One man says that the gable is on his ground, and he takes half of it down, and the other party brings an action to compel him to restore the gable; it is not an application for interdict; and the defender says, 'You cannot bring that action in the Sheriff Court, because it involves a question of heritable right; if it is on my ground, I was entitled to take it down, and I cannot be found liable by the Sheriff in the expense of rebuilding it.' Perhaps that involves a question of heritable title. There are many instances of that sort about small properties in towns and villages, where people very often quarrel about little bits of ground and small buildings, and it is a great hardship to force them into the Court of Session when the cases could be disposed of at little expense in the Sheriff Courts. I would not, however, make that unlimited.

50. Lord Barcaple.—Do you see any way in which the amount could be defined?—I think the jurisdiction might be given to the Sheriff, if both parties admitted that the value did not exceed a certain amount; and if they did not admit the value, the Sheriff might remit it to a valuator.

51. Mr. Campbell.—Might not a defender, objecting to the jurisdiction which the pursuer necessarily assents to from the fact of bringing his action, certify that, in his opinion, the case was of more value to him than a specific sum?—I would not exclude the right of the pursuer, by a mere certificate from the defender. I would have the fact ascertained.

52. The Dean of Faculty.—You mean that there are many cases of that kind, involving questions of title, where the sum at stake is very small?—Yes.

53. Does that happen very frequently?—Yes.

54. Mr. Clark.—Where would you draw the line?—I think it might safely go to £200 or £300; and I think it would be subsequently increased.

55. Do you mean that that is to be the value of the subject interfered with?—Yes.

56. The Dean of Faculty.—That is a rental or value of £10 or £15 a year?—Yes; something of that sort.

57. The Lord Justice-General.—What do you mean exactly by value? An heritable subject may not be of the marketable value of more than £200 or £300, but it may be worth ten or twenty times that amount to its owner, from its special circumstances.—That would be in exceptional cases, I think. In general, the value of a thing is just as much as it will bring.

58. The question very often arises with reference to a small part of a heritable subject.—I think that would be running too much into the greater question; and perhaps such a case as that ought to be excluded, because it would materially affect the value of the whole.

59. Then would you confine it to cases where the entire estate belonging to the party is of a small value?—If it was a pendicle of a larger property, I should have some doubt about it, because it might be of great value to the owner of the larger property. But I am talking of cottages in small towns, and small places in large towns, where there is only one possession and one property. There are often disputes about them.

60. Mr. Webster.—Would you make a distinction between a gable standing on a large estate, and a gable standing on a small property?—I think the value of the whole property on which the gable was standing should not exceed £200 or £300.

61. The Dean of Faculty.—From your experience, do you think it would be difficult to establish such a rule with regard to value as could be reasonably and easily worked?—No; I don't think it would be difficult.

62. Mr. Adam.—Does any particular reason occur to you why there should be a limitation of the amount in heritable, and not in moveables?—There is this reason: the feudal law is a system by itself, and we have in the supreme court very learned feudalists; and it requires almost a separate study to become perfect feudalists. In the Sheriff Court, at least hitherto, we have not had our attention much directed to feudal law; and therefore, at the commencement, I would hesitate about making it an unlimited jurisdiction.

63. Mr. Baxter.—But are not very important titles to extensive estates drawn by the inferior court practitioners?—No doubt.

64. The Chairman.—Your object is to save expense?—Yes.

65. Mr. Baxter.—Do you see any objection to the Sheriff having power to appoint tutors, curators, and factors loco tutoris?—That has been suggested; and I confess I don't see any great objection to it. The Sheriff has at this moment the power of appointing judicial factors under the Bankruptcy Act; and in the Consistorial Court he has the power of appointing factors.

66. The Chairman.—Would there be any inconvenience if the tutor or curator was a person resident beyond the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—That might lead to inconvenience.

67. Then, would the Sheriff, in his choice, not be guided by this—that he must take a person resident within his jurisdiction?—The probability is that as to a local matter of that sort, the person suggested would be resident within the county.

68. Mr. Baxter.—You are aware that a married woman, seeking protection for her earnings on account of her husband's desertion, is obliged to go for that purpose to the Court of Session?—Yes.

69. Do you see any objection to give the Sheriff power to protect a married woman in such cases?—I do not see any objection to that. I may say generally, that looking at the vast extent of jurisdiction entrusted to the Sheriff Court just now, I do not see any reason why certain jurisdictions have been kept out of it. With the exception of large heritable questions, they are, generally speaking, not more difficult than the jurisdictions with which we are entrusted.

70. Mr. Paterson.—What is your view as to making actions of divorce, declarators of marriage, and actions of that class competent in the Sheriff Court?—I would have a little more doubt about them. They have never been before the Sheriff Court, and they involve very important questions of personal status; and both from its nobile officium, and its long-constituted jurisdiction as to all questions materially affecting status, such as the custody of children, and the position of man and wife, the supreme court has reserved these matters to itself. Whilst it might be safe enough to trust them to the Sheriff Court, I am not so clear about doing so.

71. Mr. Baxter.—In reviewing the Sheriff-substitute's judgments on the proof, you do not see the witnesses, but merely proceed on their notes?—I am very glad you have put that question, because I have had experience both as Sheriff-substitute and as Sheriff, and I entertain opinions upon it which are not quite coincided in by some of my brethren. I think a great deal too much stress has been laid upon the importance of seeing the witnesses. I think there is as much disadvantage as advantage in that. The Sheriff is not entitled to consider himself a physiognomist, or a Lavater, or a craniologist; he must judge of what the witness says. If the witness gives his evidence in a prevaricating manner, that affects his credibility; but that is made to appear, if the evidence is properly taken down, because the moment a witness is seen to be going to prevaricate, you say, 'Interrogated,' and then you take his answer, which is no answer, and then you say, 'On its being stated to the witness that that is not an answer, and the question being repeated.' You see from the mode in which the evidence is recorded whether the witness was a prevaricating witness. Beyond that, I think the mere question of whether he speaks with hesitation, or whether he is an ugly-looking fellow, is a matter of no moment.

72. Then you do not lay stress on seeing the witnesses?—No, very little stress; and I find, in my own experience, that I did not form a more correct opinion of evidence in a case formerly, when I took the proof myself, and saw all the witnesses, than I do now, when I merely read the proof without having seen the witnesses.

73. Would you like to see the system of jury trials in civil matters extended to the Sheriff Courts?—No. I think this country has decided pretty strongly against trial by jury. It is not a popular system in this country; and if introduced into such a court as the Glasgow Sheriff Court, it would lead to very tedious procedure, and I think would introduce great uncertainty in verdicts. I think the public have greater confidence in facts being decided upon by professional judges, who devote their whole lives to the consideration of evidence, rather than by six or seven, or any number of gentlemen suddenly taken from their shops or counting-houses, and asked to say what contradictory evidence amounts to. I do not think that would be a popular plan, or give satisfaction.

74. Mr. Campbell.—From the number of proofs in the Sheriff Court, the tax on the public time would be enormous if these cases were disposed of by juries?—Yes; and if that system were introduced into Glasgow, we would need to have more courts. But there has been no outcry for it, so far as I know; and I have never heard any of the professional gentlemen in Glasgow do otherwise than express their dissatisfaction with the jury system, so far as it is worked in Scotland.

75. Mr. Clark.—When you say you think the Sheriff Court ought to be entitled to entertain actions of reduction, do you mean actions to reduce any kind of deed?—With regard to actions to reduce, for example, a deed of entail, or actions which necessarily involve very large heritable questions, I think there should be a limitation in the meantime, in the same way as I would give a limitation with regard to questions of direct heritable right; but I do not see why ordinary reductions on the ground of fraud, or minority and lesion, or even ex capite lecti, should not be competent in the Sheriff Court.

76. Suppose a settlement settling £100,000 of money, and another settlement settling an estate worth £100 a year, is the Sheriff to be competent to entertain the one case, and incompetent to entertain the other?—That is not the case I put. I would not much mind what amount the settlement was, if it was a reduction on the ground of fraud or lesion; but if it is a reduction on some technical ground connected with a deed of entail, or any other important deed, I think it would be, perhaps, better to leave it to the Court of Session.

77. Mr. Baxter.—There would always be an appeal to the Court of Session from the judgment of the Sheriff in such cases?—Yes.

78. The Lord Justice-General.—Would you think it desirable to try, in the Sheriff Court, a reduction of a will upon the ground of the testator's incapacity, or upon the ground of facility and circumvention?—Perhaps there might be a limitation of the amount as to which such reductions were competent. If the will did not involve more than £500, I would make the reduction competent; but if it involved a very large sum, it might be right to reserve that also for the Court of Session. At the same time, when I look at our jurisdiction in mercantile contracts of every description, up to thousands of pounds, and in actions of damages involving often very large questions, I do not see any great distinction between allowing the one jurisdiction, and disallowing the other.

79. You see no distinction between one case and the other, with regard to limiting the amount; but my question had reference rather to the kind of question to be tried. Do you think it would be desirable, assuming that there is no limit in point of amount or value, that reductions of wills on the ground of the incapacity of the testator, or of facility and circumvention, should be tried in the Sheriff Court, and therefore necessarily without a jury?—If that involves the question of whether these questions should still be reserved for juries, it introduces a new element. If it is right that such questions as that should always go to a jury, I should think it not right to introduce them into the Sheriff Courts.

80. The Dean of Faculty.—Supposing they were introduced into the Sheriff Courts, would there be any difficulty in summoning a jury for that class of questions?—I don't see it; and in brieves of idiotcy and fatuity, the Sheriff has been in use to decide and investigate with a jury.

81. The Lord Justice-General.—Are you aware that that has been altered by the Act of last year?—Yes, I believe it has been altered now.

82. The Dean of Faculty.—Is there anything, do you think, in the question of incapacity of which a Sheriff Court is not capable of judging?—No, I don't see it. You must either have confidence in the presiding Sheriffs or not. If you have confidence in them, why entrust them with unlimited jurisdiction in certain branches of the law, and withhold it in others?

83. Mr. Clark.—Would that not be a reason for giving the Sheriffs co-extensive jurisdiction with the Court of Session?—If you take a very broad view of it, I don't see why you should not do so.

84. Do you think that would be desirable?—In such a case as Glasgow, no one Sheriff, and no ordinary set of Sheriffs, could do it.

85. Mr. Baxter.—But if the staff was supplemented or made sufficient?—Then you would make a Court of Session in Glasgow, and perhaps that would not be a bad thing.

86. Mr. Webster.—There is no limit in point of amount, is there, in cases tried before the Sheriff with a jury, under the Lands Clauses Act?—No, these cases may be of any amount. That is a statutory jurisdiction conferred upon Sheriffs, and that is a very good illustration of what I have been saying. I myself have presided in cases of that kind involving very large sums.

87. Mr. Shand.—Is it not the case that proceedings against foreigners originate in the Sheriff Courts, applications being usually made there to found jurisdiction by issuing the diligence?—Yes.

88. The jurisdiction is founded within the Sheriffdom?—Yes; but it is a merely ministerial office.

89. Have you often cases of that class for comparatively small amounts?—There are a great many such cases. A great many warrants for arrestment to found jurisdiction are granted for all amounts.

90. And a good many of them for small amounts?—Yes.

91. In such cases do you think it a hardship that the party should be obliged to resort to the Supreme Court in order to get a decree against the debtor?—Yes, it seems to be a hardship.

92. Is there any reason which occurs to you for restricting the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts in regard to pecuniary claims against foreigners, where the jurisdiction has been founded in the sheriffdom, or do you think it should be extended?—I have already said I think the jurisdiction, to a certain extent, against foreigners might be safely conferred on the Sheriff Court.

93. But is there any reason why there should be a limit as to ordinary pecuniary claims?—I do not see any reason.

94. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that there are many small claims against foreigners which are not prosecuted just because of the expense?—I cannot be certain of that, but I think it is very likely.

Henry Glassford Bell, LL.D.

95. The Chairman.—In reference to the various classes of cases as to which you would give jurisdiction to the Sheriff, would you give the power which is contained in the 40th section of the Judicature Act, as to advocating to the Court of Session if either party desired it, without reference to the amount at issue, but in relation to the nature of the cause?—I think that might be a very safe thing to do, and I do not see any very great objection to it. I think that in the great majority of cases, if this extended jurisdiction was given, there would be no such proposal made by either party. I think they would be satisfied with the judgment given at their own door; but there might be no great harm in allowing any party in the course of the cause to advocate de plano.

96. Do you think that the Sheriff Court ought to be made to absorb the jurisdiction exercised by Justices of the Peace?—No, I am not in favour of that. I think it would throw in such an amount of work that the Sheriffs in Glasgow could not overtake it; but I only speak with reference to Glasgow.

97. Do you think there is any advantage in Justices of the Peace exercising jurisdiction, and accustoming themselves to business of that kind?—I am not unfavourable to the limited jurisdiction possessed by Justices of the Peace in the Justice of Peace Court; but I am very much opposed to its being extended. It is something like the police court jurisdiction of Magistrates in burghs. I am not disposed to take it away from them, nor would I be disposed to take away the limited jurisdiction from the Justices of Peace in counties.

98. There is a Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow?—Yes.

99. It exercises jurisdiction in matters which do not come within the range of the Sheriffs?—Yes.

100. Do you think that any part of that jurisdiction ought to be transferred to the Sheriffs?—I think it would be of no advantage to the public if it were. I believe the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow is very judiciously conducted. They have very skilful men who act as liners, and make reports on all questions involving buildings and encroachments. The Magistrates in that court are aided by assessors, and good practical men; and in questions of mere building and construction I think it is a safe court, and that no great good would be got by interfering with its jurisdiction.

101. Mr. Murray.—Are you aware whether these liners are ever applied to extra-judicially by parties who have cases before the Dean of Guild?—I don't know. I should not be afraid of their being influenced by unfair or underhand motives, because I know that they are men of great respectability and above suspicion.

102. Mr. Paterson.—And the Lord Dean is the judge?—Yes.

103. The Dean of Faculty.—Would you give the Commission your views as to the executive power of the Sheriff in criminal matters, and generally as to the way in which criminal business is conducted in counties?—I think our system of conducting criminal matters before the Sheriff is a very sound and good one. We have a public prosecutor in every county, who is responsible to the Lord Advocate, as the head public prosecutor of the country; and when an offence is communicated to the Fiscal, it is his duty to prepare a petition and present it to the Sheriff, who grants a warrant to apprehend the party suspected or accused, and bring him up for examination, and that examination takes place, not in public court, but in the fairest way towards all parties. The petition is read to the party accused, and he is told by the Sheriff that he is to be examined on that charge, but that he need not answer any question unless he pleases, and that what he does say may be afterwards used against him. In point of fact, this proceeding is very often in his favour, because at the commencement of criminal procedure there is often a little doubt as to who the real criminal is; and though a certain suspicion attaches to the party brought up, he may be able to make such statements as, on inquiry, satisfy the Procurator-fiscal and the Sheriff that he is not the party amenable to the charge, and he is liberated within a day, or within an hour if he can show his innocence. If he tells a story which is not satisfactory, he is committed for further examination, and during the next eight days the Procurator-fiscal is bound to complete the precognition and to lay it before the Sheriff. If the Sheriff thinks the precognition does not bring home guilt to the party, then he is liberated; if, on the other hand, the Sheriff is of opinion that the precognition is so pregnant against him that he should be sent to trial, he grants warrant to keep him in jail till he shall be liberated in due course of law. Immediately after that, the warrant of the Sheriff and the precognitions are transmitted to Crown counsel; and the Lord Advocate, as the dominus of the prosecution, has it in his power to order or to abandon further procedure. If he determines that there shall be further procedure, he has the power of deciding in what shape it shall be. He may either remit to the Sheriff to try the accused summarily, in which case the sentence is not more than a fine of £10, or sixty days' imprisonment; or he may remit him to be tried before the Sheriff and a jury, or the trial may take place at the Circuit Court, or at the High Court of Justiciary. The whole of that proceeding seems to me exceedingly fair and favourable to the party accused, and I don't know any system by which justice is more likely to be done. If he is tried before a jury, the jury judge of the fact, and acquit him or find him guilty; and if he is found guilty, it is left to the discretion of the presiding judge to say what punishment it is proper to impose. With reference to this I may mention that the Procurators-fiscal in Glasgow think that a portion of the form now in use might be simplified and shortened, and they have handed me some notes in which they say that interlocutors of relevancy, and other deliverances which are merely formal, are never read in the Justiciary Court, and that the reading of them, while it serves no purpose, unnecessarily occupies a good deal of time. They also refer to the reading of the criminal libels, which are not now read in the Justiciary Court. In the Sheriff Court they are always read if the party pleads not guilty. It is suggested that there is no occasion for reading the libels, the prisoner having been previously served with the indictment, and that it would be enough to authorize the Sheriff to say, You are charged with so and so; are you guilty or not guilty?

104. The Chairman.—Do you approve of these suggestions?—As they are founded on the forms observed in the Justiciary Court, I do not see why they should not be extended to the Sheriff Court. Another suggestion which the Procurators-fiscal make is as to the forms of sentences. The long form of sentence has been abrogated in the Justiciary Court. We have a long technical form, and it has to be engrossed in the books of the court; the Sheriff has to wait till the clerk has written it; and when we have eighteen or twenty cases before us at a pleading diet, it takes three or four hours to go through them. If the forms were shortened as they have been in the Court of Justiciary, there would be a great saving of time.

105. The Dean of Faculty.—That is as to the form of criminal procedure; but I wanted your general opinion as to the Sheriff's position as an executive officer in the county, apart from his judicial office. Do you think it important for the public service that that should be maintained,—I mean with reference to his jurisdiction over the police, he being responsible for the peace of the county?—With reference to his responsibility for the peace of the county, unless some other officer were entrusted with that important duty, it must be continued with the Sheriff. With reference to our position in Glasgow, we have no power over the very large and efficient body of police in Glasgow, but we have power over the county police, who are a much smaller body. I do not think I am free from responsibility within Glasgow merely because we have the Provost and Magistrates there, who are also responsible for the peace of the city, and I have sometimes thought that the Sheriff should have a greater power of calling in the services of the police of Glasgow than he has. At the same time, it would not do to introduce two commands over the police. The Provost and Commissioners of Police have that power exclusively at present; but by Act of Parliament it is provided that the Provost may, upon application by the Sheriff, authorize the police, or a portion of them, to go into extra-burghal parts of the county, and that is so far a convenience.

106. As to the county part of your jurisdiction, do you find that you have power enough over the police force?—I have never found that the Superintendent of Police for the county hesitated for a moment to do what I said I thought he ought to do with the police. On the recent occasion of a contested election in South Lanarkshire, where there was a chance of disturbances at some of the polling places, I found it necessary to arrange with the Superintendent of Police where his force should be placed, and I applied to the Provost, and he gave me sixty additional men from the Glasgow force.

107. Do you think it would be beneficial if that power were removed from the Sheriff and confined entirely to the county gentlemen?—Certainly not. The county gentlemen cannot act upon emergencies; there should be one responsible person, and that person is naturally the Sheriff. The county gentlemen have so far the management of the police; they fix their number, and arrange as to their pay.

108. And the Sheriff is conjoined with them in that?—Yes.

109. The Chairman.—The Sheriff appoints the Procurators-fiscal, and he works a great deal through them?—Yes, the Procurators-fiscal are appointed by the Sheriff, and are his officers.

110. Is the Procurator-fiscal not a most important officer?—Yes.

111. He takes precognitions, if the Sheriff desires it?—Yes; and the Sheriff is the dominus precognitionis.

112. Do you find any clashing between investigations made by the Procurator-fiscal, and investigations made by the police constables?—No; very little. A great many of the cases that come to the Fiscal come through reports by the police, and occasionally the police wish to throw cases on the Fiscal which he does not think important enough to make sheriff cases of, and he tells them they should be made police court cases. In that way there is sometimes a discrepancy as to whether the case should be taken up by the Fiscal or not; but that rarely leads to inconvenience.

113. In any case of importance does the Procurator-fiscal content himself with a precognition by the constables before the case is reported to the Crown?—I don't think he does in cases of importance; but in cases of less importance he very often receives a precognition from the police office, which he thinks sufficient to warrant him in preparing a petition to the Sheriff.

114. But I refer to cases which are intended to go to Crown counsel for consideration?—If the case is a case of importance, the Procurator-fiscal makes a precognition of his own in addition to any precognition which he may receive from the police.

115. Do you consider that to be his duty?—Decidedly.

116. Mr. Clark.—Investigation is sometimes made by the Chief Constable into crimes committed in the county?—Yes.

117. Do you hold that the Chief Constable is subject to the orders of the Procurator-fiscal in making these investigations?—That is a matter which has given rise to some investigation recently. I have made inquiry of the Procurators-fiscal of the Upper and Middle Wards, and they inform me that when they intimate to the Head Constable that they wish assistance from him, they invariably get it.

118. Are they not entitled to direct the investigations of the Chief Constable?—Not, I think, except with reference to a particular offence that has been reported to them.

119. But with reference to that offence?—Yes; I think they are entitled to say to the Chief Constable that a particular offence has been reported, and that they wish him to send men to make inquiries about it; and I understand that the Chief Constable of Lanarkshire never refuses to do so.

120. Is he under an obligation to follow the directions of the Procurator-fiscal?—Our Chief Constable seems to have no doubt about it, for he does it.

121. Do you think it is right that he should do so?—It may depend on the terms of his appointment; but it is right that he should do it, and he does it in Lanarkshire in point of fact.

122. Does not the Sheriff direct the Procurator-fiscal as he thinks proper in the matter of the investigation?—Yes; but he cannot direct the Procurator-fiscal what persons he is to employ.

123. Is the Procurator-fiscal not the officer of the Sheriff in making the investigation?—Yes.

124. And are not the police of the county subject to the Procurator-fiscal in that matter?—I think they are, and they ought to be understood to be so.

125. Does it not follow that the Chief Constable, in regard to investigations as to crime, must follow the directions given him by the Procurator-fiscal?—I believe there has been some little jealousy about that, and that the Chief Constable in some counties has said, 'I will obey an order from the Sheriff, but not from the Procurator-fiscal.' Such a difficulty has never arisen in Lanarkshire.

126. Don't you think it would be proper that the Chief Constable should be subject to the Procurator-fiscal in making those investigations?—Yes, with the sanction of the Sheriff.

127. Is not the Procurator-fiscal in giving these orders acting under the authority of the Sheriff?—He is presumed to be doing so.

128. Do you think it necessary that there should be an order in each particular case from the Sheriff?—No; I think there should be a general understanding that the Chief Constable should give such assistance, in making precognitions, as the Procurator-fiscal desires; and in point of fact that is done in Lanarkshire.

129. The Chairman.—Is there more than one Chief Constable in the county?—No.

130. Then in some districts the Chief Constable cannot be got at?—But he has four inspectors under him.

131. Mr. Adam.—There are some crimes over which the Sheriff Court has no jurisdiction; would you suggest any alteration in that respect?—The crimes over which the Sheriff Court has no jurisdiction are for the most part crimes of such magnitude that if the accused party is guilty of them, the ordinary power of imprisonment which the Sheriff possesses would not be sufficient punishment; and till the power of awarding punishment by the Sheriff is increased, it is impossible to extend to him jurisdiction over these higher crimes—viz. robbery, murder, fire-raising, and rape.

132. Don't you think that the Sheriff's jurisdiction might be extended?—I think most unquestionably in many cases of robbery the Sheriff's jurisdiction might be extended with safety. Robbery often runs so much into theft that it is difficult to say where the one begins and the other ends; and there are many cases of robbery in Glasgow, remitted to the Circuit Court, which are not a bit more atrocious in their character than many housebreakings and thefts which come every day before the Sheriff. I think, so far as robbery is concerned, there should be an extension of the criminal jurisdiction of the Sheriff; but I would take that along with the proposal to give him a power of sentencing to penal servitude.

133. Mr. Clark.—You have said that the preservation of the peace is a very important part of the Sheriff's functions; if the Sheriff-principal was abolished, in whom would you vest that duty?—The abolition of the Sheriff-principal is perhaps an erroneous mode of expressing it. With reference to the question of double sheriffships I have always thought that it is not the abolition of the Sheriff-principal that is contemplated, but the abolition of the Sheriff-substitute. It is the converting of the Sheriff-principal and the Sheriff-substitute into one Sheriff.

134. You don't suppose that one Sheriff could do all the duties in Lanarkshire?—Certainly not.

135. If the head of the present court in Glasgow were abolished, in whom would you vest the responsibility of the preservation of the peace which now rests with him?—If it was thought a good system in Lanarkshire not to have two ranks of Sheriffs—a subordinate and a higher one—but to put them all into one rank, you would need to appoint probably six or eight Sheriffs, and you would have to give them all incomes enabling them to discharge their duties efficiently. They would all be on a par, with this difference, that one would be senior Sheriff, and I presume he would take the administrative duty of maintaining the peace and attending the boards and meetings which the Sheriff must attend; and in his absence, the Sheriff next him in seniority would do so.

136. Take Inverness, a large county, in which there would be several Sheriffs,—who is to be charged with the preservation of the peace of that county?—If there was more than one Sheriff, the senior would be responsible for the preservation of the peace; and in districts where there was only one, that one would be responsible.

137. Do you mean that the senior Sheriff would be responsible for the peace of the entire county?—Yes. In Glasgow, if we had six Sheriffs of the same rank, they would divide the business among them, and they would not only be judges primæ instantiæ, but they would have to take proofs in their own hands according to the present system, and to hear parties and to give final judgments, which would then be the final judgments of the Sheriff Court of Glasgow.

138. Do you not think that unless the county were divided into well-defined districts, there would be great difficulty, according to your plan, in securing the proper responsibility for the preservation of the peace?—There might be. It is not my plan; it is only a suggestion. I may mention that I have talked on the subject a good deal with the professional gentlemen of Glasgow, and as far as I know, they are rather in favour of a system of review within the Sheriff Court in Glasgow. They may approve of some alteration in the constitution of the appeal court, but I understand that they are in favour of a system of review within the Sheriff Court itself.

139. The Dean of Faculty.—Could that be extended to the smaller counties?—I don't know. I may mention that within Glasgow it appears to me, looking at the mass of work that is to be done, that there would always need to be a class of officials to do one portion of the work, and there must be others to do another portion of the work. I doubt if the system would answer of dividing the whole work among them all, on the footing that they were all equal.

140. The Lord Justice-General.—Suppose that in the county of Lanark, including Glasgow, you had Sheriffs all of one rank, and no appeal in the Sheriff Court, would it or would it not be necessary to divide the county into separate jurisdictions?—Very likely that would be done, but not necessarily. In the Lower Ward there is such a mass of work, that a certain number of Sheriffs would be required for it alone; and if the others were to undertake the Middle and Upper Wards, that might lead to a division of the county.

141. At present you have Sheriff-substitutes resident in places in the county out of Glasgow, and with jurisdiction practically limited to the district in which they reside?—Yes; but they are Sheriff-substitutes for the whole county.

142. But they do in point of fact exercise their jurisdiction only within a limited portion of the county?—As a general rule they do; but they occasionally assist each other.

143. In the case which I have supposed, would that continue to be the practice, or would it not?—I think either practice would do: you could divide any county into a number of smaller counties, and put Sheriffs into each; or you may keep a county large, and put in a sufficient number of Sheriffs to do the work.

144. Mr. Clark.—But in the district of the county in which Glasgow is situated, you must have a court with a plurality of judges?—That is perfectly clear. Two or three men cannot do the work that must be done in Glasgow.

145. And you could not divide Glasgow into districts?—You could not make separate sheriffships for Glasgow.

146. Do you think it would work conveniently if that plurality of judges were all of equal rank?—I see great difficulties about that. All these men of equal rank would have to divide the original work, and they would have to sit also as appeal judges.

147. The Lord Justice-General.—Take the case I have already supposed, of their being all of equal rank and jurisdiction, and that you entrust the senior Sheriff with the responsibility for the peace of the county, would you expect the Sheriff who lived at Airdrie or at Hamilton to take any part of that duty in his own district?—They would probably be bound to do it in all cases of emergency.

148. Would they not act in that way in subordination to the senior Sheriff, if he is alone responsible for the peace of the county?—If the onus of keeping the peace of the county were laid on the senior Sheriff, the others must act under him, or in concert with him.

149. Then you would still have a principal Sheriff in that way?—No; it would be very much the same thing as the senior or presiding judge of a court; they would be all very much on the same platform, but the senior would take precedence.

150. But in quelling riots, and employing the police to keep the peace, the Sheriff is not acting as a member of a court?—No; but if you devolve that on the senior Sheriff, he would be bound to attend to it.

151. But he would still require to act through the other Sheriffs in particular localities?—He would communicate with them, as I do at present with the Sheriff-substitute, on all occasions when there was any necessity for it.

152. Would you still require that those who act in that way in particular localities should have the sanction or authority of the senior Sheriff?—Yes, so far as steps to be taken for preserving the peace were concerned, they would be subordinate to the senior Sheriff.

153. Then, in that part of the Sheriff's work, you would, under that system, still have one or two or more Sheriffs subordinate to another Sheriff?—Not exactly subordinate, but not entitled to act unless in the senior Sheriff's absence. If you were to entrust the peace of the county to several men of equal rank, it would be like entrusting it to none.

154. Mr. Harrison.—Supposing the addition to the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs suggested by you were made, would it not be necessary to add to their income so as to secure well-qualified lawyers?—I am of opinion that all Sheriffs are underpaid. I think no Sheriff-substitute should receive less than £800 a year. However remote the place to which he is sent, he must live as a gentleman, he must associate with the county people, he has his children to bring up; and to give him less, in the present state of society, than £800 a year, appears to me exceedingly wrong. It leads in some cases to very distressing consequences. With reference to the Sheriffs, if they are to be continued, most of them are in a different situation. They are not removed from their profession, they have their sheriffship as an addition to their professional emoluments, and therefore they are not so much to be pitied.

155. The Dean of Faculty.—You have suggested, as one of the three alternatives which have been put, a new court of appeal, with Sheriffs of co-ordinate rank. Now, supposing that were not to be done, do you think it would be for the public interest that the disparity of rank should be abolished, and no appeal left but to the Court of Session?—If that were done, it would be absolutely necessary, as I have already said, to give the single Sheriff the power of reconsidering his own judgment.

156. Would that be so satisfactory as the appeal as it now stands?—The answer to that must depend on whether the appellate jurisdiction would be a higher jurisdiction than the original jurisdiction.

157. Supposing you yourself were sitting as sole Sheriff, with nothing but an appeal from yourself to yourself, would that be as satisfactory as the present system?—It would not be so to me, because I feel that I have immense facilities given me by having a well-digested judgment of the Sheriff-substitute laid before me; and even though I may differ from him, there is no thanks to me for superior intelligence or knowledge of law, because I have an opportunity of considering the case in lights not suggested to him.

158. Would not the public suffer if they had no remedy except going to the Court of Session, in the 1400 cases which you decided last year?—I think it would be absolutely necessary to give to the Sheriff, if there was only one Sheriff, the power of reconsidering his judgments.

159. But if there was no remedy but going to the Court of Session in the 1400 appeals which you decided last year, would you not consider that a very great disadvantage to litigants?—If the Sheriff had no opportunity of reconsidering his judgments, I think it would not work well.

160. But you admit that it would not be so satisfactory as the present system?—Not to me individually.

161. Would not the public or the litigants suffer in these 1400 appeals which you decided last year, if they could only have appealed to the Court of Session instead of appealing to you?—In point of fact they had the advantage of coming to a second judge; and in point of fact they have acquiesced in his judgments.

162. And therefore you may assume that the appellate jurisdiction is satisfactory?—Perhaps one cause of that is, that a great many of these judgments were adherences.

163. Would it have been as satisfactory, in your opinion, if these litigants had had to go to the Court of Session instead of coming to you?—I would rather decline to answer that question.

164. In the first place, would not the expense have been much greater?—Certainly.

165. Would not the delay have been considerably greater?—Yes.

166. Don't you think these are the two greatest evils that can befal a litigant?—These would be great evils.

167. The Lord Justice-General—And, on the other hand, as so many of the litigants acquiesced in your judgments, it may fairly be presumed that your judgments are pretty satisfactory?—And it may also be very fairly assumed that a great many would have acquiesced in the first judgment rather than go to the Court of Session, had there been no appeal to me.

168. Mr. Harrison.—If the status and incomes of the Sheriff-substitutes were improved, as you suggest, would not an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff-depute then seem even more unnecessary than it does to many people now?—If steps were taken to improve the position and the legal knowledge of the judge in the first instance, it would become less necessary to have a double set of Sheriffs than it is at present.

169. The Lord Advocate.—I suppose you are aware that it is not necessary to take a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff, but that it may be brought to the Court of Session at once?—Yes.

170. But practically that never is done?—Very rarely; but I have known instances of it.

171. Lord Justice-General.—Is it the prevailing rule that the party dissatisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and having the choice of going either to the Court of Session or to the Sheriff-principal, prefers the latter?—I think that is the general rule.

172. Is it not much more than the general rule? Is it not almost universal, that the party dissatisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute goes by appeal, not to the Court of Session, but to the Sheriff-principal?—Certainly that is the case; and the losing party almost always takes the chance of some alteration that he may get from the Sheriff, especially as he can do it at a comparatively small cost.

173. Supposing that you had in Lanarkshire, or in the city of Glasgow, Sheriffs all of one rank and jurisdiction, would there not be a great risk of diversity of judgments upon the same question of law arising within the same county?—No doubt. No one Sheriff would be bound by the view which another Sheriff took of any question of law.

174. At present that is avoided by there being an appeal from all the substitutes to one Sheriff-principal?—So far as the county is concerned, it is avoided; and I find it to be the fact that after the Sheriff has in one or two cases indicated his view of the law, the Sheriff-substitutes say, 'We need not persevere in a different view of the law, because we know what is the view of the appeal Sheriff.' No doubt, if it is a case of great importance, and likely to go to the Court of Session, the Sheriff-substitute may not do that.

175. Mr. Campbell.—Taking the judgments pronounced in the Sheriff Court, which have been submitted to the review of the Court of Session as a court of appeal, is it not the fact that so far as can be ascertained from the reports of these cases before the public, the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute which was reversed on appeal by the Sheriff has been as frequently set up by the Court of Session, as that a judgment of reversal of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment has been affirmed by the Court of Session?—According to certain statistics which I have seen, that has been as frequently the case.

176. Dean of Faculty.—And the judgments that are advocated to the Court of Session, I presume, are those generally which are supposed to be wrong by the party that advocates?—Yes.

177. But is not the result that you have now mentioned the result in every appellate jurisdiction of that kind? If you were to take the Lord Ordinary, the Inner House, and the House of Lords, don't you think that very much the same kind of thing would be found?—There is always the 'glorious uncertainty of the law.'

178. What percentage of your 1400 appeals was taken to the Court of Session?—I don't think that I stated there were 1400 appealable judgments. There were judgments given in 737 cases, and of these, almost all of which were subject to advocation, intimation of advocation was made in 24; but only a very few of these 24 were actually proceeded with.

179. So that hardly one per cent. was advocated?—Not much more.

180. The Chairman.—I think you said that the Act of 1853 works well?—Yes.

181. Can you suggest any alterations upon it?—That probably goes into the question of procedure. There are one or two matters of detail which have been frequently pressed upon me. One of these is citation by means of lock-hole executions. There is a very general impression, I think, among the profession in Glasgow, that these have been a source of great abuse. In our Small Debt Court, where we have 24,000 cases in the year, whenever a knowing pursuer wants to get a decree in absence, he instructs the officer, I believe, to resort to a lock-hole execution. The defender is out all day, and his house is shut up, and he goes in the defender's absence, and brings back a lock-hole execution. The case is called in court, and no appearance is made for the defender; decree is taken out against him, and he knows nothing about it till he gets a charge to pay. I believe that is a very common system; and I think it is well worth the attention of this Commission whether some change should not be made in that mode of citation. I believe that in England they have the lock-hole system under this modification, that when the executing officer reports that he found the door locked, and was unable to give service, it is left to the judge to instruct such mode of service as in the whole circumstances may appear best.

182. The Lord Justice-General.—How is a lock-hole citation given?—The executing officer reports that after giving three audible knocks, he could not find the party, and that he then puts a service copy into the lock-hole of the door.

183. And anybody from without could get hold of that service copy?—Yes.

184. The officer may do it perfectly honestly, and the pursuer may take it away?—And a dishonest officer may return the lock-hole execution without having left the service copy.

185. Mr. Campbell.—Have you considered whether or not it would be advisable to give to Sheriff-substitutes in the large towns, such as Edinburgh, Glasgow, Dundee, and so on, the power of employing the services of a shorthand writer in taking down proofs?—I have never been able to see my way to that. In our court, the Sheriff takes down the answers of the witness in such a way as to be the substantial evidence of that witness. Before he leaves, his evidence is read aloud to him in presence of both agents; and if there is any little slip or omission, it is corrected then and there, and the witness admits that it is his evidence, and signs it. If you have a shorthand writer, of course you cannot read over to the witness the evidence which is to be the record of the proof. The witness goes away; in a day or two the shorthand writer returns the whole evidence, which may have extended over hours; and when the agents come to read it, they object that there is an inaccuracy, and that it is not what the witness said. It may not be possible to bring the witness back; and when he comes back, he may say that it is what he said, or that it is not what he said. If he says it is not what he said, one of the parties objects that he is altering what he did say. I think it would lead to great confusion and difficulty in our courts, more especially as we have not all over Scotland what, I believe, you have in Edinburgh—one or two shorthand writers so accurate that they may be depended on to the utmost extent. I also think that it would save very little trouble to the Sheriff. He may at present dictate to a clerk, instead of writing with his own hand; but what is proposed is, that he shall dictate to the shorthand writer, and that would save him little trouble. Moreover, I do not think it would save much time. I was always able to take evidence as quickly as the witnesses could be examined, and I believe the other Sheriffs do so also.

186. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think that the employment of a shorthand writer would be apt to lead to prolixity in taking down the evidence?—Yes.

187. And it would add very much to the copying fees?—Yes. On the whole, I would deprecate the taking of evidence by means of a shorthand writer; but I know that my opinion is not shared in by some other parties.

188. Even supposing the Sheriff were to dictate, would you not expect that with a shorthand writer the proof would be fuller than it would otherwise be?—The Sheriff could control that to a certain extent; but the shorthand writer goes away with it all in his pocket, and nobody knows exactly whether he has taken down what the Sheriff dictated; and when he comes back, there will be a discussion as to whether the witness said a particular thing, and the witness could not be called up at another diet.

189. The Lord Justice-General.—If the shorthand writer were to take down every word that is uttered by the examining procurator and by the witness, that would make the proof intolerably long?—Intolerably prolix, and quite unnecessary. There is another matter which is perhaps worthy of the attention of the Commission,—namely, the question of arrestments on the dependence. I think they often lead to very great abuse. A party brings an action of damages against another, laying the amount at £500 or £1000, and immediately on this trumped-up action proceeds to lock up the whole of the defender's funds by arrestment. No doubt the defender has his remedy, by presenting a petition for the loosing of these arrestments on caution; but it is perhaps worthy of consideration, whether there should not be some restriction of the power to arrest on the dependence.

190. Mr. Webster.—Has your attention ever been directed to the inconvenience caused by arrestments for founding jurisdiction, where the party whose funds are arrested can have no means whatever of getting the arrestments loosed, as he has no mode of getting access to the warrant, and cannot force the other party to proceed?—My attention has not been directed to that. But my attention has been directed to another very important subject,—namely, whether it is right that a workman's wages should be subject to arrestment.

191. The Lord Justice-General.—Before you leave the matter of arrestments on the dependence, have you any suggestions to make as to a remedy?—No, I have not. Very great hardship occasionally occurs; but at the same time, it would perhaps be difficult to hold that the power should be taken away altogether; and there is a safeguard, to a certain extent, in the power which the defender has immediately to present a petition for the loosing or recall of the arrestments. We have many incidental petitions on which we hear parties, and restrict the sum much under the sum covered by the arrestments; but in the meantime great hardship is suffered in a mercantile community by the defender having had his funds locked up upon a fictitious claim.

192. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make as to procedure in civil matters?—A suggestion has been put into my hands by one of the Sheriff-clerks-depute in Glasgow, who is a very intelligent man, to this effect, that there are at present before the Sheriff Court and other inferior courts a very great number of points of form and other matters in which the review of the superior courts is excluded by statute. These points mostly depend upon statutes under which very nice points are perpetually arising, and upon these different Sheriffs come to different opinions, so that on some of the points which are of great importance we find that in different parts of Scotland diametrically opposite views are taken. This is regarded as an evil, which I think it is; and the suggestion of the Sheriff-clerk-depute of Glasgow is, that where such cases occur, and where it is found to be of importance that a uniform interpretation of the Act should be had, the opinion of the Court of Session should be obtained upon it. He states that with reference to certain forms under the Small Debt Act, there is a wide diversity of practice in Scotland, and that the only mode by which the right interpretation of the Act could be got would be by an action of damages against a Sheriff-clerk for doing something in one county which is not done in another county. He also pointed out that under the Sheriff Court Act of 1853, if a process is not moved in for three months it falls asleep, and if it stands over for six months it is ipso facto held to be abandoned. For years, and ever since the Sheriff Court Act came into operation, it has been the practice in Glasgow, and I believe in Scotland, to hold that that did not apply to a sequestration for rent currente termino, in which very often no movement is made for three or six months. But on 21st February 1868, in the case of Paterson v. Munro, the Court of Session held that the provision of the Act does apply, and that the sequestration has fallen asleep if it has not been moved in within the three months. In that case a poor man, who thought that he was quite safe, found himself out of court. These are instances of difficult points in the construction of statutes in which the jurisdiction is in the Sheriff Court, but there are no direct means of ascertaining the mind of the Supreme Court as to the proper construction.

193. The Lord Justice-General.—The case of Paterson v. Munro does not seem a good illustration of that?—It is an illustration so far, because no direct appeal could be got, and it was only incidentally and accidentally that the point came up on an appeal recently to the court.

194. But appeal was not excluded there?—In many counties these sequestrations were supposed not to have fallen asleep, and that was thought safe practice; but when somebody did object, it has been found that the practice was altogether wrong. There are other cases in which there is no opportunity of getting the opinion of the Court of Session; and what the Sheriff-clerk suggests is, that it shall be in the power of a Sheriff-clerk of a county, or of any one having a substantial and direct interest in the matter, to report to the Lord Advocate that a certain doubt or difficulty has arisen; and that if the Lord Advocate is of opinion that it is a nice and doubtful point, he should have power to report it to the Court of Session, and get their judgment upon the true interpretation of a particular enactment. I do think that this is worthy of the consideration of the Commission, for I know that there is at this moment a diversity of interpretation of various sections of Acts of Parliament in different counties in Scotland, some of which interpretations must be wrong; and there are certain parties, Sheriff-clerks or others, in these counties liable in damages for wrong interpretation of the statutes. But that can never be cleared up till an action of damages is brought; whereas in the way suggested a rapid remedy would be got by bringing the matter under the notice of the Lord Advocate, with power to him to bring it before the Supreme Court. I can hand in the suggestion of the Sheriff-clerk for consideration.

195. Mr. Shand.—Would not a speedier mode be to give the Sheriff the power to state a special case?—But very often it does not come before the Sheriff. It is a duty imposed on the Sheriff-clerk, or some other officer.

196. Lord Justice-General.—And this proposal is, that the Sheriff-clerk or other such officer should have the power of consulting the court as to the interpretation of the Act?—Yes, through the Lord Advocate, and with his consent.

197. The Lord Advocate.—Would it not be better that he should consult the Sheriff?—But that would give no uniformity of judgment.

198. But the communication to the Lord Advocate might come through the Sheriff?—Yes; that might be easily arranged.

199. Mr. Shand.—You stated that the Act of 1853 was working well, and you suggested that power should be given to the Sheriff-substitute to allow the record to be amended, and that there should be fewer opportunities for appeals. Is there any other particular in which you think there should be an alteration in the provisions in the Act of 1853?—I think that every Sheriff-substitute, if that system is to be kept up, should, with reference to all his interlocutors except his final judgment, be bound, on the motion of either party, to give a short viva voce hearing as to whether he should make any alteration; and if that were done, it would put an end to a great many appeals to the Sheriff.

200. The Chairman.—Do you mean upon the merits?—No, that would be like restoring the old system of reclaiming petitions. I merely allude to interlocutory deliverances in the course of making up the record; and I find every day in my appeal court, that a portion of the appeals just require me to make certain alterations which the Sheriff-substitute would himself have made if the matter had been before him.

201. Mr Clark.—Would not the effect of giving that power be to give an opportunity for two re-hearings, and would it not be apt to be abused?—No; I think the motion would not be made unless the party believed that he could point out to the Sheriff something in which he had made a slight mistake; and I am strongly of opinion, that where appeals are to be allowed before the final one, they should in almost every instance be allowed only with the consent of the Sheriff-substitute.

202. Lord Barcaple.—Do your Sheriff-substitutes hold that they have power to alter an interlocutory judgment in the way you speak of, with consent of both parties?—I think so. If a minute of consent is put in, they are entitled to alter or recall any interlocutor they pronounce; but that is only with consent of both parties. There is another matter which is perhaps a little sentimental, but still I think it of importance. I know that there is great dislike to the word 'substitute' among the resident Sheriffs. They think it a word which unnecessarily and prominently brings them forward as inferior to the non-resident Sheriff; and when they feel that they are discharging very important and independent duties, they don't think they should be always represented to the county in which they live as substitutes for another. I think it is desirable to give them such names as gentlemen may bear without feeling that they are put into a position of inferiority. They are not inferior. The one is an appeal judge, whose judgments may or may not be better; but the others have onerous duties to perform, and they are brought more into contact with persons residing in the counties. I would therefore suggest that the name Sheriff-substitute should be altered. Whether they should be called Sheriff and Sheriff-depute, or Sheriff and Sheriff-principal, I do not say.

203. Mr. Clark.—Do you mean the principal Sheriff to be called depute?—No; but in some counties the Lord-Lieutenant is described as the Sheriff-principal, and the Sheriff-depute is not entitled to be called Sheriff-principal.

204. The Chairman.—Is there not a statute which allows the Sheriff to be addressed as Sheriff without the word 'depute?'—Yes, but not as Sheriff-principal; and when the late Lord Rutherfurd was Lord Advocate, there was a bill before Parliament which he was taking charge of, in one of the sections of which Sheriffs-principal were spoken of, and he ordered a printed circular to be sent from the Crown Office stating that 'principal' had been used by mistake in the section, and that it would be withdrawn.

205. Dean of Faculty.—Is there anything degrading in the term Sheriff-depute?—No; but I think it should be Sheriff, and something to distinguish the other Sheriff in some way. I would call the resident Sheriff, Sheriff.

206. You seem to think that calling a man Sheriff-substitute is humiliating. Does the same thing occur to you as to the term 'depute?'—No; he is known to be superior to the Sheriff-substitute, and he can submit to be called depute with a better grace.

207. The Chairman.—Although the Sheriff may be addressed as Sheriff, and not Sheriff-depute, he is often described as Sheriff-depute; and the reason of the change was, that it was an erroneous representation of his position, for he is not a depute of the Sheriff-principal.—The form of the writ is, 'You being brought before me or one of my substitutes;' and that suggests a feeling of inferiority.

208. The Lord Justice-General.—What would you propose? What would you say to 'one of my deputes?'—I think that would be better, because that has acquired a certain recognition; but I admit that the matter is a little sentimental.

209. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make as to procedure in civil matters?—No; I don't think so.

210. As to review in civil matters, is there any mode of obtaining a review that you think would be better than the present note of appeal?—No; I think it is very short and simple. In our Sheriff Court the agent just writes under the interlocutor, 'I appeal against the above interlocutor.'

211. As to review by the superior court, have you anything to suggest?—No. The doing away with the finding of caution for expenses has been in existence for about six months. On the one hand, it was said to be a great hardship that an honest litigant should be prevented from getting into the Court of Session till he can find caution for expenses, which he may not be able to do; and, on the other hand, such a provision gives great facility to a dishonest litigant to protract a case, and drag his adversary into the Court of Session.

212. Mr. Webster.—Would you not propose a limit as regards amount at which the judgment in the Sheriff Court should be final, in the same way that you have final judgments in the Small Debt Courts?—They are final at this moment up to £25, and it might be worthy of consideration whether the finality should not be extended to a considerably larger sum.

213. Mr. Shand.—Have you formed any opinion as to that?—I cannot say that I have; but I have frequently heard mercantile men say that they would like to see the finality of the Sheriff's judgments largely extended.

214. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say about costs?—The only remark I have to make on that is applicable to the Debts Recovery Act. In that Act there is a table of fees, and these are not according to the actual trouble, but according to the amount sued for. If appearance is entered to defend, suppose the amount sued for is £40, the defender may only object to a single item of ten shillings or a pound, and the expenses are £4; whereas if there is a decree in absence, the expenses are only ten shillings. It has been suggested to me that that is a hardship,—that it is not according to the trouble that the fee of £4 is allowed, but according to the sum concluded for, and that that should be remedied. The whole question of the mode in which expenses are disposed of under the Debts Recovery Act is perhaps worthy of reconsideration. I know that agents are not satisfied with the allowance made to them under that Act. Apparently it is an Act of which the public are going to avail themselves considerably, for we had in Glasgow during the first year upwards of 900 cases, and the number is increasing.

215. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion of your own to offer?—No.

216. The Lord Justice-General.—The table of fees is constructed on the principle of having fees of definite amount for every step, is it not?—No; if the sum concluded for is under £30, the fees for the whole procedure are so much; if it is above £30, the fees are so much more.

217. Mr. Murray.—It is an ad valorem scale?—Yes.

218. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you object to that?—Yes; it is objected to.

219. Mr. Murray.—Does not the same objection apply to all business paid for according to an ad valorem scale?—I don't know that we have such a scale in in any other form of process.

220. The Lord Advocate.—Are you aware of the rules regulating fees in County Courts in England?—No.

221. Mr. Campbell.—Does not this occur frequently in the case of a litigated action brought under the Debts Recovery Act, that there is first a short complaint and a note of pleas in law, and in the event of one of the litigants asking the Sheriff-substitute to make a note of the evidence, then from the time a record is made up by writing out the pleas in law by the Sheriff, the procedure is identical with what it would be in the ordinary roll?—Yes.

222. And notes for the purpose of appeal are just as full as they would be if the case were in the ordinary roll?—Yes.

223. And there may be several diets of proof, and the agent may attend for many hours, while under the Debts Recovery Act he will receive for his trouble only £2, 2s., whereas he would probably have had an account of £10 if the case had been in the ordinary roll?—That is true.

224. Is it not the case that the better class of agents decline to act in cases of that kind?—I know they complain that the scale of remuneration in that court is not sufficient.

225. The Chairman.—Is not the economy of expense in that court partly the cause of its popularity and utility?—No doubt of it. I think the only matter for consideration is, whether the ad valorem calculation of the expenses is a fair one, putting out of sight altogether the amount of procedure that may have taken place in the case. Twenty minutes may dispose of one case, while another may last over two or three weeks, and yet the fee is the same.

226. Mr. Harrison.—Don't you think the present ad valorem system more satisfactory to litigants, and perhaps to some agents, than any other that could be suggested?—I don't think it is so agreeable to agents.

227. Would a system by which fees were proportioned to the work done, not frighten a large portion of suitors out of court altogether?—One of the great attractions of that form of procedure to suitors is its cheapness.

228. The Lord Advocate.—Without wishing to express any opinion as to the mode of remuneration, allow me to ask you, whether agents may not receive as great remuneration when they are paid for this kind of business on an ad valorem scale, applicable to all cases, as they would otherwise do? May the fee not be larger than they would be entitled to in many of the cases, though smaller than they would be entitled to in others?—I daresay that is the fact.

229. Is it not a sort of satisfaction to the litigant to know that there is a limit to the costs of litigation?—Yes.

230. You say there has been a large increase of Sheriff Court business since that Act was passed?—There has been a large number of cases entered upon that roll.

231. Has there been a corresponding diminution in the other rolls?—Nothing like it. To make up for the decrease of 80 ordinary actions, there was an increase of 900 debts recovery cases, and there was also a considerable increase in the small debt cases.

232. Mr. Campbell.—If the Act is working well with reference to the enumerated class of cases, is there any reason why other pecuniary claims which do not exceed £50 in amount, should not be competently brought under the Debts Recovery Act, where the litigant is desirous that it should be so?—The class of cases that can be brought under that Act is limited. If it had been made to include the class of cases competent in the Small Debt Court, and extended them to £50, it would have saved discussion as to the competency of cases in that court; and I don't see why cases above £12 competent in the Small Debt Court should be excluded from the Debts Recovery Act. A bill debt may be recovered in the Small Debt Court, but not in the Debts Recovery Court.

233. Might not many demands, which are practically of the nature of demands ad facta præstanda, actions for delivery, etc., be brought in the summary form, with an option on the part of the defender, if he thinks the value exceeds £50, to state that in his defences, so as to have the case remitted to the ordinary roll as matter of right?—With reference to all actions ad facta præstanda, I prefer the present form of a summary petition, which is always proceeded with rapidly, and which distinctly states what you want the defender to do. I think that is better than making up a record under the Debts Recovery Act.

234. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to the privileges of agents?—I have had a memorandum put into my hand on that subject, in which it is said: 'Under this head a discussion will probably arise as to the propriety of establishing one general body of practitioners, authorized to plead in any inferior court in Scotland. But apart from questions of the vested rights of local bodies, the matter is beset with many difficulties. For instance, one evil would result to the larger towns: that is to say, practitioners in the smaller towns, who, when their character had become known, could not maintain a respectable position, would be driven into the larger cities, such as Glasgow or Edinburgh, where they would have greater facilities for conducting a pettifogging business, and become allies and colleagues to unlicensed practitioners and parties of inferior character, who are already present there in sufficient numbers.' These are thrown out as suggestions, if it is proposed, and I believe it is a favourite notion of some parties, that local practitioners all over Scotland should be entitled to practise in any Sheriff Court or other inferior court in Scotland, and that all exclusive rights and privileges should be done away with. This writer suggests that that might lead to serious evils, and that it would interfere very much with existing vested rights. At present, the practitioners of Glasgow act under a charter, which enables them to prevent any one from any other county practising in Glasgow. There are high fees charged for admission to the body; they undergo careful examinations; and to admit procurators all over the country to practise in Glasgow, would unquestionably inundate our courts with practitioners whom we would rather be without.

235. Is your opinion adverse to giving practitioners in Sheriff Courts the power to practise in all Sheriff Courts?—I have not fully considered the question. I merely throw out these as difficulties in the way.

236. Mr. Baxter.—The solicitors in Glasgow have exclusive privileges under their charter?—Yes.

237. What are they?—The exclusive privilege of their members practising before any courts in Glasgow or the Lower Ward.

238. What is the qualification for admission?—They have to undergo certain examinations.

239. Do they require to serve an apprenticeship?—Yes.

240. For how long?—I cannot say.

241. Have they to pay a certain sum of money to the body?—Yes.

242. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to agents in the Sheriff Courts following their causes into the Court of Session?—No, I have no suggestion to make upon that point.

243. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you think it desirable that they should be empowered to follow their causes when they come by appeal to the Court of Session, and to be in the Court of Session the sole agents in these appeals?—I see no harm in giving them that power; but, in point of fact, I don't believe it would be exercised. I know that it is a power which is not valued or cared for much by the procurators in Glasgow.

244. The Chairman.—Would it not require some person in Edinburgh to represent such distant procurators, and to be responsible for the process?—Certainly; and that is the reason why it would be inoperative. A procurator in good practice in Glasgow would not leave his practice to come to Edinburgh and look after a case here; he would have to communicate with some one in Edinburgh. He has now his correspondent in Edinburgh, and I think that system would be followed still; but a power might be given to the country practitioner to come to Edinburgh if he liked.

245. Do you think it expedient to remove the obstacle that is considered to exist as to the communication of profits between the Edinburgh agent and the country agent?—I really am ignorant on that subject. I don't know what the ordinary arrangements between the Edinburgh agent and the country agent are, and I cannot make any suggestion about it.

246. Mr. Baxter.—Is your principal Sheriff-clerk resident, and does he perform the duty of Sheriff-clerk?—No.

247. The Chairman.—When was he appointed?—A number of years ago, at the time when it was not imperative on the Sheriff-clerk to reside in the county.

248. Then he does not fall within the operation of the Act of Parliament on that subject?—No; and he is one of the few remaining Sheriff-clerks remunerated by fees, and not by salary.

249. Mr. Baxter.—Does he do the duty by deputy?—Yes.

250. How many deputies has he?—Four in Glasgow, besides three others.

251. The Lord Justice-General.—Is he the only Sheriff-clerk in Scotland who holds his office on that tenure?—There may be another, but there are not more.

252. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make?—No; and I should just like to say, in conclusion, that I trust no portion of the evidence I have given has suggested the idea that I have come here with any particular nostrum, or special predilection for some branch of law reform. I would wish to guard myself against that supposition. I have been so thoroughly occupied for many years in administering the law as it exists, that I have not had time to consider, with the care it demands, the large subject of proposed improvements either in practice or principle.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

DONALD MACKENZIE, Esq. examined.

Donald Mackenzie.

253. The Chairman.—You are the Sheriff of Fifeshire?—I am.

254. How long have you been so?—Since January 1861.

255. For how many years have you been a practising advocate?—Since May or June 1842. I may mention that I was an advocate-depute for about seven years.

256. The county of Fife is a county of large extent and population?—It is. The population, which I got from the almanac, is 153,180, and the rental is £829,982. Its extent is about 503 square miles.

257. How many substitutes have you?—Two, one at Cupar, and the other at Dunfermline.

258. What is the number of causes brought into your ordinary court?—I am afraid I cannot answer that question; but I do not think there has been a large increase in the number of ordinary causes since the last Law Report. If time had permitted, it was my intention to have got full returns on this and other points; but I have not had time since I received notice that I was to be examined.

259. There is an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to your judgment?—There is; and that appeal may be had without any charge, where the parties do not lodge a reclaiming petition, or crave an oral hearing.

260. The Lord Advocate.—Except the clerk's fee?—There is a clerk's fee of 6d. or 1s.

261. Mr. Baxter.—Is it the general practice to ask for an oral hearing?—It is in Fife.

262. Lord Barcaple.—May either party ask it?—No, only the appellant.

263. Mr. Baxter.—But the other party is heard?—Not if the appellant does not crave an oral hearing.

264. But if he does?—Then both parties are heard. Where the sum sued for is below £25, the fee for an oral hearing is 20s.

265. The Chairman.—Who does that fee go to?—It is the procurator's fee. Where the sum is under £100, it is 30s.; above £100, £2; and there is no higher fee allowed by the last Act of Sederunt.

266. Is it more usual to have a reclaiming petition or an oral hearing?—It is much more usual to have an oral hearing in the courts of Fife; and reclaiming petitions are the exception. I find that in cases where the litigant is doubtful of success in his appeal, a reclaiming petition is sometimes lodged, as it is my practice not to order Answers where I am satisfied that the judgment is right. There is thus only the expense of one side incurred. I should mention also that, so far as I know, every case almost is appealed. There are few exceptions.

267. Mr. Baxter.—Do you mean on the merits?—Yes, on the final judgment of the Sheriff-substitute.

268. Are there often intermediate appeals?—There are a good many on the points allowed by the last Sheriff Court Act of 1853.

269. The Chairman.—Do you know the proportion of the cases appealed where the judgment by you has been an affirmance of the judgment by the Sheriff-substitute?—I cannot tell your lordship that. I have two able substitutes; and there are not many reversals.

270. Do you know the number of advocations?—They are very small. I cannot give the number; but I doubt very much if they are 2 per cent. of the decided causes since I have been appointed Sheriff. I may be wrong in that, but that is my impression. I judge from what I see in the rolls of the Court of Session.

271. Have you any observations to make to the Commissioners as to the present constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of a Sheriff and substitutes?—As regards the present constitution, namely whether the Sheriff-substitute should be abolished, I am of opinion that he should not, but that the present constitution of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute should be maintained. It is my opinion that if greater facilities were afforded for the despatch of business, not only might the territory of the Sheriff be enlarged, but the territory of the Sheriff-substitute might also be enlarged. Thus, for example, I think the whole of Fife and Kinross might, if a shorthand writer were employed for the taking of proofs, be with advantage placed under the jurisdiction of one Sheriff-substitute, with a larger salary than is at present allowed to any of the three present substitutes. I believe that would tend to the better administration of justice, because that single Sheriff-substitute having more to do, his mind would be more constantly engaged in the practice of law, and he would be better qualified to discharge the duties of his office. I do not think he would be overworked.

272. Do you think any inconvenience would arise from that arrangement in regard to the distances that parties would be removed from the Sheriff-substitute, in cases of summary application?—I think the means of communication are so very ample between the extreme east of Fife and the extreme west of Fife and Kinross, by means of railways, that there would not be much difficulty arising on that account. The chief difficulty that has impressed itself on my mind is in regard to the disposal of summary criminal complaints which are tried before the Sheriff; but I think that looking to the facilities of railway communication, there is nothing to prevent the Sheriff-substitute from going from Cupar to Dunfermline and Kinross, at stated intervals, to try these summary cases. Besides the saving to the Exchequer of two substitutes, there would be a saving to the county of Fife of a prison at Dunfermline, and to the county of Kinross of one prison,—of course, the two counties paying their share of the general assessment for one prison.

273. You would have the seat of the court at Cupar?—I would. I think also, that the territory of the Sheriff might with advantage be enlarged. I think there are many sheriffdoms which are too small.

274. Have you any other observations to make upon the constitution of the court?—I think the present mode of appointing the Sheriff-substitutes ought to be adhered to; and I cannot add anything to what is contained in the Law Report of 1854 upon that subject.

Donald Mackenzie.

I think the interest of the Sheriff is so very great in the appointment of an efficient substitute, that the appointment ought to be left in his hands.

275. Mr. Baxter.—You would prefer that to an appointment by the Crown?—Yes. My own experience, since I came to the bar, is that the Sheriffs, without regard to social or party ties, look out for the best men they can get. An inefficient substitute, in consequence of the forms of our judgment, in which the grounds are stated, and otherwise, would entail a large amount of labour and responsibility on his Sheriff.

276. Lord Barcaple.—You have spoken of the saving of time to be attained by having proofs taken by a shorthand writer. Have you, as a judge, had any experience of that?—I have not. It is allowed in the Debts Recovery Act. I have seen it only in the Court of Session. I would not, in the general case, adopt the practice which is followed in the Court of Session, of allowing the shorthand writer to take down the evidence as it comes from the mouth of the witness. I would make it imperative on the judge to dictate the combined result of the question and answer to the shorthand writer, and, in important parts of the evidence, to take down the question and answer ad longum. I believe there would be a saving of expense from that procedure, in consequence of the shortening of the period employed in taking proofs.

277. Mr. Paterson.—Would you, in that case, dispense with the witnesses signing the depositions?—Surely.

278. That would obviate the inconvenience of their remaining till the shorthand writer's notes were extended?—Yes.

279. Mr. Baxter.—Would you read over the depositions to the witnesses?—The shorthand writer could do that if it were found necessary. My experience in the practice of the Court of Session has been, that there is no difficulty, when we want information upon any part of the evidence, in the shorthand writer turning it up, and reading what has been said. I do not propose that it shall be imperative to employ a shorthand writer. I only propose that it shall be in the power of the Sheriff to do it where he can get a good shorthand writer; and I believe that in most of the county towns there are good shorthand writers, in consequence of there being newspapers there.

280. Mr. Shand.—Is it according to your experience in the Court of Session that the use of a shorthand writer adds very much to the length of the evidence,—I mean to what is written down?—It is; but my remedy for that is, that the judge should dictate the combined result of the question and answer to the shorthand writer. I think that would not add to the length of it at all.

281. Is it not a provision in the Court of Session Act that the judge shall dictate?—He may, if he think fit.

282. Mr. Adam.—Supposing you were still to have two substitutes, do you think that the present territorial division of the county is a right one?—Do you mean, would I re-divide the districts?

283. Yes?—No; I think great disadvantage and inconvenience might follow from that. I would adhere to the present division of the county. The Sheriff-substitute at Cupar is not overworked. I may mention that Clackmannan and part of Perth lie immediately to the west of Fife and Kinross, and I think that this part of Perth ought to be absorbed either into Fife or Clackmannan, and not left as it is at present. There would be no difficulty as regards that detached part of Perthshire, because it is well known and defined.

284. The Chairman.—Would you make that alteration of boundary apply merely to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, or would you make it applicable to other matters?—I would make it applicable to other matters coming under his cognisance.

285. But only as regards the Sheriff?—Only as regards the Sheriff.

286. Not as regards the assessments, or matters of that kind?—No, I think not; I think that is a matter which is more properly for the Commissioners of Supply to decide as to whether it would be for their advantage.

287. Or the registration of writs?—Yes; I think the registration of writs falls under the cognisance of the Sheriff; and I think it would be proper that they should be all brought into the county town, whatever it may be.

288. Sasines, or what comes in place of them?—A recent statute provides for the abolition of the Particular Registers of Sasines.

289. Would you have the Commissioners of Supply to belong to each county?—Unless the Commissioners of Supply, under powers given to them by Parliament, resolved to join the two counties, I would have them to remain as at present; but that is a matter which falls more under their province.

290. Police committee?—I think matters of police ought to be under the Sheriff; and the assessment, of course, would fall to be made rateably, according to the respective valuations of the two counties.

291. Would that involve an alteration of the law, as to who constitute the police committee?—It might, or it might not. The police committee, for example, of one of the counties might appoint their constables, and the police committee for the other might appoint their constables, and yet they would all be under the orders of one Sheriff and one Chief Constable, and the combined committees might elect that Chief Constable.

292. In that view, the police committees would remain separate?—Yes.

293. They would not be combined?—I do not see any great advantage or disadvantage that would follow from adopting either course.

294. Does anything else occur to you as to the constitution of the Sheriff Courts?—No.

295. The Lord Advocate.—It seems to be your opinion that since the last adjustment of the extent of the jurisdictions of the Sheriffs, and the districts of the Sheriff-substitutes, there have been such facilities of locomotion, by means of railways, that you could unite counties and districts that are at present under separate Sheriff-substitutes?—I am of that opinion; and I think that might be carried to a very considerable extent.

296. Mr. Adam.—In taking judicial declarations, would you take the prisoner to the Sheriff, or the Sheriff to the prisoner, under that system?—I would take the prisoner to the Sheriff for various reasons; and among others, that if he is committed to prison, the prison is at the place where the Sheriff takes the declaration.

297. The Chairman.—Does anything occur to you as to the jurisdiction of Sheriff Courts in civil matters, as to whether they might be extended or limited, and if so, with regard to what subjects?—I think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in various civil matters might be extended; I think that as regards suspension, reduction, and declarator, his jurisdiction in regard to moveables should be extended so as to include all matters on which he could adjudicate in an ordinary action. For example, it is not competent, by the present procedure, for the Sheriff to entertain an action of reduction of a moveable writ under the Act 1696. I am of opinion that that ought to be made competent.

298. Whatever might be the ground of reduction?—Whatever might be the ground of reduction. I think that his jurisdiction should also be extended to actions of separation and aliment between husband and wife, and to actions of divorce. I think it is a very great hardship at present, that the poorer classes of society have, in cases which would warrant a separation or a divorce, no other court to go to than the Court of Session, where the expense is considerable.

299. Mr. Baxter.—Would you apply that to questions under the Conjugal Rights Act, such as protection of the wife's earnings, and provision to be made for her in the case of desertion?—Yes; I do not see any objection to these being committed to the Sheriff.

300. Extraordinary removings?—Yes, and extraordinary removings. I see no reason why they should not be quite competent to the Sheriff. I know of no ground on which they should be privative to the Court of Session.

301. The Lord Justice-General.—What do you say as to declarators of marriage?—I am of opinion that declarators of marriage ought not to be made competent to the Sheriff Courts; I think the rights at issue there are so vast that they ought only to be adjudicated on in the Court of Session.

302. I suppose the same observation applies to declarators of legitimacy and bastardy?—It does.

303. Mr. Baxter.—What is your opinion as to the appointment of trustees under lapsed trusts, factors loco tutoris, or curators bonis?—I am of opinion that it ought to remain with the Court of Session, as at present. I am aware that occasionally the commissaries have appointed factors; but that is not common.

304. Are you aware that in the case of small estates, there is often very heavy expense incurred in the appointment of factors?—The remedy for that would be to cut down the expense.

305. But I mean expenses in the Court of Session?—In some cases that may be so, but not in all cases. I think it very important that a party holding the office of judicial factor, should discharge that office under the control of the Court, and the Accountant of the Court of Session,—he is so completely master of the subject committed to his charge.

306. The Chairman.—Do these exhaust the points as to which you would extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction in civil matters?—Yes.

307. What is your opinion as to heritage?—I think that divisions of commonty might with advantage be committed to the Sheriff, with an immediate right of appeal to the Court of Session upon a decision on the title to insist in the action, if the title should be objected to. I can see no reason why the procedure in divisions of commonty should not take place before the Sheriff instead of a commissioner as at present, but rather the reverse. I think it will be as well, if not better done by the Sheriff. There will be a great saving of expense to the litigants; and the appeal from the decision of the Sheriff can be at once to the Inner House, where it can be adjudicated on as it now is upon the report of the commissioner. I think also that provings of the tenor might with advantage be allowed in the Sheriff Court. I think there would be a saving in taking the proof there; and if a State were dispensed with, which humbly appears to me to be unnecessary, the appeal against the Sheriff's decision at once to the Inner House would be a saving of expense and of time. I think that all questions touching heritable rights between conterminous proprietors, and between a proprietor and the public, ought to be made competent before the Sheriff. These questions generally are, in so far as regards the right of possession, brought before the Sheriff, and frequently the parties remain satisfied with his decision upon the question of possession, and the case goes no further. I think the Sheriff ought to have full right to decide the question of title, the appeal to the Court of Session being, as at present, by a simple note of appeal.

308. Lord Barcaple.—Do you refer to cases where the question is entirely one of boundary?—Yes. I have a case at this moment in the Court of Session where the question at issue is as regards the property of a very considerable amount of hill ground, the simple question being whether the march or boundary is on one side of a hill or the other. It originated in interdicts in the Sheriff Court. A proof of 300 or 400 pages was taken, and that proof was informal, because it was taken by a commissioner, contrary to statute. A declarator was raised in the Court of Session, which is now depending before one of the Lords Ordinary, and in that declarator the Sheriff Court proof has, by consent, been adopted as part of the evidence. I think that case might with advantage have been decided by the Sheriff at once, and on his notes of evidence brought up to the Court of Session.

309. The Lord Advocate.—Does your observation apply also to rights of way?—Yes, I said so,—all questions between a proprietor and the public.

310. And it would be competent for either party, who wished a jury trial, to advocate with a view to jury trial?—Yes, if that clause in the Act of Parliament were not abolished. I think it would be a great advantage to the community if all questions touching heritable rights of a certain small value, as appearing in the valuation roll, were made competent to the Sheriff, because I think it a great hardship, particularly in counties like Fife, where properties are much subdivided, and there is a large amount of urban subjects, that parties cannot try the right to a subject of the value of £200 or £300 without the necessity of a declarator in the Court of Session. It humbly appears to me, to use an old French proverb—que le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle—the expense is frequently greater than the value of the subject. I should have stated that, as regards moveable rights, it appears to me that the process of cessio should always originate in the Sheriff Court. There is another matter which I think might with advantage be altered, and that is the right to use inhibition in a form similar to that conferred by the recent Court of Session Act in actions above a certain amount, say £150 or £200. It seems to me also that adjudication in regard to subjects of small value, as appearing in the valuation roll of the county, ought to be made competent in the Sheriff Court for the purpose of saving expense.

311. Mr. Baxter.—Have you formed any idea of the limit?—I would be inclined to carry it to about £500, taking that as a sort of average of the value of the small properties throughout the county.

312. The Lord Advocate.—How would you propose to ascertain the value?—By the valuation roll of the county. I do not think it would be advisable to allow such actions to proceed unless the value of the subjects appeared in the valuation roll, because that would give rise to constant questions as to value.

313. The Chairman.—Where would you record an inhibition?—In the register in Edinburgh.

314. The Lord Advocate.—You say you would ascertain the value by reference to the valuation roll; but suppose the question was with regard to the gable of a house, would you take the value of the whole property on which the house belonging to that person is situated, or merely the value of the house?—That would fall under the former question which I answered—namely, questions between conterminous proprietors. That is a question of boundary.

315. The Lord Justice-General.—No; it is a question of property?—But I stated formerly that it was my opinion that all questions touching heritable rights between conterminous proprietors, and between proprietors and the public, ought to be adjudicated on in the Sheriff Court,—that a co-ordinate jurisdiction in regard to these should be conferred upon that court and the Court of Session.

316. Lord Barcaple.—You mean by that, in cases where there is a question of boundary?—As to property.

317. You mean whether on one side or other of a certain line, the property belongs to A. or to B., which of course is a question of heritable property, but it turns on a dispute as to boundary between two neighbouring proprietors?—Yes.

318. Mr. Shand.—Does the valuation roll show anything except annual value?—It does not.

319. Then is it annual value you would look to, or the real value of the subject?—I had not adverted to that, but I think no difficulty would thence arise. You could take so many years' value of the subject.

320. The Chairman.—When you spoke of value according to the valuation roll, you meant the price or value?—Yes; it had escaped my recollection at the time that the valuation roll only gave the yearly value. Then I think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in regard to feu-duties, conferred by the 32d section of the Sheriff Court Act of 1853, ought to be extended to at least £50.

321. The Lord Justice-General.—What is it now?—£25.

322. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make on this point?—No.

323. The Lord Advocate.—Have there been many actions under the Debts Recovery Act in your Sheriff Court?—There has not been a very great number. I may mention, that the last time I went the Small Debt Circuit during October, I think I had two cases at Kirkcaldy for sums falling under that statute, and one case at Anstruther which did not fall under the statute. It was brought as falling under the statute; but I satisfied the party that it did not do so, and he withdrew it.

324. Have there been many cases before your substitutes?—I should think that illustration which I have given is very much what takes place at each circuit.

325. Then you destroy the procedure under that Act altogether?—In my humble opinion that Act ought to be repealed. I think, in the first place, that the remuneration given to the procurators of court is not sufficient, and I think it very inexpedient to have three forms of process in the Sheriff Court. I think that the form of process instituted by the Act of 1853, if properly worked, would give all the advantages, as regards despatch and economy, which a litigant is fairly entitled to expect.

326. Mr. Baxter.—Before leaving the matter of heritable jurisdiction, I understand you think that except in the case of conterminous proprietors, or questions between a proprietor and the public, the Sheriff should have no jurisdiction in heritable matters, and that he should have no jurisdiction in determining the right to a property, supposing it does not arise between conterminous proprietors?—I would extend his jurisdiction to heritable subjects of small value up to £500 in all cases.

327. Mr. Clark.—Do you propose that the Sheriff should have power to reduce all deeds disposing of moveables?—I think he ought.

328. All deeds?—All deeds disposing of moveables.

329. Wills, whatever may be the amount that may be disposed of by them?—I think so. I would, in civil matters, allow the Sheriff to try every cause which would have been competent in his court by ordinary action, including suspension, reduction, and declarator, with the exception of suspensions of decrees of other courts.

330. You think the Sheriff should try reductions on the head of fraud or of incapacity?—Yes, and cases under the Bankrupt Acts.

331. Would you propose that these should be tried by the Sheriff himself, or by the Sheriff and a jury?—I would not propose that they should be tried before the Sheriff and a jury. I think such a form of procedure would be attended with great expense. I think the mode of taking evidence in the Sheriff Court at present is far more advantageous than trial by jury would be.

332. And if a settlement, disposing of moveables alone, was challenged on the ground of incapacity, or of facility and fraud, you would allow that question to be determined in the first instance by the Sheriff?—Yes; I can see no reason why it should be competent to the Sheriff to adjudicate on an action for a sum of money, even £100,000, and incompetent for him to adjudicate in such cases as these.

333. Mr. Campbell.—If either party thought proper, he might have the remedy provided by the 40th section of the Judicature Act?—Yes.

334. Mr. Clark.—You would propose to leave that remedy existing?—I think that except in a very limited class of actions, trial by jury ought not to be maintained. By the Jury Court Act, power is given to the Court to set aside the verdict of a jury if contrary to evidence, thereby proceeding on the implication that the Court is a better judge of evidence than the jury; and it appears to me inconsistent with sound common sense not to avail one's self of the best tribunal for the decision of fact. I think a tribunal of twelve jurymen, unaccustomed to consider questions of disputed fact, and unaccustomed to consider questions of law as applied to disputed facts, is not a tribunal from which such accuracy can be expected as we ought to have in the decision of the causes submitted to them; and I would have far more confidence in the opinion of a tribunal of judges, who would find the facts, and apply the law to the decision of the cause, and whose judgment, if it were not sound, could be set aside in the court of appeal.

335. The Chairman.—You said, with the exception of certain cases; what are these cases?—Actions of damages for slander, oral and written. That is one class of cases that occurs to me at this moment.

336. Mr. Baxter.—Actions of damages generally?—No; I think many actions of damages would be much better adjudicated upon by a judge than by a jury.

337. The Lord Advocate.—When they are founded on fraud?—Yes. I think the judge would not be led away by feeling, but would deal strictly with the evidence, and with the actual injury inflicted.

338. The Chairman.—Is the only illustration of cases that you would except actions of damages for slander?—I have not the cases before me at this moment.

339. Mr. Clark.—Assault?—Yes; actions of damages for assault.

340. Lord Barcaple.—Seduction?—Yes.

341. Crim. con.?—Yes.

342. The Chairman.—Railway accidents?—Railway accidents too.

343. The Lord Justice-General.—What do you say of them?—I think I would leave them to be tried by a jury.

344. Mr. Campbell.—But all of these can be tried before the Sheriff Court?—Yes. I think if trial by jury is to be maintained in the Court of Session, these ought to be left to a jury. I think if I had a case of my own to try, I would rather have the opinion of a judge than of a jury upon it.

345. Mr. Shand.—Including the amount of damages?—Yes.

346. Have you not very frequently to assess damages in actions brought in your own court as Sheriff?—I have had to do that several times; and I have found the assessing of damages attended with very great difficulty indeed, thereby showing me that it is not such an easy matter as people think.

347. Mr. Adam.—Do you mean that you would rather have the opinion of a single judge than the opinion of a judge and jury?—I would; but I would rather have the opinion of three judges than of a single judge, because humanum est errare; I should have more confidence in the three than in the one.

348. Mr. Harrison.—Even in the cases you have excepted, you don't think the decision of a jury would be better than that of a single well-trained judge, or more likely to be correct?—I think if the jury were sensible men, they would read the mind of the judge, and give their verdict accordingly.

349. Mr. Paterson.—I think you said you would give the Sheriff jurisdiction in actions of divorce?—I would.

350. But you would continue the privative jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in actions of declarator of marriage and legitimacy?—I would.

351. I suppose you would do so on the ground that these questions, besides involving patrimonial interests of great extent, involve also the status of the parties?—I would. Generally speaking, these actions are not brought except where there are large patrimonial interests at stake.

352. May that not be so in an action of divorce?—I think it is not nearly so frequent. I cannot understand why it should not be competent to the Sheriff to decide on a question of criminal intercourse, while it is competent for him to decide on other criminal matters of great importance.

353. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you think that if the action of divorce is made privative to the Court of Session, many poor people are deprived of a remedy?—I have no doubt whatever that it is so; and I think it would be for the benefit of public morals that actions of divorce should be rendered competent in the Sheriff Court.

354. The husband has to pay the expenses in these cases?—Yes.

355. Mr. Clark.—Would you allow review?—I would make the judgment of the Sheriff subject to review.

356. Do you think you would get the judgment much cheaper in that case, than if you began in the Court of Session?—I think so. I think returns from the Sheriff Courts would show that investigation into facts there is not expensive, whereas in the Court of Session it is so from various causes, and in particular from the fact that counsel and agents have to be employed.

357. Mr. Campbell.—In such cases, I presume, you would not propose that there should be an advocation to the Lord Ordinary, but that such cases should go direct to the Inner House?—I meant that; and the recent statute makes that imperative. I think also that it is a matter deserving of the consideration of this Commission, whether in a case which commences in the Sheriff Court, a right of appeal to the House of Lords should be allowed. There must be an end at some time of the right of appealing. One difficulty which has occurred to me was started in consequence of a case in which I was employed to draw defences in an action raised in the Sheriff Court of Glasgow, where the sum at stake was about £12,000; and to meet a difficulty of that kind I would allow the defender, either when the record was closed or when the proof was closed, before taking the judgment of the Sheriff, to advocate to the Court of Session with the view of preserving his right of appeal. Of course it is no hardship to the pursuer to be shut out of an appeal, because he has chosen his court.

358. The Lord Justice-General.—I understand you to say, that if a pursuer adopts the course of raising his action in the Sheriff Court, and then an appeal is taken to the Court of Session, you would allow no appeal in that case to the House of Lords?—Quite so.

359. By either party?—Yes.

360. But subject to this condition, that before judgment in the Sheriff Court, either party might remove the case into the Court of Session, with the view of preserving his right of appeal to the House of Lords?—Instead of either party, I said the defender, because I don't think the pursuer can complain of being shut out of his appeal when he himself has originated the action in the Sheriff Court, with full knowledge that the consequence of his doing so is to prevent him appealing to the House of Lords.

361. You would not allow him to change his mind?—No. I think that would obviate what has been found to be an evil, viz. a rich litigant carrying a poor litigant to the House of Lords.

362. Mr. Shand.—Do you think that many cases which originate in the Sheriff Court now reach the House of Lords?—They are very few.

363. And they only reach the House of Lords now on matters of law, the findings in fact of the Court below being conclusive?—Yes.

364. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you any idea of the number of appeals in such cases to the House of Lords?—They are very few.

365. Do they amount to one or two in the course of a year?—I don't think they amount to so many.

366. Mr. Campbell.—Some important questions involving the principles of the poor-law, and some questions with reference to possession between coterminous proprietors, originating in the Sheriff Court within the last few years, have been tried and determined in the House of Lords; for instance, Barbour v. Adamson, and Tennent v. The Earl of Glasgow. These originated in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

367. The Lord Justice-General.—I understand your reason for making the suggestion that there should be no appeal to the House of Lords where the case originates in the Sheriff Court, is because of the extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction which you are suggesting?—Yes; and also because I think it is not sound to allow an appeal to a court where the expense is so great, in matters which in general are much below the amount of the cost.

368. But your reason for making the suggestion is because you recommend the extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction in the way you have already stated. Is that not what makes the suggestion of more importance?—It would make it undoubtedly of more importance.

369. One of your objections to the Debts Recovery Act is the excessively small remuneration of the procurators. Do you think that that part of the statute has operated to prevent its being so much used as it might otherwise have been?—I can only speak from hearsay on that point. I have heard that in one county in Scotland the procurators as a body have refused to work it, and I know there is a general feeling of dissatisfaction in regard to the remuneration allowed. There is also hearsay in the Parliament House, as to the remuneration in one of the causes appealed to the court having been, considering the time employed, actually below that of a labourer.

370. Have you any objection to mention the county to which you have referred?—I understand that in Ayrshire the procurators have not worked the Act, but that is merely hearsay.

371. I understand your other objection is, that it introduces a third form of process into the Sheriff Court?—Yes; and it introduces a form of process which the Sheriff has difficulty in working, because at the end of the small debt cases of the day, at Kirkcaldy for example, when he is worn out and exhausted, he is obliged to sit down and draw a note of the pleas of the parties. He has no library at hand to assist him in that, and every one knows that in the actions mentioned in the Debts Recovery Act nice questions of law may arise.

372. You said you thought that under the Act of 1853 there was a very excellent form of process applicable to all such cases, if it was properly worked?—I think so.

373. With reference to that qualification as to its being properly worked, do you think it is well worked or not?—I think that in some counties it is well worked, and it is becoming daily better worked. But I think that Condescendences and Defences, as a rule, are more frequently ordered than they might be, even in the best counties. I have frequently myself called the attention of the procurators to that, and I have said that at the end of the litigation I would find the party who had moved for the order not entitled to the expense of them if he won the case.

374. Mr. Baxter.—Has the Sheriff power to order a record to be made up either by condescendence and answers or by a short minute?—He has.

375. Mr. Campbell.—Is it the duty of the Sheriff to be satisfied, before he orders a record, that such is prima facie a proper course in the circumstances of the case?—It is so.

376. And he takes the responsibility of the record, so that there is never any record in process of the fact that there has been a desire expressed by either of the parties that that particular form should be adopted?—That is generally the case. The usual record in the interlocutor sheet is, 'Appoints condescendence and defences in terms of the statute;' and except by inquiry at the parties themselves, it is difficult to ascertain the grounds on which, or the party at whose instance it has been done.

377. The Lord Justice-General.—But I understand you to be of opinion that condescendence and answers are too often ordered in practice?—I think they might be dispensed with in the great majority of causes in which they are now ordered, or in the great majority of causes which come into court.

378. Lord Barcaple.—I suppose there is pressure put on the judge by the procurators, who say that they think condescendence and answers will really turn out to be advantageous, and at the end of the cause the judge is disappointed as to that?—Yes; and it is oftener done in the case of a judge who has administered the old forms of process, and who has a natural bias in that direction.

379. Mr. Baxter.—Does it not invariably happen that where condescendence and answers are ordered, there are also revisals?—In only one or two cases in Fife have I seen a revisal of the condescendence and defences. The condescendence is put in, and then the defences; if there is a statement of facts in the defences, that is answered on the condescendence, and the record is closed. I ought to state that there are very good records prepared in the Sheriff Courts of Fife, and that is entirely the result of Mr. Taylor's and Mr. Bell's knowledge of law and of the forms of process.

Donald Mackenzie.

380. Mr Clark.—Do you find in your Sheriff Court that the absence of a condescendence—that is to say, the closing of a record on the short minute—gives occasion to adjournments of the proof in the course of taking the proof?—I have, I think, only in two cases since I was appointed Sheriff, found it necessary to allow proof in replication. There is no adjournment of the proof allowed; but at the close of the defender's proof, the question may arise, Has the pursuer been taken by surprise on a certain point? And I think I have been twice called on to allow proof in replication. One of these was in an affiliation case, and the other in an ordinary action.

381. But I mean on points arising in the examination of the witnesses?—No, it comes up on a motion for a proof in replication.

382. Mr. Baxter.—Have you often appeals in the course of a proof?—There is only one appeal allowed by the 17th section of the Act of 1853, and it is at the close of the proof.

383. The Lord Justice-General.—There is one part of the Act of 1853 regarding the proofs, which makes a very special provision for the proof being taken continuously and without adjournment as far as possible, and requiring that wherever adjournment takes place it shall be on special cause shown and set forth in the interlocutor making the adjournment. Do you think that has been attended to in practice?—In the county of Fife it has in practice been attended to, with one or two exceptions. So far as my experience goes, in litigations from other counties in which I have acted as counsel in the Court of Session, I should say the practice was the other way, and that it has not been attended to; but that is only an inference of mine from what I have seen in these few cases.

384. Do you think it very desirable that that part of the Act should be strictly worked?—I do. I think it very desirable that the forms of process from the commencement of the action down to the decision of it should be strictly worked. With that view, I think that no condescendence and defences ought to be allowed except on very special cause shown and stated in the interlocutor of the Sheriff. I think the moment the record is closed, a day within a week should be appointed for hearing parties on it, if they will not renounce probation; and at that meeting, or immediately thereafter, the Sheriff-substitute should appoint a diet of proof, and he should take that proof consecutively, and give his decision in the cause. I would then limit the right of appeal and the right to crave an oral hearing to eight days instead of fifteen days as at present; and I would appoint the Sheriff to go down to his county more frequently than he does at present, to dispose of these oral hearings. The statute only requires quarterly sittings. I would also dispense with reclaiming petitions, except when ordered by the Sheriff, and in causes allowed by the statute. In that way I think more despatch would be got. I think there is great misapprehension on the part of the public as to the appeal to the Sheriff creating delay and expense. The delay, in my humble opinion, is caused by the litigants themselves. The expense, for the reasons I have already stated, is not caused by any appeal to the Sheriff, for the highest fees allowed in actions above £100 is £2 on each side; and my experience is that the decision of the Sheriff is generally got within a month after the decision of the Sheriff-substitute, and frequently less.

385. Lord Barcaple.—Where an appeal is taken without a reclaiming petition or a re-hearing being asked, can the Sheriff competently dispose of the appeal, to the effect of altering the judgment without a re-hearing?—He can.

386. Where the appeal is taken without a hearing being asked, or a reclaiming petition being lodged, has the Sheriff power at present to order a hearing if he thinks proper?—He has. The words of the statute are, that he may proceed to dispose of the appeal without further argument, thereby inferring that he may order further argument.

387. In point of practice, does the Sheriff ever alter the judgment without hearing parties or having written argument?—I think I have done it when I had no difficulty, and the judgment appeared to me so clearly wrong as to require no further argument.

388. But what argument had you before you in these cases?—I have put the case in the motion roll, to get explanations from the parties, and any authorities they had to cite, being unwilling to put them to the expense of an oral hearing. In that way I got the benefit of their remarks, and all the authorities they had to cite in regard to the judgment. It is generally in cases of small value, or where the interlocutor is clearly right, that a simple appeal, without oral hearing or reclaiming petition, is taken.

389. Mr. Campbell.—Is such an appeal generally taken for the purposes of delay?—I rather think so.

390. Mr. Clark.—Would you limit the number of appeals competent before final judgment?—I cannot see how that could be done. I think the Act of 1853 cut them as low as they could be.

391. Mr. Webster.—Would you still leave it in the power of the parties to have a reclaiming petition and answers?—I would not leave it in the power of the parties, but in the power of the Sheriff, in special cases requiring extraordinary despatch.

392. The Lord Advocate.—Suppose an appeal is taken and supported by reclaiming petition, would you order answers or a hearing?—In that case I would order answers, as authorized by statute. But I never order answers as a matter of course; I read the reclaiming petition first.

393. Mr. Clark.—Suppose both parties appeal against the judgment, and one craves an oral hearing, and the other lodges a reclaiming petition, what do you do in that case?—That has occurred to me, and I think it a blot in the statute. I think it ought not to be allowed; and it would be prevented by dispensing with reclaiming petitions except by order of the court. Very recently one party reclaimed on the merits, and another appealed on the question of expenses, and craved an oral hearing, so that in that way the procurators got double expenses out of the same appeal.

394. The Lord Advocate.—Are there not some procurators who feel considerable difficulty in arguing orally, and who prefer written pleadings?—I have not found that the case in Fife.

395. Mr. Shand.—Have you found that quarterly courts for oral hearings are at all sufficient in your county?—I have not found it so.

396. In practice, how many times have you such hearings?—I made up my return of statutory courts the other day, and I think it was six for Dunfermline, and seven for Cupar, besides occasions which were not regular sittings, and also besides criminal jury trials, the trials in which I generally take myself.

397. Are you very frequently in your county on business?—As a rule, I take the second diets or trials of all criminal jury trials.

398. Mr. Campbell.—That is not common through out Scotland?—I cannot speak in regard to any other county except Perthshire. But if I recollect rightly, Lord Ardmillan was in the practice of doing so when he was Sheriff of Perthshire.

399. Mr. Shand.—Is it not the case that all actions against foreigners originate in the Sheriff Court by letters of arrestment to found jurisdiction?—As a rule they do.

400. Are you of opinion that there is any reason why such actions should not also be sued in the Sheriff Courts upon their merits?—Where there was jurisdiction otherwise.

401. But take the case of jurisdiction founded upon arrestment of funds within the Sheriff's jurisdiction, is it your opinion that a Sheriff should have jurisdiction against foreigners in such cases?—I see no reason why he should not.

402. Mr. Webster.—Supposing the foreigner had funds arrested in three or four counties, would you permit his creditor to sue him in each of these different counties?—I don't see any hardship arising from that; because each of the creditors, if obliged to go to the Court of Session, would have separate actions in the Court of Session.

403. But I was taking the case of one creditor. Each Sheriff has jurisdiction over the funds within his own county, and no more; the funds within his territory are attached by arrestment. Having that in view, would you still subject the foreigner to the jurisdiction of any Sheriff within whose territory funds were arrested?—I would make the creditor raise his action in the county in which he resided, and used arrestments. If he did not use arrestments in the territory where he resided, he should go to the other county and raise his action. I think he would satisfy himself with going to the county and attaching the funds, and then raising his action.

404. If there were sufficient funds?—But I don't think that should be taken into account in the question of jurisdiction. Any matter arrested raises jurisdiction.

405. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say with reference to criminal matters?—There is only one other point with reference to civil matters which I would mention, and that is, that in my opinion, where shorthand writers can be obtained, the Sheriff should be authorized to employ a shorthand writer in taking the proof, dictating it to him. I also think that the provision at the end of section 10 of the Sheriff Court Act of 1853 should be enlarged to the effect of making it competent to the Sheriff to remit to persons of skill, so as to bind both parties, except upon cause shown with reference to the report of that neutral person of skill; I mean in a certain class of cases which might be defined. The provision at present is, that he may make that remit; and it is final, only if both parties consent to the remit.

406. Mr. Shand.—You said you thought that one of the substitutes might be dispensed with in your county; but you coupled it with the expression, if shorthand writing were introduced in taking the proofs. Suppose shorthand writing were not introduced in taking the proofs, do you think it would be possible to put so large a territory as you have mentioned under one substitute?—I think a good man could do the business of both the counties of Fife and Kinross.

407. The Chairman.—What class of cases would you remit to men of skill?—Among others, actions for damage done by game. I think a remit to a neutral person skilled in these matters is more likely to give a fair estimate of value than could be obtained by the decision of a judge upon a proof led by both parties.

408. The Lord Justice-General.—Would you expect to have any difficulty in finding a neutral party who was also skilled in such questions?—There is a case reported in the books, in which Admiral Wemyss was defender, and the damages awarded by the person of skill appeared to be reasonable.

409. Were they small in amount?—Yes.

410. May he not probably have been biassed in favour of the defender?—No, I think not. He was a farmer, and such men, far above bias, are to be found in every county.

411. Mr. Campbell.—Take the case where danger is said to be threatened owing to the condition of a building, and the Sheriff is moved by the petitioner to remit to a man of skill, and he is disposed to do so, but the respondent objects that there is no necessity for any remit, and refuses to hold himself foreclosed by anything the reporter may say, but insists on going to proof?—In such a case the Sheriff might not make the remit, because it would not be binding from want of consent.

412. Do you think that is a disadvantage?—In that case I, as Sheriff, would make the remit, if the safety of the lieges was involved, and leave the parties to appeal to the court if they thought I was wrong, but it would only be in a pressing case that I would do that.

413. The Chairman.—Is that one of the class of cases to which you have been referring?—Yes.

414. Would you authorize the person of skill to take evidence?—I would leave him to make all inquiry that he thought proper, as he does at present. I may instance another case which occurs to me at this moment. An action is brought by a tenant against his landlord for payment on account of drainage and trenching operations on the farm under the stipulations of the lease. Surely the inquiry as to the amount due by the landlord to the tenant in these circumstances can be much better ascertained by a skilled person or persons than by a proof before the Sheriff. I have a case of that kind before the Court of Session, where there has been an interlocutor appointing proof to be taken. The sum concluded for is upwards of £1000. Now I cannot see how the cost, and whether the work has been done in terms of the lease, can be so well ascertained as by a remit to a skilled person, who in regard to cost of tiles, the making of the drains, and the trenching, would from his own professional skill, the vouchers, and inquiry, arrive at the sum that should be paid.

415. Would you make the report of the person of skill conclusive, and exclude review?—I think it ought to be conclusive, except on special cause shown.

416. What do you mean by special cause?—I mean if it could be shown that the party had acted without sufficient information, or had not taken the proper means to inform himself with reference to the subject in dispute.

417. Mr. Paterson.—Would you put the person of skill upon oath?—Surely.

418. The Chairman.—Is there any other point you have to mention in regard to civil matters?—I think power ought to be conferred upon the Sheriff to allow additional proof after a proof has been closed, without any other restriction than that which the matter of expenses imposes. If I recollect rightly, the provision of the Act of Sederunt of 1839 is that it must be on very weighty cause shown. The pursuer may, in leading his proof, omit an important point, and he may lose his case owing to that omission. I would also, following the provision in the recent Court of Session Act, allow productions to be made at any time, subject to the penalty of expenses.

419. The Lord Justice-General.—There is a clause in the Act of 1853 which allows the Sheriff, where the cause is before him on appeal on any point, to open up the record ex proprio motu. Do you think it desirable to extend that allowance to the Sheriff-substitute also?—I do. That is one of the points I had noted. I would allow both the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff to amend the record at any stage.

420. On such conditions as to expenses as he thought reasonable?—Yes. In decrees in absence in the Sheriff Court, a party, even when the decree has been partially implemented, may get reponed in so far as it has not been implemented, by a reponing note. I think no reponing note should be allowed where there has been personal service of the summons, after say twenty-one days from the final decree, or where there has not been personal service, after twenty-one days from personal service of the decree.

421. Personal execution and charge?—Yes; or a service where a charge could not be given on the decree. I think it would be very advisable, too, that provisions should be inserted in any statute to be passed to compel the litigants to proceed without delay, so as to obtain the object which the pursuer had in raising the action; and failing their doing so, the Sheriff should be entitled, after the lapse of a certain period, to dismiss the cause; and I think there should be no right of revival.

422. Mr. Webster.—Would that not prevent parties from settling, or from improving in the state of temper which has often led to the litigation?—No. I think the best compulsitor to settling is, that the parties should be compelled to go on with the litigation. If they have unlimited time to settle, they are no nearer it at the end than if they took it up at once.

423. Mr. Clark.—Do you think the clause about actions being asleep in three months, and being dismissed after six months, has worked well?—It is evaded by parties putting in a minute of consent.

424. If it had been worked properly, do you think it would have been a beneficial clause?—I do not think it a good clause. I think it gives too much latitude to the litigants. I would make it much more peremptory than it is. I may illustrate that by a case which recently came before me. One of my substitutes pronounced a judgment on 22d June; the losing party took his appeal without availing himself of the fifteen days allowed by the statute. I went to Fife to hear the cause on 6th July. The procurators asked me to delay the cause, on the ground that before I had intimated the diet for oral hearing, they had arranged to attend an important arbitration. I agreed, and appointed a reclaiming petition. That reclaiming petition was not put in at the expiry of eight days as ordered, and the cause went to sleep. It was revived; the reclaiming petition was not put in till near the end of October, and the answers were not put in till November, so that nearly six months elapsed before that appeal was decided. I don't think that is a proper administration of a suit at all.

425. Mr. Webster.—Did the elections take place in the meantime?—Yes, during part of the time.

426. Was there any injury to the parties from the delay?—There was injury to the pursuer, who did not get his judgment confirmed.

427. Lord Barcaple.—Which of the parties had complained in that case?—The pursuer obtained decree from the Sheriff-substitute, and I affirmed the judgment.

428. But which party had cause of complaint on the ground of the delay?—The pursuer.

429. Could he not have prevented the delay?—His agent might.

430. The Lord Justice-General.—If both parties desire a cause to be delayed for any period, say for twelve months, is there any reason why that request should not be complied with?—I do not think that the courts of law, which are maintained for the purpose of deciding causes, should be prevented from proceeding to the decision of a cause when once it has been laid before them.

431. What is the evil consequence resulting from such a proceeding?—One of the evil consequences is, that frequently, after a case has been disposed of on one point, it comes up before the judge after the lapse of a great many months, when it has gone completely out of his mind.

432. It entails additional labour and trouble on the judge?—Yes, and delay is a cause of expense.

433. Both parties being willing to incur that expense, you still think it not reasonable to allow them to do it?—I am not satisfied that the parties themselves are willing. I very much fear that it is to some extent the agents accommodating each other.

434. My question assumed that the parties were both desirous of delay?—I think that parties should not embark in a litigation if they do not desire the judgment of the court at once on it.

435. You cannot conceive any case in which, the parties having come into court and joined issue, it may not be expedient for the interests of both of them that a delay of twelve months should take place?—Such a case may occur, and I would allow a sist on cause shown; but the judge is at present helpless.

436. You would not allow the parties to concur in creating such delay without the consent of the judge?—I would not.

437. Mr. Orr Ewing.—You think the party is in the hands of his agent, and that while the client wishes a decision, the agent prevents him from getting it?—I have no means of knowing the wish of the client; but I suppose a client is completely in the hands of his agent.

438. Lord Barcaple.—In what respect is it that delay by itself causes additional expense?—I cannot very well illustrate that; but I know that it is so. It does not diminish the expense; and the delay frequently renders it necessary to do certain acts which would not otherwise be done.

439. Take the case you gave us a little ago, of your having ordered a reclaiming petition to be lodged in eight days, and it was not lodged for several months, did that cause additional expense?—It caused the additional expense connected with the revival of the process.

440. The Lord Justice-General.—How much would that be?—It would not be great.

441. How much?—I would require to look at the Act of Sederunt before I could state that.

442. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose there had been no statutory enactment as to the case falling asleep, there would have been no need for a minute of consent?—Then it would have gone to sleep at the end of a year.

443. Mr. Shand.—Are not such delays as you have referred to in the case you have mentioned, productive of statistics which create discontent against the court?—They have undoubtedly been used by writers in the newspapers as one of the great objections to the maintenance of what is called the double Sheriffship,—I think very improperly used, because, as far as my experience has gone, there is no delay occasioned by that, which is deserving of any such comment.

444. The Lord Justice-General.—Then it would appear that the evils arising from these delays are confined very much to throwing discredit on the court undeservedly?—That is one of the consequences.

445. Mr. Webster.—Is not that merely drawing a wrong inference as to the cause of delay?—Surely. It is proceeding upon the assumption that the court is the cause of the delay.

446. Mr. Shand.—And upon the assumption that the litigants themselves are not parties to these delays, but that the delays take place for the convenience of the agents, there is an injury to the clients?—Yes.

447. That is a serious evil on that assumption?—I think so.

448. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you think the evil just referred to prevails extensively,—I mean the existence of delays for the convenience of procurators?—I can only infer that, and my own feeling is that it is so. My own feeling is, that procurators do not press on causes as they ought to do.

449. But is it your conclusion, that the greater part of the delay of which you have been speaking is caused by procurators for their own convenience, and not by the parties, or for the interest of the parties?—My opinion, from experience, is that delay in causes, in which there was no prospect of a settlement, has arisen either from the procurators accommodating each other, or, what is more frequently the case, from the procurators just leaving the case to lie over till it was convenient for them to take it up. Cases continue sometimes two years in court, which might have been out of court in three months.

450. The Chairman.—Then it is an evil, generally speaking, caused by the practitioners, and which you would propose to cure in the manner you have described?—Yes.

451. Mr. Baxter.—Is that your mere inference, or do you know as matter of fact that the procurators are to blame?—I can only infer; I cannot know what goes on without the walls of the court. I can only infer that there must be some such reason as that, when I see cases delayed which ought to be proceeded with at once,—no cause whatever appearing for that delay. I take the case where upon an appeal with regard to the proof, the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute having been affirmed, that case may not come up for judgment on the merits for months. I need not say that in a case of that kind the mind of the judge is not so impressed with the evidence as it was immediately after the close of the proof. In fact, it has faded from his mind, and he approaches it very much as a new case.

452. Mr. Orr Ewing.—It is the interest of one of the parties to get a decision as speedily as possible?—If the pursuer is in earnest, as it must be presumed he is, it is undoubtedly his interest to get his cause decided one way or other, and the best means of bringing his adversary to a compromise is to push his cause.

453. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think there is any ground for holding that the pursuer is more in earnest than the defender? Is there any distinction between the two parties in that respect?—Generally none.

454. They are precisely in pari casu in that respect, so far as assumption can go?—I think so.

455. Mr. Orr Ewing.—The pursuer generally has a greater interest in despatch?—I think so.

456. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think it can be assumed that the pursuer has a greater interest in despatch than the defender?—In the beginning of the litigation he has; but as the cause goes on, and it goes against him, he may not have a greater interest.

457. Does the pursuer never raise his action for the purpose of delay in the settlement of something which he sees he must settle?—I can imagine such a case. I can conceive that he might have recourse to an action of that kind.

458. Do you think there is any ground for assuming that the pursuer is more frequently in the right, and acting in good faith in the action, than the defender?—I think, generally speaking, the pursuer is oftener in the right than the defender. I see no reason why both parties are not to be held to be acting in good faith.

459. Do you state that opinion as the result of your experience as a lawyer and a judge?—I think so. That is the result of my experience since I came to the bar.

460. I ask the question with regard to litigated causes, not decrees in absence?—I mean litigated causes.

461. And is that your experience?—Yes; and my experience is confirmed by what I have generally found to be the case in practice—that the pursuer seldom raises an action unless he has good grounds for supposing himself to be in the right.—I would suggest that a provision should be inserted in any statute that may be introduced, whereby, when one interlocutor is appealed, all the previous interlocutors shall be held to be under appeal at the instance of both parties.

462. The Lord Justice-General.—You would borrow that from the late Court of Session Act?—Yes. It has in practice in the Sheriff Court been so worked; but there has always been a doubt whether this was proper, and I think all doubt on that question ought to be removed.

463. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make?—Not upon the form of procedure.

464. Have you any further suggestions in regard to criminal matters?—I think that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be extended to cases of robbery, but not to the other pleas of the Crown,—murder, rape, and wilful fire-raising. It appears to me that it would be of advantage in many ways if the smaller class of cases of robbery which are met by the punishment of imprisonment were remitted to the Sheriff. We have in Scotland a check on the abuse of any such power, in the admirable way in which the criminal business of the country is administered by Crown counsel. I do not think the Sheriff should have power to award penal servitude.

465. Mr. Shand.—Is it not the case that stipendiary magistrates in England have that power?—I believe it is; but I don't think it is expedient. I think that where we have the High and Circuit Courts of Justiciary, it is much better that the supreme judges should award the highest penalty, with the exception of death, which is awarded for crime, and not the local judges. That is especially the case where, from the distance from Edinburgh, all the diets are conducted by Sheriff-substitutes. I know, speaking for myself, that I would rather not have the power of awarding penal servitude. It is a severe punishment, and ought to be kept for very grave offences, and these ought to be tried in the High Court or Circuit Court of Justiciary.

466. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose that you tried a man for a serious case of theft, and sentenced him to twelve or eighteen months' imprisonment, and that he comes up again for another theft, there is no more difficulty in trying the one case than the other?—No; but I think the inferior judge should not award the superior punishment. My practice as an advocate-depute was to indict the man in such a case before the High or Circuit Court.

467. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you see any advantage in giving the Sheriff the power of awarding penal servitude?—No. I see no possible advantage, and I can see possible disadvantages.

468. Mr. Adam.—Might he not be sooner tried by the Sheriff?—I am aware that when a person commits a crime immediately after the close of a Circuit, he may be left in prison till the next Circuit six months afterwards; but I think the way to meet that difficulty is, that either the Circuit should be held oftener, or that the prisoner should be brought to the High Court in Edinburgh for trial.

469. The Lord Justice-General.—If you were to give Sheriffs the power of awarding penal servitude, might there not be a considerable risk of great variance in the sentences?—There might.

470. And that would have a bad effect on the public mind?—I think that would have a bad effect on the public mind; and I think it would do away with the impression on the criminal class which the awarding of sentences by the Court of Justiciary undoubtedly has. There is always a greater stigma and a greater importance attached to the sentence of the Court of Justiciary than to that of the Sheriff. It carries greater weight, as it ought to do.

471. When you speak of the possibility of the Circuits being held oftener, do you sufficiently keep in view, that in most of the Circuit towns the amount of criminal business is very small?—I would not make these stated Circuits. I would only require one or two judges to go down to a large town where there might be the accumulation of cases I refer to.

472. You would make it occasional?—Yes. I know a recent case where a party committed a crime immediately after the Perth Autumn Circuit, and he was not tried till the following spring. He was charged with murder. It was made matter of complaint against the Lord Advocate of the day, that he allowed the case to lie over to the Circuit. It did not occur to me that there was any peculiar hardship in that case, because the evidence was very clear; and the question for the jury was, whether the party was guilty of murder or of culpable homicide; but it showed the advantage of a judge going down to Perth, and trying that case as soon as it was ready for trial.

473. Mr. Baxter.—Does that not happen almost every Circuit?—My experience is that it does not happen very often, at least in a case of such grave crime.

474. But I was alluding to a person remaining in prison for six months?—My experience is that that does not happen often. In cases that admitted of it, such a man was generally sent to the Sheriff, if possible; and it was rare that any case occurred of a person who had committed a crime which required to be tried before the Circuit or High Court, committing it immediately after the close of the Circuit.

475. Mr. Adam.—Would you give a prisoner out on bail the benefit of running his letters?—I think so. I do not see why a man should have a charge hanging over him for a longer period than that referred to in the statute.

476. The Lord Justice-General.—In short, you would extend the Act 1701 to the case of prisoners on bail?—I would.

477. Mr. Campbell.—Are there not many criminal cases tried before you and a jury in which, if you had the power, you would be disposed to inflict the punishment of penal servitude?—I never had such a case; and the simple reason is, as I said before, the criminal business of the country, under the charge of Crown counsel, is so well administered, that cases of that kind are never sent to the Sheriff Court if it can be possibly avoided. They are reserved for the Court of Justiciary. I think that is a great advantage which we have in Scotland over England and Ireland. There is a regular rule in these cases, and that rule has received its first impression from the judgments of the Court of Justiciary.

478. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the matter of bail is on a proper footing? Should the judge not have the power of refusing bail in certain cases?—I think it is a pity to restrict it as it is at present; but so far as I have been obliged to interfere, it has been to bring it up to the statutory amount. Too little bail is generally fixed by the judge.

479. Do you think he should have the power of refusing bail in very serious cases?—I think so, subject to appeal to the Court of Justiciary. I have only once had to award bail since I was a Sheriff; and from what took place at that time, it was evident that I fixed a much higher amount of bail than would have been fixed by my substitute. As an advocate-depute, I had occasion to complain of the very small amount of bail sometimes fixed.

480. The Chairman.—In the class of cases in which a party is entitled to bail, ought the Sheriff to have the power of refusing bail altogether?—I think he ought; and I would not limit the amount of bail, as it is by statute. I would leave it to the discretion of the judge, with a right of appeal to the Court of Justiciary.

481. Have you anything to suggest as to the mode of investigating crimes preparatory to trial?—No, I have nothing to suggest upon that.

482. Do you think the existing system works well?—I think so. There are efficient Procurators-fiscal, superintended by the Advocates-depute and by the Sheriffs.

483. Mr. Adam.—Do you see any objection to allowing a criminal judge to amend the libel in certain cases of error?—That is a very delicate matter. If it was perfectly clear that it could be done without prejudice to the prisoner, it might be done.

484. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose a case of theft, in which the property was libelled as belonging to John Anderson, and it turned out to belong to John Anderson & Co.?—I would not allow amendment in that case. A new libel should be brought. The prisoner might have come prepared to meet the case of having stolen the property from John Anderson, and not from John Anderson & Co. If the prisoner consented to the amendment, I would not object to it.

485. Suppose it was libelled that the act was committed near a certain close, and that it actually took place within the close, would you not allow an amendment in such a case?—I would not be inclined to allow the Procurator-fiscal to amend his own slovenliness. I cannot conceive such a case. The words of style are so clear, that the Procurator-fiscal always uses the words 'in or near.'

486. The Chairman.—You would think that in such a case the libel was carelessly drawn?—Yes.

487. Do you think the power of amending a libel would lead to slovenliness in the preparation of libels?—I think it might.

488. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that it is done in England?—I know nothing of the practice in England in this respect, and I should be sorry that we should follow some of their practice in criminal matters.

489. Mr. Shand.—Do you think, if the broad facts are stated to a prisoner, that there is any reason whatever for preventing the Procurator-fiscal from altering expressions either as to the person whose property has been stolen, or as to the place, which do not materially alter the broad facts, so as to enable the court to get on with the case which they are met to try?—If the prisoner consents, I see no objection.

490. But without his consent?—I do not think there should be any alteration in such important matters as the property of the subject, or the locus.

491. With consent, you think that the alteration should be allowed?—Yes.

492. Would that not be an innovation so far on our present practice?—I don't know that it would. I think that in a non-essential matter the judge would allow any alteration to which the prisoner consented; and if it was an essential matter, I think he would look to keeping up strictness in regard to the preparation of the libel.

493. The Lord Justice-General.—If you allowed the Procurator-fiscal to amend his libel, would you do so on any condition as to his paying expenses?—I do not see why the present system as regards expenses should be altered, unless expenses are to be awarded to the winning party as a matter of course.

494. The Chairman.—Would you allow an amendment of the libel, but with a delay of the trial, without the necessity of serving it over again?—I think that might with advantage be done. It would save expense, and do no injury to the criminal.

495. Would you require that amendment to be made at the first diet for pleading?—I think it ought not to be confined to the first diet for pleading. I think it ought to be at both diets, if there is to be any amendment at all. The first diet is generally attended by a procurator, and the Sheriff-substitute takes it. The second diet is sometimes attended by counsel, and by the Sheriff; and difficulties might occur to them which did not occur to the Procurator or to the Sheriff-substitute. I think it expedient to allow these amendments to be made at both diets; and the delay necessary to enable the prisoner to make new inquiry should be allowed.

496. At that second diet witnesses are in attendance?—They are.

497. And if you delay, there is a considerable expense created?—There is.

498. Would you subject the party who had committed the error in the expense, or would you hold him to be a public officer doing his duty to the best of his ability, though he may have committed an error, and who was therefore not to be subjected in expenses in such a case?—I would apply the latter part of your Lordship's observation to the case. I would hold him to be a public officer doing his duty to the best of his ability, and not to be subjected in expenses.

499. Would you subject him in the expenses to which the prisoner was put, supposing the prisoner and his counsel in attendance, and the trial delayed to another day?—I would not.

500. Mr. Baxter.—You would make it the same as if he had deserted the diet?—Precisely the same. In cases of hardship, Crown counsel have been in the practice of entertaining applications for reimbursement of actual expense and outlay; and I think the power of Crown counsel to meet these expenses is quite sufficient.

501. The Chairman.—In the investigation of crime, do you consider it the duty of your Procurator-fiscal to make the investigation, or do you consider that he ought to leave that to the constabulary of the district?—I have a very clear opinion on that. I was in office as an Advocate-depute at the time the General Police Act was passed, and I always checked any attempt on the part of the Procurators-fiscal to leave the investigation of crime to the constabulary. I think the Procurator-fiscal should investigate crime himself. He is employed and paid for it. The use of the constabulary is to obtain the preliminary information, so as to aid him in his inquiries.

502. Do you think that the Procurator-fiscal's investigation ought not to be in any way excluded, unless he thought it superfluous, by the intervention of the constabulary?—I think it ought not.

503. Do you think the Sheriff is entitled, and the Procurator-fiscal as his officer is entitled, to the aid of the constabulary in investigating crime?—In making the preliminary inquiry, undoubtedly; and I know that there is a very great saving of expense to the community, as well as despatch in the business, by that being done. I have had my attention particularly directed to that within the last month; and I have been not only during the last month, but during my service as an Advocate-depute, particularly struck with the able manner in which common constables reported crimes, and the names of the parties who could speak to the commission of them, and also the names of parties who could speak in favour of the accused.

504. You have said that the constitution of the court by a Sheriff and substitute is one you approve of?—Yes.

505. That implies a review by the Sheriff of the judgment of the Sheriff-substitutes?—Yes.—Would your Lordship allow me to state, that I do not feel disposed to extend the summary jurisdiction of the Sheriff in criminal matters.

506. Mr. Baxter.—Would you recommend any alteration to be made in the form of indictment?—No, I would not.

507. You would maintain the major and minor propositions as they are?—I think the major and minor propositions must be perfectly distinct, to enable the party to know what he is charged with; and the subsumption must be equally distinct, so as to enable him to know the details of the crime. You may shorten it in unimportant particulars; but I see no reason for altering it. It appears to me to have worked admirably in time past, and to be well drawn for the punishment of criminals and the protection of innocent parties.

508. The Chairman.—In regard to review, do you think it an advantage that the review should be by a person different from the person who has pronounced the first judgment?—I do. I think a fresh mind is always of advantage.

509. Mr. Baxter.—Are your present Sheriff-substitutes taken from the bar?—One of them was not taken from the bar.

510. Is it not generally the case that they are taken from the bar?—Yes; but one of them was brought from Ross-shire, where he was a Sheriff-substitute, on the recommendation of two Sheriffs, who were afterwards judges in the Court of Session; and I believe he was not a procurator. He was brought from Tain, on account of his qualifications. The other is a member of the bar.

511. But they are generally taken from the bar?—They are generally.

512. The Sheriff-substitutes take the evidence, and they hear and see the witnesses?—They do.

513. And I understand that your review takes place upon their notes?—Yes.

514. You do not see or hear the witnesses?—No, I do not.

515. Do you think that the judge seeing and hearing the witnesses is more able to form an opinion as to their credibility than one who does not see or hear them, on account of the manner in which the witness answers, his readiness, his evident intelligence and open bearing, and his clear and intimate knowledge of what he is speaking about? Do you think that the Sheriff-substitute taking the evidence, and having those opportunities of judging, is better able to form an opinion as to the credibility of the witnesses than one who merely reads the notes?—I think too much importance is attached to these matters.

516. But do you think he has any advantage?—Yes; but he can give the benefit of that by a note at the end of the examination of the witness.

517. Is it not an objection that the present appeal within the Sheriff Court is from one judge to another of the same rank, though possibly with a higher name, —that appeal being not only on matters of fact, but on matters of law, and frequently from a judge better informed to a judge worse informed, because he has merely read the notes of evidence instead of seeing the witnesses?—I think that if the notes are correctly taken, and the impression on the mind of the Sheriff-substitute as to the demeanour of the witness is stated as it ought to be, the Sheriff,—who is a non-resident judge, in the practice of his profession at the bar, and having a number of legal points passing under his notice,—is in general better qualified to give his judgment on the evidence than the Sheriff-substitute.

518. Mr. Campbell.—You mentioned that you have generally occasion to adhere to the judgments of your substitutes. Do you mean in the case of final judgments?—In the majority of cases.

519. In the large majority of cases?—In the majority, but I cannot say how many.

520. Mr. Baxter.—Can you suggest a stronger appellate court, in order to meet the opinion of many parties in the country as to the weakness of the present appellate jurisdiction?—I do not think that is the feeling in the country. I think the feeling is in favour of the appellate jurisdiction; and I think that in the great mass of cases which are litigated, where the subject at issue is not large, it would be a very great hardship indeed to the litigants to be compelled to submit to the decision of a single judge, if they did not choose to incur the expense of an appeal to the Court of Session. As far as I have met with any expression of opinion in the county of Fife since I became Sheriff, it has been in favour of the present system; and my own views of the matter cannot be better stated than they were by the able lawyers who prepared the Law Report of 1834.

521. Do you not think it would be expedient to give an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute direct to the Court of Session?—My best answer to that is, that though it is at present competent, it has only been done in one case.

522. What would you think of grouping the Sheriffs into courts of two or three, and making these appellate courts?—I can see no advantage in that. There would be no saving of expense; and if we are to have a court of several judges, we had better have the Supreme Court at once. I think the great advantage of the Sheriff of an important territory is that he superintends his Sheriff-substitutes; and the very fact that the substitute's judgment comes under the review of the Sheriff, who, generally speaking, is an advocate in practice at the bar, keeps the Sheriff-substitute more alive to the necessity of conducting the cause in strict accordance with law, and to the very best of his ability.

523. Mr. Campbell.—What proportion of the Sheriffs of counties are in active practice at the bar at the present time? Do you think there is one-fourth of them who are so?—Oh yes, I think there is more. There are twenty-three Sheriffs at present, two of whom are resident; and I know that there are much more than one-fourth of the others in active practice.

524. The Chairman.—There is one county in which the Sheriff does not fall within the rule as to attendance in court?—There are two counties.

525. I am alluding to other counties, not Lanarkshire or Midlothian?—Yes, the county of Roxburgh. I think there are five Sheriffs in counties to the south of the Forth who are in active practice.

526. Mr. Campbell.—I did not refer merely to counsel in attendance in the Parliament House, but to counsel who may be described as in active practice at the bar. Is there more than a fourth of the Sheriffs holding office who are in active practice at the bar?—I think there are ten of the Sheriffs in active practice at present. One of the most distinguished members of the bar, who from bad health gave up a large practice a few years ago, resigned his Sheriffship within the last few days, and some of the others who are not now in practice were in practice when appointed, and are still in attendance at the Parliament House, and ready to take any practice sent to them.

527. Are they not bound by Act of Parliament to be in attendance at the Parliament House?—Yes.

528. Mr. Adam.—Suppose there was to be only one Sheriff, do you consider that there should be more facilities given for review—I mean as to amount? Would you retain the prohibition of review in cases below £25?—I think one of the great advantages to the community is that a litigant in causes below £25 gets, without cost, the opinion of a new mind upon his case.

529. Supposing he had not that, would it be necessary for him to appeal to the Court of Session?—I think so.

530. Mr. Harrison.—Do you consider that an appeal from a judge who is in active practice, to a judge who is virtually not in active practice, is a satisfactory system of review?—I think the premises of that question are not correct. The appeal is from a judge who is not in active practice.

531. But the Sheriff-substitute is in constant practice within his jurisdiction, and the appeal lies in half the counties of Scotland from the Sheriff-substitute in that position to a judge who is not in active practice? —My experience has been that there is an appeal in almost every cause, so that the Sheriff has as much practice as his substitute, even although not in active practice at the bar, and he has the additional advantage of having access to a much better library than any substitute can have. He has also the advantage of coming daily into communication with practising lawyers, and he has the benefit of their advice and assistance in difficult legal points. Even though I have been in practice since I came to the bar, I have frequently had occasion to ask the views and the assistance of some of my brethren, to enable me to come to a right decision; and I think that is a very great advantage.

532. Mr. Shand.—Do you think the keeping up of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute tends to a uniformity of decision which you would not have if you held mere local courts?—I think it does.

533. Mr. Baxter.—But you would still have the appeal to the Supreme Court?—I would not have an appeal to the Supreme Court in cases under £25, where the expenses on each side would be nearly double that amount.

534. The Chairman.—Apart from the appeal to the Supreme Court, is there not such intercommunication between the Sheriffs who are in attendance in the Parliament House, with reference to difficult points that arise, as leads to greater uniformity of decision?—There is. Points continually occur of new practice in each Sheriffdom; and the Sheriffs, by communicating with one another, find that these have been adjudicated upon in some counties in a particular manner, and that practice is followed if it commends itself to the opinion of the other Sheriffs.

535. Or if it is a new point, they come to some decision upon it?—Yes.

536. Mr. Orr Ewing.—You have stated that your judgments are generally confirming those of your Sheriff-substitutes?—Yes.

537. Supposing there was not the present facility of appealing to the Sheriff-depute from the Sheriff-substitute, would the parties not be satisfied with the decision of the substitute, without appealing to any court?—I don't think so, and I am by no means satisfied that you would have the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute given in the satisfactory way in which it has been hitherto, because the very fact that there is an immediate appeal to another judge from the decision of the Sheriff-substitute is of advantage. In my own case I always feel that my judgment is a judgment which, if above £25, may be brought under the review of the Court of Session; and I am anxious, in every case, that I should not only pronounce a sound judgment, but that I should put it on its soundest foundation.

538. Mr. Campbell.—Assuming that the only judicial appointments of Sheriffs in Scotland were those of single Sheriffs for each county, don't you think you would obtain a class of judges superior to those that are now to be met with?—The question at issue is whether the Sheriff-substitute shall be abolished, and the Sheriff shall be sent down to his county as a resident judge. I think that being sent away from the Court of Session, he would in time get rusted in his law, and not be able to discharge the duty so efficiently as he now does, while he is a practising lawyer in the Court of Session. He would not only have less to do, but he would be, so to speak, out of the atmosphere of the law; and there is the saying of an old lawyer, that he always found himself a much worse lawyer at the end of the long vacation than he was at the end of the summer session.

539. Mr. Baxter.—Then your opinion is against the Sheriffs being resident in their counties?—It is. I ought to add, in answer to Mr. Campbell's question, that I think there would be no saving effected, because, if you were to send down the Sheriffs to their counties as single judges, you would, in order to secure the services of men in large practice at the bar for these offices, require to give each Sheriff as great a salary as he and his substitutes at present have.

540. Mr. Clark.—But would you get the Sheriffs to go to their counties as resident judges?—I don't think so.

541. The Lord Justice-General.—Some of them you certainly could not?—Certainly not.

542. And therefore, upon the whole, the class of men who would, in the case supposed, be sent down as resident Sheriffs, would be inferior in standing at the bar to those who are now Sheriff-deputes?—I think they would.

543. Mr. Shand.—If it be a sound objection to the present system that it is unsatisfactory to appeal from a single judge to a single judge, do you think that no intermediate arrangement could be made which would save a litigant the expense of a Court of Session case, and yet give him a mode of review?—The only other way would be by causing three Sheriffs to hold a court together.

544. Or two Sheriffs?—Yes; and if they did not agree, the Sheriff-substitute's judgment would then stand.

545. Are you aware that the present system of review by two Lords Justices in England is a very satisfactory system?—I am not aware.

546. Do you not think that if any arrangement could be made by which two Sheriffs could review the judgment of one Sheriff-substitute, it would be satisfactory?—I don't think it would be more satisfactory than the present form. I think the responsibility which a single judge feels, makes him discharge his duty all the more anxiously and efficiently.

547. Don't you think that one of two judges would feel quite as much responsibility as one sitting alone, while he would have the benefit of discussing the matter with another judge? Are not these obvious advantages?—I am not sure of that.

548. Don't you think it would be an advantage to have a review by two?—I don't think it would be a greater advantage than the present system. I rather think that adhering to the present form would be better.

549. My question was put on the assumption that the review by one man is unsatisfactory. Don't you think that if that be objectionable in itself, it could be cured by some such system?—That is one way of meeting the difficulty.

550. But does that arrangement not commend itself to you?—No, I think not.

551. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think a court consisting of two judges would be a very deliberative court?—No, I don't think it would be more so than the court of one judge.

552. If they differed, would they try to come to an agreement?—I think it would be disadvantageous to come to an agreement, because the man who was right might compromise his opinion in favour of the other.

553. Is the court of the Lord Justices in England not an excellent court?—I have no experience of it.

554. The Lord Justice-General.—Have you any acquaintance with the state of opinion of the Chancery bar in England, as to the working of the court of the Lord Justices?—No; I know nothing personally about it.

555. You were asked whether there was not a great advantage in seeing the witnesses, and whether the Sheriff-substitute had not a great advantage over the Sheriff-depute in that respect. Won't the difference of advantage depend in a great measure on the way in which the notes of evidence are taken?—It will.

556. If a witness is prevaricating, or otherwise conducting himself so as to shake his credit, may it not be very easy to represent that upon the face of the notes?—I think it may.

557. If you find a witness prevaricating, or having a tendency to prevarication, would you not take down the very words of the question and answer, for the purpose of representing the exact state of what passed?—I would.

558. And that would represent to the judge who reviewed the evidence, although he did not see the witness, what actually took place in the presence of the judge who examined him?—It would; and that would all the more easily be correctly done if, as I have suggested, a shorthand writer were employed.

559. Then I understand you are in favour of the evidence being taken by a shorthand writer?—Where a good shorthand writer can be got, which I believe is the case in almost all the county towns.

560. Do you contemplate that the shorthand writer shall take down every word of the question and answer throughout the whole evidence?—No, I would not allow him to do that. I would make the Sheriff dictate every word that he is to take down. In short, the result of the Sheriff's and the shorthand writer's labours would be that which an able judge's notes would be of the evidence taken at a trial. Every word of importance would be taken down, and with question and answer where there was prevarication on the part of the witness.

561. Do you think that would be an advantage in the way of saving time or saving expense, or producing a better record of the evidence?—I think all three. I don't think it would make a better record of the evidence than would be taken by a judge thoroughly practised in criminal and jury causes; but I think it would save time and expense, and it would be a means of obtaining a better record of the evidence, because a person not much accustomed to the taking of evidence would more than likely, if he had to take the notes himself, miss points in writing it down, which he would not miss if he had to dictate it to a shorthand writer.

562. Mr. Campbell.—In that way the record would be as good as the best notes of a Sheriff-substitute, and would be taken in a shorter time?—I think so.

563. Mr. Clark.—Do you ask the Sheriff-substitute in your county to note anything special about the demeanour of a witness?—I don't ask him, but I understand that it is the rule to do so in every case; and I generally find in every note to a judgment, an intimation of the manner in which a particular witness has given his evidence, if the Sheriff-substitute has thought it right to disregard it.

564. Or to give credit to it?—Yes.

565. The Chairman.—As to the advantage of seeing a witness and hearing him give his evidence, that, if it be an advantage, is an advantage which the judge in the first instance has, but which in every case of appellate jurisdiction the court of appeal has not?—Undoubtedly; and if weight is to be attached to it, as the question of Mr. Baxter seems to imply, then the Sheriff-substitute is a much better judge of the facts than the Supreme Court, and no appeal ought to be allowed.

566. Mr Baxter.—On matters of fact?—Yes. Because on the assumption of the question, it would be going from a good tribunal to a bad tribunal.

567. Mr. Paterson.—I understand that it is your practice to go to your county to hear appeals?—Every Sheriff must do so by Act of Parliament.

568. Then there is no hearing in chambers in Edinburgh?—In rare cases, where counsel have been employed, the parties have requested as a favour that I would hear them in Edinburgh; but I would much rather have heard them in the county at a regular sitting.

569. Then the hearing in Edinburgh is a rare and exceptional thing, so far as your experience goes?—Yes. If counsel in large practice at the bar are employed in the case, it has been done, but I think only in a few cases from Fife in my experience. I have always done it when asked.

570. Mr. Webster.—Are written proceedings common in appeals?—Not in Fife. I may state that the practitioners in Fife are many of them able men, who speak well.

571. Mr. Paterson. — Would you approve of its being required that every Sheriff-principal should go to his county to hear the procurators who have debated the case before the Sheriff-substitute?—The Sheriff is bound to go to his county; and by the Act of 1853, section 46, he is bound to hold quarterly sittings. My opinion is that he ought to hold sittings much oftener, so that there should be no delay in the decision of causes. The hearing of causes in Edinburgh imposes additional labour on the Sheriff, and I would far rather hear them in my ordinary court.

572. The Chairman.—As to the form of review by the Supreme Court, is that satisfactory to you?—It is.

573. Have you any improvements to suggest?—I think the right of appeal should be limited. It is at present six months, but I think in decrees in foro on the merits it should be made twenty-one days, thereby assimilating it to the Court of Session practice. In regard to decrees in absence, where there has been personal service, I think these twenty-one days should run from the charge, or from a service of the decree where a charge is not competent.

574. Do you think that the appeal to the superior court ought to be limited to twenty-one days?—I do. I think six months is too long a period to tie up a cause. It may be taken advantage of by litigants for the sake of delay.

575. And you think it should be done by note of appeal, as lately provided?—In all cases I think so. Where there has been no personal service in the manner referred to, as in the case of a sailor away on a foreign voyage for six months, but still having his domicile in the county, he would have a longer time to appeal, there having been no personal service on him. In that case, I think the restriction I have pointed at would prevent hardship.

576. Have you any suggestion to make as to review in criminal matters?—I think there ought to be a saving of the expense which I understand prevails as regards the fees in the Court of Justiciary, though I don't know that from experience, as it is not in my department. But I think the procedure should be simplified, and the dues of court diminished. I think also it would be advisable that there should be an appeal to the Court of Justiciary against the ruling in matters of law of the Sheriff presiding at a jury trial in criminal causes, the law called for or objected to being taken down by the Sheriff before the jury retire, exactly as in jury trials in civil causes. I think that would be satisfactory to the Sheriffs themselves.

577. Supposing the Sheriff's ruling was altered, would you hold that to be a ground for upsetting the verdict entirely, so that the party should be altogether acquitted?—That would depend on the cause.

578. In criminal matters, would the result not be that the party would be acquitted?—I would make regulations to the contrary. I would put it in the power of the Supreme Court to direct an acquittal, or to direct that the party should be tried again. I would, in short, repeal the old law, that a party who has tholed one trial should not be tried again.

579. Would you allow the appeal court to judge of the materiality of the objection in such a case?—Yes. I would assimilate it to the practice in civil jury trials.

580. Supposing it was an objection which went to exclude certain evidence that had been tendered, what then?—There is a right of appeal at present. Under the Act of Adjournal, objections in the course of the proceedings with the answers must be entered on the record, and the result is in the hands of the court, with this difference, that there can be no new trial.

581. Where evidence is excluded, how would you ascertain the materiality of that evidence?—The court would ascertain it from the judge's notes.

582. But the evidence has been excluded, and therefore you have not got it?—I would leave the court to make up their own mind on that, upon a consideration of the whole evidence in the cause, and of the question, objection, and answers.

583. Mr. Webster.—Then you would furnish the evidence along with the exceptions?—I would have the objection to the evidence taken down, and the answer.

584. The Chairman.—But if the judge ruled that the evidence was not to be received, you would not have the evidence?—But the import of it would be made to appear. The question and statement of the party wishing to lead the evidence would appear.

585. The Lord Justice-General.—I rather think that what you are indicating as the mode of obtaining review in criminal cases from the Sheriff would present to the Court of Justiciary something very like the bill of exceptions, as we had it in civil cases before the Act of 1868?—Yes.

586. Is not that rather a cumbrous procedure?—It is, to some extent. I don't think it would be very frequently followed; but it would meet those cases of hardship where a party has been convicted upon a certain ruling in regard to law, which conviction might not have been got if the ruling had been otherwise.

587. Mr. Paterson.—In the course of your experience, have you ever found that any practical hardship has arisen from Sheriffs administering criminal justice, as is done at present?—I cannot recall any case to my mind. I recollect of speaking of the matter to a member of this Commission some time ago; and I thought, in the particular case which I had in hand, that the judge might obtain a verdict by laying down certain law, and that would be a hardship to the party; and I made up my mind in that case to do what I was not required to do by the Act of Adjournal, viz. to take down any objection that was taken to the law which I stated to the jury. No objection was taken. That was the only case of the kind which I have had; and it would rarely happen.

588. The Lord Justice-General.—Supposing a case to be brought under review of the Court of Justiciary in the manner you have suggested, you would, I suppose, provide for the pursuer undergoing his sentence of imprisonment in the meantime, or would you liberate him?—If it were a bailable offence, he might be liberated on caution; and provision would require to be made as to the time from which the imprisonment should begin to run if the sentence was affirmed.

589. Would you in any case have a new trial?—Whenever the Court of Justiciary were of opinion that a new trial should take place, I would.

590. In what class of cases do you think they ought to order a new trial?—Where material evidence had been improperly refused, or where wrong law had been laid down in an essential matter, evidently leading to the verdict of the jury.

591. But in the event of wrong law being laid down in the opinion of the Justiciary Court, and their seeing further on the face of the evidence, that without that wrong law there could not have been a verdict, you would not have a new trial?—No. Wherever the judges were satisfied, on the merits of the cause, that substantial justice had been done, and that the verdict was in accordance with the facts as appearing on the judge's notes of evidence, I would give them power to disregard what was erroneous in the procedure.

592. The Chairman.—Would you give that power of review to the public or private prosecutor, as well as to the defender in the cause?—I would. It would be rarely taken advantage of by the public prosecutor, except in very important causes.

593. Mr. Webster.—Would that apply only to one trial, or to a third or fourth trial, as has happened in civil causes?—I don't think that would happen in criminal cases. It is very rarely that objections are taken; and the judge, if he has a doubt as to the soundness of the law or the evidence, leans in favour of the prisoner.

594. The Chairman.—Have you anything to suggest as to the mode of fixing costs?—Nothing, but that if the Debts Recovery Act is to be maintained as part of our procedure, the costs should be raised. They are utterly inadequate to the labour. Frequently the questions involved are so nice, and the evidence taken so long, that the amount allowed is utterly inadequate to the labour.

595. Do you object to the ad valorem principle on which the costs are fixed?—I do. I think it is erroneous to affix an ad valorem principle to the labour of an agent in a civil cause. It must be by time or by the length of the written pleadings.

596. Do you think it is an advantage to the suitor, in that class of cases, of limited amount, to have a knowledge, before they enter upon them, of the utmost extent of their liability for costs?—Yes.

597. They would not have that on the principle you have mentioned?—I rather misunderstood your Lordship's previous question.

598. My question was, whether the suitors should have a full knowledge of the extent of the liability in costs to which they are subjecting themselves when they enter into a litigation?—They should have full knowledge that if they are unsuccessful in the litigation, they will be found liable in the costs which it is thought proper should be paid by the losing party.

599. But my question relates to the knowledge of the amount to which it could go?—No. I don't think a litigant has any right to know the amount of costs that he will have to pay. If he embarks in a litigation, he must take the consequences. He is not entitled to litigate with his adversary with a hard and fast line as to costs, dragging his adversary into litigation it may be at great cost and labour to him.

600. Mr. Paterson.—Would you adopt the same scale of charge under the Debts Recovery Act which rules in the ordinary court, leaving it of course to the auditor?—I think the Debts Recovery Act ought to be abolished entirely. I see no necessity for it. The Sheriff Court Act of 1853 makes provisions under which a cause can be tried as rapidly as under the Debts Recovery Act; and I think the leading object of that Act was to cut down procurators' fees, and to get cheap law.

601. Supposing the Act were abolished, what fees would you suggest?—I would apply the Act of Sederunt of 1st March 1861; and if you did that, I think you would not find many cases brought under the Debts Recovery Act.

602. The Chairman.—You object entirely to the principle of the ad valorem charge?—I do.

603. In oral hearings on appeal to the Sheriff, the award is made to depend on the amount sued for, and not on the amount of the labour?—It is.

604. Do you approve of that principle?—I don't see how you can apply any other principle to that fee. We know, from our practice in the Court of Session, that the fees taken individually are occasionally not commensurate to the labour, but as a whole that they are sufficient. Frequently we get a much larger fee than we are entitled to expect in one case, while in others we get smaller fees than our labour would entitle us to; but as a whole, we are fairly remunerated.

605. That is, as a rule for counsel; but this is as a rule for the party?—I cannot pitch on any other rule than the rule of the Act of Sederunt. You cannot ab ante decide the amount of the labour that a party will have in pleading any particular cause, and you must get at it in some rough and round way.

606. Is not the Debts Recovery Act an attempt to get at it in a rough and round way?—But it is very inadequately applied.

607. Have you any suggestion to make as to the privileges of agents?—I see no reason for altering the present position of that matter.

608. It has been suggested that procurators in one Sheriff Court should be allowed to practise in any other Sheriff Court,—that members of the general body of procurators should be allowed to practise in any court. Do you approve of that suggestion?—No, I do not. I think it is much better that the procurators of each county should practise in their own courts.

609. Do you think the procurators of the Sheriff Court ought to be allowed to follow their causes into the Supreme Court, and to conduct them there?—I think not, particularly as caution has been abolished in appeals from the inferior court.

610. Mr. Baxter.—Why would you object to me coming from Dundee and pleading a case before you?—I would have great pleasure in seeing you personally; but I don't think it is a sound principle, that the procurator whose privileges are confined to a particular district of the country, should come and carry on practice in the courts of other agents. It might be attended with disadvantage to the clients. In your case I am sure it would not, but in many cases it would be.

611. Have your procurators in Cupar any exclusive privileges?—No; they are not incorporated.

612. Mr. Webster.—In your county are all the procurators admitted by the Sheriff?—Yes.

613. And the Sheriff has the control of how long they are to remain on the roll?—He can only take them off for cause shown.

614. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would it not be an advantage to a client that he should have a legal gentleman in whom he has confidence to represent him in court, rather than that he should give instructions to his usual agent, and that that agent should employ a total stranger in another part of the country?—I don't think he would derive any advantage from it. He would find no difficulty in getting a man as well qualified to conduct his case.

615. Don't you think an agent derives a certain amount of advantage from getting instructions directly from his client?—I think not, in the case put.

616. Does it not divide the responsibility?—I don't think that is an advantage.

617. Is it not a disadvantage to be a total stranger to the client?—I cannot see how a man can properly conduct a litigation at a distant court.

618. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you know that a number of the procurators of Forfarshire have been admitted into your court?—I am aware of that; and it is the practice all over Scotland to do so, where there are no charters. If I had had the disposal of that in the first instance, and there had been no such practice, I would not have admitted them.

619. Do you know that there is a considerable population nearer to Dundee than to Cupar?—I know that a number of the procurators of Dundee reside in Newport, Fife, and some of them are procurators in Fife.

620. And their clients are nearer them?—The county town is Cupar, and everybody connected with commerce and agriculture comes there.

621. Mr. Webster.—If a procurator is not resident within the county, can you explain in what way the borrowing and control of the processes could be managed?—It could not be managed. These gentlemen employ a Cupar procurator to do all that part of the labour, and we seldom see them except when there is an oral hearing. I must frankly say that I would rather have the business conducted in Fife by Fife procurators than by those of other counties.

622. Mr. Paterson.—Suppose the practitioners in the larger towns fence admission to their bodies by requiring an apprenticeship of a certain duration, and certificates of attendance at certain classes, would you place a party admitted on such qualifications on the same footing with all procurators who might come from any other county?—I would not.

623. Do you believe that there are any members of your bar who would avail themselves of the privilege, if they had it, of following their cases to the Court of Session?—I don't think the best men would do it, because I may mention that they are gentlemen largely engaged in business, and who are making such an income as to render the small amount of fees which they would get in the Court of Session so trifling an object, that the labour would not be worth the money to them.

624. Mr. Clark.—In every case they would require to go special to Edinburgh,—would that be of much advantage to the client?—No. They might charge £3, 3s. a-day, and their travelling expenses and hotel bill. That would entail great expense on the clients, without any corresponding advantage. And besides, when the case comes into the Court of Session, counsel have charge of it.

625. Mr. Webster.—Is there any absolute certainty that a case will be decided the day it is on the roll of the Court of Session?—On the contrary, it may not come on for days, owing to some heavy case before it.

626. Mr. Shand.—Under the present system, are there not double agency fees?—To some extent that is so; but the client is so far the blame of that. He need not employ double agency unless he likes. He can correspond with the Court of Session agent alone.

627. Is it not often necessary that local inquiries shall be made?—I think the expenses of these local inquiries are allowed to the local agent. I believe the country agents think that the auditor and the court deal with them much more severely than they ought to do in the matter of expenses. That must stand on its own merits; and if that complaint is unfounded, I see no reason why the system should be altered.

628. Mr. Orr Ewing.—If, practically, no procurator from one part of the country would appear before a Sheriff in another part of the country, would there be any harm in altering the law so that they could do so if their clients wished it?—I think it would encourage litigation in many causes where it should not be encouraged; and the client might be taken into a losing litigation, which would be a hardship.

629. The Lord Justice-General.—Might it not do harm in this way, that it might encourage rather an inferior class of practitioners to go from one Sheriffdom to another, seeking practice?—Undoubtedly it would.

630. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think it a right thing that the inferior court agent's expenses should all be disallowed in the Court of Session?—But they are not all disallowed. That is a matter of principle for the decision of the Supreme Court, and I am sure it will be dealt with on a sound footing. If it can be shown that they are improperly struck off, that is a matter for the court.

631. Mr. Shand.—Would not the admission of a number of such charges as are alluded to, admit double agency?—It is on the ground of double agency that these are struck off.

632. Mr. Webster.—Is it, or is it not, in your opinion expedient that the agent who has conducted the whole proceedings in the Sheriff Court shall continue to give his assistance in the conduct of the case after it is removed to the Court of Session?—I don't think it is expedient. The cause stands on the record and concluded proof; and he cannot throw any light on it if he employs a good agent and counsel in Edinburgh, more than they can see for themselves.

633. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Is it not the fact, that in cases of importance, agents from Glasgow invariably come to Edinburgh to instruct an agent there, and so incur double expense to the client?—But at what stage do they come?

634. At all hearings?—I don't think the country agent is of use at a hearing. He can draw the memorial for the instruction of counsel if he thinks proper, and he will be paid for it. He states everything necessary for the case in that memorial; and what good his presence at the hearing can do I do not know, because in the statement of facts, the pleas in law, and the proof, everything is included on which the court is to adjudicate, and parties cannot go beyond these; so that he cannot give any additional information.

635. Mr. Paterson.—Suppose that in a case in the Court of Session, the Edinburgh agent corresponds as far as possible with his client, but that, instead of going to the west of Scotland to take precognitions or to make inquiries, he employs a country practitioner to do that for him, are you of opinion that the auditor should allow that expense?—I understand that the auditor in all such cases does so. The fees are allowed for taking the precognitions, whether they are taken by the Edinburgh agent or the country agent.

636. Do you think that, if they are not allowed, they ought to be?—Yes. I may also mention that, so far as my experience goes, the country procurators in large business do not, except in very weighty cases, come through to the hearings, but leave these entirely in the charge of the Edinburgh agent.

637. The Chairman.—It has been said that an understanding between the country practitioner and the agent in the Court of Session as to participation in fees is of the nature of pactum illicitum. Do you think it would be an advantage, or not, to do away with that?—I am not inclined to alter the law on that matter.

638. Mr. Paterson.—Are you aware that the practice is different in England?—I am; but the facts are different there. There you have one body of practitioners, all attorneys, and each is entitled to conduct his cause if he chooses. But here the country agent is not entitled to practise in the Court of Session; and I don't see why the Edinburgh agent, who has the sole right to practise here, should communicate part of his profits to the country agent. I may add, that I don't think the English practice is of advantage.

639. Suppose I were to enter into partnership with an Edinburgh agent, should I get no part of the profit?—That is a different matter.

640. The Lord Justice-General.—What is the objection to that?—I think it would encourage the lower class of country agents to advise appeals in many cases which ought not to proceed further. I should be afraid of it working in that way. With respectable agents, it would not have any such effect, and in their case there would be no demand on the Edinburgh agents to communicate a share of their profits.

641. Do you think it indispensable to the morality of the country agent, that he should have no interest in his case going to the Court of Session?—I think it much better that he should have no interest.

642. The Chairman.—You think it is a protection to the Edinburgh agent against being pressed to go into such arrangements?—I think so.

643. Mr. Paterson.—Would you be surprised to be told that not a few cases, which would otherwise find their way into the Court of Session, are brought in the Sheriff Court, just because the country agent is not remunerated for his work in the Court of Session?—Does that mean that the non-communication of fees prevents parties recommending clients to take their cases to the Court of Session?

644. No; I mean on account of the taxing off of the provincial agent's charges?—I believe it has that effect, but I believe there are other causes which operate very strongly in keeping business in the Sheriff Court instead of going to the Court of Session; and these are, that there is very great dissatisfaction with trial by jury in many causes, and also that each practitioner who thinks himself qualified to conduct the litigation will prefer to carry it on in his own court.

645. Mr. Shand.—Have you heard that many important matters are settled by arbitration which, but for the fact that the local agent is deprived of remuneration, would find their way to the Court of Session?—I have heard that as matter of common remark; and I have heard that it occurs particularly in Glasgow, but to what extent I do not know.

646. Mr. Webster.—Besides the Sheriff Court, as to which you have spoken, are there in your county Burgh Courts in several of the burghs?—So far as I am aware, the Burgh Courts only exercise police jurisdiction in the various burghs in Fife. I have never seen or heard of a civil cause in any of them, or in a Dean of Guild Court. But I think that where Burgh Courts or Dean of Guild Courts exercise civil jurisdiction, that ought to be abolished.

647. You mean civil jurisdiction in pecuniary matters?—Yes; and also in the Dean of Guild Courts, as regards the rights of coterminous proprietors.

648. Would you abolish the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild?—Yes, in all such matters. In the town of St. Andrews I had a case with reference to the alteration of a tenement, and I found that the idea of appealing to the Dean of Guild Court had never occurred to any of the parties.

649. Would you abolish the Dean of Guild in St. Andrews?—I made the remark with regard to all Scotland. I would abolish the Dean of Guild Court all over Scotland.

650. The Chairman.—Would you abolish it in Glasgow?—I would.

651. What would you do with the jurisdiction?—I would transfer it to the Sheriff.

652. Have you any opinion as to the amount of labour that would impose on the Sheriff?—I think that in Glasgow and Edinburgh, and probably in Aberdeen and Dundee, it would impose a good deal of labour on the Sheriff; but I think it is for the benefit of the community, that a person skilled in judicial matters should administer the jurisdiction. It would give uniformity of decision.

653. Mr. Baxter.—You do not approve of an assessor?—I do not approve of an assessor, because he is irresponsible, and his opinion the court is not bound to follow.

654. Mr. Paterson.—If the jurisdiction were transferred in Glasgow, you think it should be brought under the Act of 1853?—Or a new form of procedure might be adopted.

655. Mr. Orr Ewing.—What would your object be in abolishing it?—My object would be to have a responsible judge. You would have a man skilled in the administration of justice and law; whereas at present you have a man unskilled in the administration of justice and law. You would have the whole responsibility thrown on him, whereas it is now divided between that officer and an assessor whose opinion he is not bound to take.

656. Is not the test of the good working of a court, the confidence which the public repose in it, and the correctness of its decisions as shown by their never being appealed from?—It is.

657. If you found that, in an important court such as the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow, there had been, during the last eight or ten years, only one case appealed, and that in that case the decision of the assessor was affirmed, would that not give you confidence that that court was well constituted?—For the time it would, but I think it would be constituted better under a judge.

658. Would you attach to the Sheriff Court a body of liners and tradesmen to advise with the Sheriff?—I would have the Sheriff to investigate the facts very much as done by the Dean of Guild Court at present.

659. Mr. Paterson.—Would it affect your opinion if you found it on inquiry to be the fact that in the vast majority of applications to the Dean of Guild Court there never was any record at all, except the petition?—It would. That came within my own knowledge within the last few years. I believe that formerly there was no record in the Dean of Guild Court; and in old cases, where alterations had been carried through at the sight of the Dean of Guild, no proof of his authority can be obtained, or a copy of the plans. I may mention the case of Muirhead v. The Glasgow Highland Society, in which it would have been of great importance to the Highland Society had the proceedings and the plans to which the Dean of Guild's authority was interposed been at once obtained. It would have settled the cause. The Highland Society were ultimately successful, but after a long and expensive litigation.

660. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Are you aware that that objection exists no longer?—So I have been told.

661. Mr. Clark.—The Dean of Guild can determine no question of heritable title at present?—No.

662. And when you say you would transfer his jurisdiction to the Sheriff, you mean to the Sheriff who is able to determine questions of boundary between coterminous proprietors?—Yes.

663. Mr. Orr Ewing.—You are aware that the efficiency of buildings—the plans and sanitary questions connected with the buildings—come before the Dean of Guild. Do you think the Sheriff more competent to give an opinion on these than the gentlemen who generally occupy the position of Dean of Guild?—The Dean of Guild is a civic office-bearer who only holds his situation for a short time; the Sheriff is a permanent officer. The Dean of Guild is a tradesman or merchant; the Sheriff is a lawyer skilled in the administration of the law. I would therefore prefer the latter to the former.

664. Don't you think it is an advantage for him to be a merchant or a manufacturer, in respect that he understands these matters?—On the contrary, I cannot think that a knowledge of merchandise or manufactures would qualify a person for the administration of the law.

665. But in regard to questions of the construction of buildings?—I don't think so.

666. Mr. Clark.—Your objection is, that the Dean of Guild is a temporary judge?—That is one objection.

667. And therefore he can never have great experience of the matters coming before the court?—Quite so; and everything is left to the assessor, who is an irresponsible person.

668. Mr. Paterson.—Are you aware that a great part of the sanitary jurisdiction of Glasgow under the new Police Act rests with the Dean of Guild Court?—I believe so.

669. Mr Shand.—Is there any particular matter on which you are aware that there is a strong feeling against the jurisdiction of Justices of Peace in Scotland?—There is a strong feeling against their jurisdiction in game cases.

670. Do you think it desirable that any change should be made in that respect?—I think the Justices themselves desire that such a change should be made.

671. What change should be made, in your opinion?—I think that the jurisdiction of the Justices ought to be transferred to the Sheriff.

672. In trials for poaching and other game cases?—Yes; trespass and poaching.

673. Do you think the feeling that you say exists is founded on good reasons?—I believe not. The Justices are in general gentlemen; and the feeling which they have, that they may rather lean against the prisoner, tends to make them lean the other way.

674. Is not that a reason why there should be a change?—It is. While on the question of Justices of the Peace, I may say that, except in petty police cases, I think the jurisdiction of the Justices in civil causes ought to be abolished. It is an anomalous thing that there should be a small debt jurisdiction vested in Justices of the Peace.

Donald Mackenzie.

675. The Chairman.—What do you mean by anomalous?—Because it is committing the judgment of a cause depending on fact, and frequently on nice questions of law, to gentlemen who are not experienced in the administration of the law, or in the expiscation of fact. I am in the judgment of many of the Commissioners, if they do not sometimes find the administration of the small debt jurisdiction attended with great difficulty.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

ARCHIBALD DAVIDSON, Esq., examined.

Archibald Davidson.

676. The Chairman.—You are Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh?—I am.

677. How many years have you been so?—Since October 1865.

678. Before that, you were Sheriff of Aberdeenshire?—I was for about seventeen years.

679. Have you any suggestion to make as to the constitution of the Sheriff Courts, as consisting of a Sheriff and substitutes?—I don't think I have any suggestion to make as to alteration. I have a very clear opinion of the advantages of the present constitution.

680. You think there ought to be a Sheriff with substitutes to aid him, and an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff?—I do. It would be impossible to carry on the business unless the Sheriff had the power of appointing substitutes. He could not do the whole work himself, even in small counties, unless he was resident. In large counties he could not do it at all. I am strongly against a local resident judge, isolated by himself and independent of all control. The visits of the non-resident Sheriff to his county, and his holding courts in it, are of the utmost value. Those only can understand this thoroughly who have seen and felt the effect. Then, the whole executive department, which should always be under the immediate charge of the Sheriff himself, is infinitely better managed by him as a non-resident magistrate.

681. Do you think that the system of an appeal within the court—that is, an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute, who considers the case first, to a Sheriff as a court of review—is a good system in practice?—I do indeed.

682. You speak with reference to the result of your experience and observation as a Sheriff non-resident in Aberdeenshire, and as a Sheriff resident in Edinburghshire?—I do. I think the appeal is not only very much liked by the practitioners, but that it is popular with the public; and I found that not merely on what I have observed and heard, but also upon the experience of the number of cases which have come from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff on appeal, and the few cases that have gone from the court of the Sheriff to the Court of Session upon advocation. I should say that when I was Sheriff in Aberdeenshire, I had sometimes above forty appeals in a month. Upon an average, I should say it is not overstated at twenty-eight or thirty a-month. These were not all appeals on final judgments; but they were appeals. I cannot state the number on final judgments in a year; but all the time I was Sheriff of Aberdeenshire, I don't think there were six cases of advocation in any year. In some years there were not three, so far as I recollect; and these were not cases to any large extent, in which the parties were not quite capable, so far as being persons of position and substance was concerned, of carrying them by advocation to the Court of Session.

683. You mean that the cases acquiesced in were between parties whose means were sufficient to enable them to advocate them to the Court of Session?—That is my meaning.

684. Do you think it would be an advantage, as a general rule, to require that the Sheriff as well as the Sheriff-substitute should be resident within the county? or are you satisfied with the rule which at present exists, of having as Sheriff a lawyer who attends on the courts in Edinburgh?—I think the present system is very preferable to what the other would be.

685. Have you examined the report of the Commissioners of 1834 in regard to the constitution of the Sheriff Courts, the Commission of which Mr. Bell was the head, and of which Mr. Jameson and others were members?—Not recently.

686. Do you recollect generally the bearing of it on this question?—I cannot say that I do, so as to speak upon the subject.

687. Then you state your own opinion, independent altogether of that report?—I speak entirely upon my own experience.

688. What is your opinion as to extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts?—The jurisdiction of the Sheriff Courts has been so very much extended of late years, that it is impossible to say that you have just got at the precise point at which it ought to remain. I have very great difficulty in saying that it ought to be extended, or that it ought not to be extended. The Sheriff deals with a great number of cases incidentally that he cannot deal with in a final way—such as heritable subjects, for example, in regard to interdict—and every year there is an extension of jurisdiction. Last year it has been extended in more than one important particular in regard to heritable rights; for instance, under the new Entail Act, in which great power is given to the Sheriff, and his judgment cannot be appealed from. There is the Ecclesiastical Buildings Act also, which deals with heritable rights. There are actions of maills and duties; the irritancy of feus, to a certain extent, under the Act of 1853; rights of servitude, both as to their constitution and their exercise. In short, it is impossible to say that any extension of the jurisdiction that can be stated almost, might not beneficially take place; and there is no reason either for saying that it should take place, in my opinion.

689. Do you think that any inconvenience or grievance exists from the want of a power in the Sheriff to deal with heritable rights of small value, such as questions about houses in villages, and so forth?—It is very difficult to say that if he has the power of dealing with a personal matter to the extent of a million of money, he should not have the power also of dealing with the right to a house which is worth £20; but I don't see the principle on which he is to be limited according to the value of the subject he is dealing with. The question of who that house belongs to may be as difficult as if it was a very large estate, and I don't quite see any principle of limitation upon the mere ground of value in any of these cases.

690. Have you considered the question of whether the jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be extended to questions of status, such as declarators of marriage, actions of divorce, declarators of legitimacy, and so forth?—I should make the same answer to that which I made to the former question. For example, a married woman brings an action for the aliment of a child against a man who is not her husband; in that case the Sheriff may have to consider whether the child is legitimate. There he is dealing with a subject in regard to which he might decide the point of the legitimacy of the child directly; but whether it would be advisable that he should have that power I am not prepared to say. He does deal with consistorial matters to a certain extent now.

691. Do I understand that you are not disposed or prepared to express any opinion as to the extension of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in these matters?—I am not prepared to say that the public might not be very well pleased to have the power of bringing certain actions before the Sheriff which they cannot now bring, instead of going to the Court of Session. I am not prepared to say that that is not the case; but the difficulty that occurs to me is to say what it is that ought to be given to the Sheriff, and what ought not. I don't see any intelligible distinction which enables me to say that this particular jurisdiction should be given to him, and that particular jurisdiction should not.

692. Mr. Murray.—Would you give the Sheriff jurisdiction in matters of divorce?—If you mean, do I desire that that extension should take place, I answer no.

693. But would you consider it expedient?—I have no doubt that in the Sheriff Court we could decide these cases very well.

694. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know that it is almost a prohibition of justice to poor men that they cannot bring an action of divorce in the Sheriff Court?—Certainly it is.

695. Dr. Barclay.—Do you think it might not be advisable to give the Sheriff jurisdiction in questions of separation a mensa et thoro on proof of maltreatment, though not in divorce?—I see no difficulty in that whatever.

696. Are you aware that the inferior commissaries had that jurisdiction before 1826?—I am. It is understood, I presume, that in all these cases there should be an appeal to the Court of Session.

697. The Chairman.—Do you take the same view also as to the protection of the earnings or property of married women?—Certainly. I should think that falls within the same category.

698. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—And cases of legitimacy?—Yes.

699. Mr. Campbell.—As a practical matter, would the question as to allowing the Sheriff to decide in small cases of heritable right, and excluding his jurisdiction where the subject was very large, such as a large estate, not be settled by the practice of the public? If the question of heritable right were made competent to be tried before the Sheriff, would questions with reference to small subjects not usually be brought in his court?—It is very likely.

700. And would not litigants contesting the right to a large estate resort to the Supreme Court at once?—Very likely.

701. So that the extension of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to questions of heritable right would not in the ordinary case be attended with any great practical difficulty?—It would still come to this, that if you extend the power of dealing with such subjects to the Sheriff, it is very hard to say that a man should not have the privilege of going, if he likes, to the Court of Session.

702. In the case of a foreigner whose funds have been attached within a sheriffdom by arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, do you think it should be made competent to sue that foreigner in the jurisdiction of the Sheriff where his funds were arrested?—Yes; I should say so.

703. Mr. Baxter.—What is your opinion as to giving the Sheriff power to appoint factors loco tutoris, curators bonis, and trustees in lapsed trusts?—I make the same answer as to the other questions with regard to the propriety of extending the Sheriff's jurisdiction. I don't see any objection to it; but I don't see any great call for its being done. In fact, these questions come to this, whether the Sheriff should have the power, if parties desire it, of dealing with their cases in regard to matters as to which he has not jurisdiction at present.

704. Mr. Murray.—Then you would practically reserve nothing whatever from the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—I am very far from saying so; I am aware that hitherto the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in many particulars has been limited as to the value of the subject he is dealing with. I say, I don't see the principle on which that limitation should be fixed.

705. But you see no principle on which anything whatever should be excepted from the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—Except it be the principle of expediency, if that is a principle. If it is thought inexpedient that certain jurisdictions should be given to the Sheriff, that is a different matter; but if you come to what the Sheriff ought to be able to deal with, and what he is competent to deal with, I have great difficulty in regard to the limitation.

706. Mr. Clark.—If you extended the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, so as to make him competent to decide on any question of heritable property, whatever the amount, would you give power to either party to remove the case to the Court of Session?—Yes, I would give full power of appeal.

707. But to remove the cause before judgment?—Yes, that might be done.

708. To either party?—Yes; I should be inclined to do so.

709. Would you do that in a case where the value of the heritable subject was £20?—I don't see the principle of the limitation on the ground of value, and therefore I would give the parties that power.

710. Either party?—Yes; that is to say, I think it might be done, for I am not advocating its being done. I am not advocating the extension of the jurisdiction.

711. Dr. Barclay.—What Mr. Clark has said occurs just now, in the right of either party to remove a case above £40. Are you aware that that right has been often abused, by a rich person availing himself of it, so as to extinguish a case, by advocating the cause as soon as the Sheriff has allowed probation?—I understood Mr. Clark to mean, whether there should be a power of removal at the very first stage of the cause. I don't think it is proper that a party should go on with a cause, to see, for example, how the record is made up, and how the thing looks, and then to remove it.

712. Mr. Harrison.—Would it be an improvement if the appellant were bound to find caution for costs, in reference to what you have stated as to a rich man having the power of extinguishing a poor client?—That might be an advantage.

713. Mr. Webster.—Have you considered the expediency of limiting the right of review of the Sheriff's judgments to cases which are above a certain pecuniary amount or value,—not permitting an appeal to the Court of Session where the amount is below £100 or £50?—I am not in favour of that limitation.

714. Mr. Clark.—By appeal after final judgment, do you think you have the same means of properly trying a case as if it was originally brought before the Court of Session?—I don't quite understand the question.

715. Do you think the case is as likely to be well disposed of on appeal from the Sheriff Court, as if the case was originally brought before the Court of Session?—That is to say, either that there should be no appeal at all, or that parties should be entitled to bring their cases in the first place in the Court of Session.

716. Do you think that an appeal gives all the remedy that could be got, by allowing the Court of Session to adjudicate on a case in the first instance?—I don't see why it should not.

717. Do you think nothing is lost in the preparation of the cause?—Nothing that may not be amended.

718. In the preparation of the pleadings, and in the taking of the evidence?—It would only come to this, that if, in the opinion of the Court of Session, something had miscarried, that could be put right.

719. Do you think that would be sufficient?—I don't think that a case which comes from the inferior court to the superior court is the same case as a case which in the first place comes before the superior court. It is not; but the result of taking away the appeal, or holding that to be an objection to the appeal, would be that there should be no cases in the Sheriff Court, at all events none which should be appealed, because the parties who take the appeal come to the Court of Session in an unfavourable position.

720. Dr. Barclay.—At present the Sheriff can entertain suspensions of charges on bills and obligations up to £25. Do you see any reason why that limitation should exist?—No. All that falls within what I said before. I see no reason against extension. In the circular sent to me, I am asked whether I see any evils or inconveniences at present existing. Now I see no evils or inconveniences which are very prominent in the present system. No doubt the jurisdiction may be extended, if it is thought prudent.

721. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—You have said that in your opinion the Sheriff may judge in questions of legitimacy; what Sheriff would you vest with that power?—The Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute.

722. But the Sheriff-substitute of what county?—That makes a difficulty in disposing of the case.

723. And in a case of divorce?—The difficulty is the same there; but why not bring the defender into the court of his sheriffdom?

724. In the case of legitimacy, where a man is pursuer, what would you do?—Then it would be the Sheriff of the county in which the woman resides.

725. Mr. Webster.—The wife's domicile being that of her husband, the husband would always have the selection of the tribunal in which to raise an action of divorce against his wife?—Yes.

726. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—If the parties changed their domicile, and the question were revived?—I should say in that case it ought to remain in the court in which it was first instituted. That would require to be provided for. The case would come to the Sheriff on appeal.

727. Mr. Webster.—Do you approve of the finality system introduced by all the Small Debt Acts?—I have in general a great dislike to finality in inferior courts, whether it be given to the Sheriff on appeal from his substitute, or to the substitute without appeal to the Sheriff.

728. Would you permit review by a higher tribunal in cases of the smallest amount?—If such a change were made in the law, it certainly would not be disapproved of by me. The matter of the small debt £8, 6s. 8d. jurisdiction is different, and it stands on special grounds by itself.

729. It is now £12?—I did not like the extension from £8, 6s. 8d. to £12; but it having been extended, I don't say that I would make any alteration.

730. Dr. Barclay.—Would you allow the same privilege in Scotland which exists in the County Courts of England, of a case on questions of law to the Supreme Court?—Is it meant that there shall be no appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, supposing him to be sitting in the Small Debt Court, to the Sheriff?

731. Yes; a case direct to the Supreme Court?—I don't see any propriety in that.

732. Mr. Gordon.—What is meant is a case stated, where there is a point of law of general importance or of considerable nicety, and a doubt is entertained about it?—I think that putting out of view the extension from £8, 6s. 8d. to £12, you do away with the benefit of the Small Debt Act if you give an appeal at all. If there is to be an appeal, I don't see why it should not be to the Sheriff, if the Sheriff-substitute sits in the Small Debt Court. It might be another question if the Sheriff himself sits in the Small Debt Court, whether it might not be proper to allow such a case; but it never was intended in the institution of the Small Debt Court that the judgments should go beyond the judge who sits in the court and deals with the cases.

733. Dr. Barclay.—Do you approve of the exclusion of all review by the Supreme Court in cases below £25?—As I said before, I am not favourable to limiting the power of review; but as that has been made the law, I am not prepared to say that I think the appeal should now be allowed. I am not prepared to say that it would be an advantage to change the law, and give an appeal in cases under £25.

734. Would you not allow an appeal in cases where the Sheriff-substitute came to one conclusion and the Sheriff came to another?—It is partly on that ground that I say I am not favourable to the limitation of the power of review.

735. Mr. Paterson.—Do you think there is any reason for excluding actions of reduction of deeds from the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court?—I give the same answer to that as I have done to other questions in regard to extending the jurisdiction.

736. Do you see any reason why it should not be so extended?—I see no reason more than in the other cases.

737. Even where the reductions proceed on the ground of fraud and circumvention?—Yes.

738. Mr. Baxter.—Do you say the same as to extraordinary removings, and actions of proving the tenor?—Yes. I think my general answer covers all these.

739. Dr. Barclay.—Has not the small number of advocations to which you have referred arisen from the necessity of finding caution, which has now been done away with?—My impression is, decidedly not; and that impression is founded on my having taken an interest in the matter, and made inquiries which satisfied my own mind as to whether it resulted from anything else than this, that the parties were satisfied with the Sheriff's judgment.

740. Can you state whether there are more appeals under the new system than there were advocations?—I cannot say. I think there are very few from the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh.

741. Mr. Baxter.—As to the present system of review by Sheriffs, are you aware that the substitutes are chiefly taken from the bar?—Yes.

742. And that they are men of great intelligence and legal knowledge, generally speaking?—We shall assume that.

743. The record is made up before the substitutes?

Archibald Davidson.

—Yes; that is to say, supposing the Sheriff not to do it himself; but in general it must be done to a very large extent by the substitute, where the Sheriff is not resident.

744. And the substitutes take the evidence on questions of disputed fact?—Yes.

745. They have the means of judging of the credibility of the witnesses, from their manner of answering, their readiness in answering, their general intelligence and bearing, and the knowledge they evince of the questions put to them?—Yes, certainly: it is a great advantage to a judge to see the witnesses.

746. The Sheriff reviews his substitute's judgment on the facts, from the Sheriff-substitute's notes?—Yes.

747. It is thought that that makes the present appeal from the substitute to the Sheriff an appeal from a judge better informed to a judge worse informed of the facts, and that the court of appeal is weak. Can you make any suggestion for strengthening the court of appeal?—Wherever there is any peculiarity in the evidence that has been adduced before the Sheriff-substitute, in the behaviour of the witnesses, or in the mode in which they gave their evidence, that should be stated by the Sheriff-substitute in the note to his interlocutor, in which case it comes as a fact before the Sheriff upon appeal; and taking that statement of the Sheriff-substitute, which is authoritative, he can deal with the proof almost as well as if he had himself seen the witness.

748. Dr. Barclay.—You say that is stated in the note to the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor. Would it not be more appropriately stated after the examination of each witness?—Either way.

749. Do you think it can be expressed completely in a note?—I think so.

750. Would not a photograph be a good thing sometimes?—I can't say it would.

751. Mr. Baxter.—Have you considered a suggestion which has been made as to grouping Sheriffs into a court of appeal of two instead of one?—That is, for example, that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute of Forfar should be considered by the Sheriff of Forfar and say the Sheriff of Aberdeen?

752. Reducing the number of Sheriffs, and grouping them into appeal courts of two?—That is a matter which I have not considered; but there are some things which suggest themselves at once with regard to it. In the first place, you must of course make each Sheriff who is to sit in that district, Sheriff of all the counties in the district. Then, again, objections are taken in the course of a proof, and at the close of the proof there is an appeal upon these, and it is necessary that that appeal should be determined before judgment is given on the merits. Do you mean that the case is to be delayed till a court can be arranged for dealing with that preliminary appeal?

753. I would have the Sheriffs to hold very frequent courts?—But still I think what I have referred to would be very objectionable.

754. I think it is a question whether so many appeals as there are now should be allowed?—As to that I have a different opinion. If several Sheriffs were to sit for the disposal of appeals from the counties of a district, I think the time of these Sheriffs would be so completely occupied, that it would be impossible for them to be non-resident, with the advantage of attending to business in the Court of Session. Take the appeals from the counties of Forfar and Aberdeen. The appeals in the county of Aberdeen would be about 300 in the year, and more if you include incidental appeals; and if you add those from the county of Forfar, a very great part of the time of the Sheriffs of these counties would be occupied in hearing these appeals. Besides, as to the question now put, and in every question connected with the constitution of the Sheriff Court, you must take into consideration the whole of the Sheriff's position. He is not merely a judge in civil matters, he is the chief magistrate of his county: he is responsible for the peace of the county: he has to prevent, and detect, and investigate crime: he is the head of the police: a criminal judge with large jurisdiction; and he has to attend to county business, which I consider one of the most important parts of a Sheriff's duty. So that I think you would hardly get the men who now occupy the position of Sheriffs, at least some of them, to accept the office of Sheriff in counties in which there was so much to do, unless indeed the salaries were very different.

755. I assume that their time would be very much taken up, and that they would require larger salaries than they now have?—The answer which I make to the question, whether it is an advantage to do what is proposed, is that I don't at present recognise any objection to the present system; and I do not see how you can work out what is suggested, maintaining the present position and usefulness of the Sheriff. I think the system as it stands now is a good system, and works well, and I think it is popular. I think the people like it, and I am quite sure that practitioners like it, though it is quite possible that other schemes might be propounded which would be very acceptable too.

756. Do you think that the present mode of the Sheriff-substitute taking down the evidence by notes, in the way he does it, is satisfactory?—Very often not; at least I have seen it very often not satisfactory. One reason is, that in many counties there is more put on the Sheriff-substitute than it is possible for him to undertake, and in that way the evidence is very often taken in a manner which is not satisfactory.

757. Dr. Barclay.—What is your opinion as to taking the evidence by a shorthand writer, as is done in the Court of Session?—If you introduce a shorthand writer, I think you must do away with the system of reading over the evidence to the witness, and making him sign it. That is the mode in which the evidence is taken in the Sheriff Court, and I presume it is a good mode. I like the deliberateness of it. If you have a shorthand writer, you must do away with that. You cannot have it properly read over, and you certainly cannot have it signed by the witness.

758. Does the same objection not occur in the Supreme Court at present, where the cases are of more importance?—In the Court of Session the evidence is neither signed nor read over.

759. Mr. Baxter.—I understand that in the Court of Chancery the practice is that the shorthand writer extends his notes and sends them to the agents; the judge also takes short notes; the agents compare the shorthand writer's notes, and satisfy themselves as to their accuracy; and if the agents don't agree upon that, they go to the court?—I am not acquainted with that system.

760. Do you think that if, instead of the Sheriff-substitute silently taking down his notes and reading them over at the end, he were to dictate the evidence to a shorthand writer in the hearing of the agents, it would be more satisfactory?—Perhaps it would be more satisfactory in that way than that the shorthand writer should take down what he hears from the lips of the witness.

761. Mr. Campbell.—A good shorthand writer is able to read his shorthand notes as fluently as ordinary manuscript?—He may be.

762. Suppose it were enjoined that the Sheriff should dictate that which the shorthand writer is to take down, and that before the witness left the box the shorthand writer should read over to him what he had taken down, and that each deposition bore that that was the case, would that not be as satisfactory as if the witness signed the deposition?—Perhaps it would. I am proceeding on the idea that the present system is a good one, which I think it is.

763. Mr. Harrison.—Would not the addition to the expense in the majority of cases be rather a serious matter, if a shorthand writer were employed?—It would; and in small counties you would not get a shorthand writer.

764. Mr. Paterson.—In your county, is there a prevailing dissatisfaction with the present mode of reviewing the substitute's judgment by the Sheriff?—I really cannot say that there is, but there may be without my knowing it. I am not aware of it.

765. Mr. Webster.—In appeals to you, is the discussion always oral, or is it sometimes in writing?—In Edinburgh it is almost always oral.

766. What was the practice in the county of Aberdeen?—In the county of Aberdeen there were more reclaiming petitions after the Act of 1853 than there were oral hearings; and, upon the whole, I preferred that. An answer was not ordered in every case where there was a reclaiming petition, because I read the reclaiming petition; and if I thought the judgment a good one, I decided the case without answers. Answers were not ordered as a matter of course. Where the question was difficult, they were ordered.

767. Dr. Barclay.—That is the same as not calling upon counsel on the other side?—Yes.

768. Mr. Webster.—Where there was no writing, at what time was the oral discussion taken?—In the Act of 1853 there is an obligation on the Sheriffs to visit their counties a certain number of times annually. In the county of Aberdeen, I think, there were four sittings in the year; but I never limited the oral hearings in that way, because I used to take them as they came; and I don't think that, except in very special circumstances, there ever was an oral hearing which was not taken up before, at the most, six weeks after the appeal was taken; so that it may be said cases were decided within a month or six weeks after the appeal was taken.

769. But where a Sheriff did not make a greater number of visits to his county than the statutory number, the delay between the date of the appeal and the date of the hearing might be a quarter of a year?—Yes, it might be so; but then the party who wanted speed, and was anxious to get a judgment, had the option of presenting a reclaiming petition.

770. Only if he was the appealing party?—Whenever the Sheriff is of opinion that the case required despatch, even if an oral hearing is asked, which it might be for the purpose of delay, he may order a reclaiming petition; and it was my constant habit to do that. In the same way, the other party, not the appellant, might put in a note saying that it was a matter requiring attention, and therefore requesting that a reclaiming petition should be ordered, instead of appointing an oral hearing.

771. Mr. Harrison.—Have you had much experience of the working of the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes; I have taken all the small debt recovery courts in Edinburgh since the Act came into operation, except six or eight.

772. Has the operation of that Act been on the whole satisfactory, do you think?—It is difficult to answer that question. I have not found great difficulty in it. I think there are some things in which the Act might be amended, but I cannot say that I have found any great difficulty in it. There is a duty put upon the judge which is quite exceptional, and I don't think occurs in any other court: the judge has, under that Act, to make up the record himself. The Act allows procurators to appear for the parties; but in some cases procurators do not appear, and the parties appear for themselves, in which case it is often very difficult to make what I call a record, which is stating the pleas of the parties, because it is not sometimes till you come to the proof that you have fished out what the case between the parties is, and very often a person is not able to tell you exactly what his defence is. There is very great difficulty there, and that distinguishes the operation of this Act from the operation of the Small Debt Act. In the Small Debt Act there is no record—there are no pleas of parties: it is all an oral performance; and after the evidence has been gone into, perhaps at considerable length, you come to see that there is really a perfectly different question between the parties from that which you at first thought when they stated the case to you. And the difficulty under the Debts Recovery Act is, in making the pleas in law for them, to get at what is really the truth of the case. The 'pleas in law' necessarily to a large extent contain facts, out of which the pleas arise. At all events, I am satisfied that in many cases it may turn out that the pleas of parties, by which I take it they are bound, do not contain what is really the question between them.

773. Is it not the case that the limitation of expense under the Act has induced many parties to seek a decision of the court who would otherwise have sacrificed their claims?—I don't think so. There has been one remarkable fact about these cases. There have been very few of them which might not have been decided in the ordinary court by a judge dealing with the Act of 1853 in a proper manner, by a minute of defence; and if the Act of 1853 were altered to this extent, that the pursuer could add something at the end of the minute of defence—his reply, as it were, to the minute of defence—I am quite satisfied that I could have tried in that court all those cases that have been brought before me under the Debts Recovery Act.

774. The Lord Justice-General.—You mean as expeditiously?—Yes. In general, these cases are decided within a week, unless the parties wish a longer time, which they sometimes do for particular reasons. No doubt the Act of 1853 gives in the ordinary court a longer space of time to the parties to take the several steps. I think if that were amended, so that all might be done within a shorter time, the whole of these cases might be perfectly disposed of in the ordinary court, the only difference between the two being in the matter of expense, which is statutory under the Debts Recovery Act. The fees which are allowed to procurators are by no means properly remunerative.

775. Mr. Harrison.—In point of fact, do you know whether the number of cases in the ordinary Sheriff Court has been diminished to anything like the same extent as the number of cases which have been brought under the Debts Recovery Act?—I should say probably to the full extent. That is necessarily so, because all these cases might have come to the ordinary court.

776. Have they necessarily diminished?—There is a great number of decrees in absence, and these could have been got in the ordinary court just as well as in the new court.

777. Except that it would have cost three or four times as much?—I have already stated that the only difference is in the matter of expense, but I don't see the principle of the limitation of this form of process to the particular cases to which it is limited in that Act. If this Act is a right measure as to the special cases embraced by it, I do not see why it should not be extended to other cases. I don't see why all the community should not be able to bring their cases in the same way, and I don't see why the limitation—if there is to be a limitation—should be in the Sheriff Court only, and not in every court in the kingdom; and why agents and counsel should not have their fees diminished, in the same way as the procurators under the Debts Recovery Act. I am not proposing anything; I only say that I don't see any principle for existing distinctions.

778. Is it not, in your opinion, the fact that the cases under that Act are generally simpler?—Yes. The great majority of the cases are decrees in absence. But very nice questions may be involved.

779. Dr. Barclay.—You seem to think that procurators are underpaid by the fees under that Act?—Yes.

780. In your opinion, is the principle of paying fees ad valorem a good one, so that an agent may get £3 for a case which lasts only five minutes, while he may get no more for one which lasts three weeks?—I think that is not a good principle.

781. Is not the old principle of being paid pro rata a more equitable one?—I think it is.

782. In an appeal to the Sheriff under the Debts Recovery Act, has the Sheriff power to hear parties?—I think not.

783. Then the Sheriff may, without hearing parties, reverse the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute who has taken the evidence and heard the parties?—Yes.

784. Mr. Clark.—Is that not also the case under the Act of 1853?—I doubt if the Sheriff can hear parties under the Debts Recovery Act; but under the Act of 1853 he can order an oral hearing at any time.

Archibald Davidson.

785. Mr. Harrison.—Is the having maximum fees fixed and known not a very great advantage for litigants?—All fees are fixed and known.

786. Not in the ordinary Sheriff Courts?—Yes. There is a table of fees.

787. Mr. Clark.—But the particular steps to be taken with a view to produce these fees are not known?—No. There is one defect in the Debts Recovery Act which I may notice, viz. that there must be a second diet before there is a judgment. Suppose the parties in a case to appear before the Sheriff, either with professional assistance or without it, and that the matter is quite clear—it may be a point of law which is perfectly obvious, and even the parties may agree that they will take a particular judgment—it is not competent for the Sheriff at the first diet to give a judgment at all. He must appoint a day for a second appearance, when alone he can give judgment. That is a defect in the statute. This has often occurred, and the only way I have contrived to get over it is to tell the parties that a particular day is appointed for disposing of the case, but that they had better not appear; and they settle the case between themselves, according to the view which I have stated to them, and as to which they are agreed. It is a defect in the Act, therefore, that there is no power to decide a case at the first diet.

788. Dr. Barclay.—Is not the second diet only in the case of evidence?—I don't think so.

789. The Chairman.—Are you often asked to take down the evidence in these cases?—I have just been once asked to do so, though I do take it in a short way for my own satisfaction.

790. Mr. Clark.—In the case in which you were asked to take it, was it with a view to an appeal?—I suppose so, but there was no appeal taken in that case.

791. Dr. Barclay.—Where the Sheriff-substitute is not asked to take down the evidence, there is no appeal to the Sheriff?—Except in point of law.

792. The Chairman.—Has there been any appeal taken from your court under the Debts Recovery Act?—There have just been two appeals.

793. Mr. Webster.—With reference to Mr. Harrison's question as to its being a satisfaction to litigants to know the expense of a litigation beforehand, would it not be a greater satisfaction to them if agents were compelled to conduct the case without any fees whatever?—There can be only one answer to that.

794. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to offer as to alterations in the form of procedure in the Sheriff Courts?—I don't think that I have any alteration to propose, except that which I have stated, in regard to the pursuer having the power of making a reply to a minute of defence under the Act of 1853.

795. Mr. Baxter.—That is in the case of short records?—Yes.

796. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think it would be an improvement to prevent all appeals from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff, prior to final judgment?—I don't think that would be an improvement, and I think—if appeals were to be allowed only on leave of the substitute—it would put the Sheriff-substitute into a disagreeable position, because he would very seldom feel inclined to refuse leave to appeal. I don't say that appeals should now be made more frequent than they are by the Act; but it very often happens that a very great deal of expense is incurred before the case arrives at a point at which an appeal can be taken, and then it turns out that the whole of that expense has been thrown away. I have known cases, for example, where there has been a dilatory defence, and where the dilatory defence, by not having been disposed of either by being repelled or sustained, has not come before the Sheriff on appeal, because the Act says it must be disposed of before it can be appealed; but it has been reserved, which the Act of Parliament gives power to do. And I have seen, in regard to that matter, a very large amount of expense incurred which has been thrown entirely away, by that dilatory defence being sustained at the end. That is an example of how it is not always advantageous to limit the power of appeal. I think the matter is very much in the hands of the judge; and if the Sheriff had the power of inflicting a penalty when an appeal was taken without good cause, I think it would be far better than limiting the stages at which an appeal might be taken. It is right I should add that, in my own experience, I have known very few frivolous appeals to the Sheriff, and very few taken merely for delay.

797. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you mean a penalty beyond the expenses?—Yes; because the expense may be nothing. A person can get an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff for sixpence, if he does not ask an oral hearing, or put in a reclaiming petition.

798. You mean a fine?—Yes.

799. Do you propose to fine the party or the procurator?—That might depend upon circumstances. I think, in regard to all matters of delay, the great difficulty is to know whether the delay has been for the benefit of the procurator, or at the desire of the party; and if you could find out that, you might satisfactorily deal with it. I think there should be very little delay indeed for the benefit of procurators, who are very willing to accommodate each other, while their clients are desirous that their cases should be hurried forward. But in many cases the clients do not wish the case to be hurried forward, but are in the course of settlement—both desirous to settle, but neither wishing to make the first advance, and neither desirous that the case should proceed in court. I have known many cases settled by merely allowing delay. But where the delay is made by procurators, it ought to be curbed in every case by the Sheriff to the utmost extent of his power.

800. The Chairman.—Have you any remedy to suggest except that of a fine?—I don't see any other. It is a very difficult matter indeed. I should like to state that there has been a great deal said about the extension of the small debt jurisdiction, and making cases be tried in a summary and expeditious manner, as the small debt cases are tried. For two or three years I got some statistics made up, which I cannot lay my hands on now, as to the number of cases where the debt was above £12, but restricted to that sum, so as to bring it within the Small Debt Act, with these particulars added:—the amount which the pursuer of that restricted case actually got by the judgment; the number of times he succeeded, and the number of times he failed; and the amount in which he succeeded, and the amount in which he failed; and the proportion was marvellous of the few cases in which there had been a restriction where the party got £12. In many cases he failed altogether; and in the majority of cases the judgment given was under £12. I think that is an important fact as to the feeling of the public with reference to extending the jurisdiction. I may also state that, under the Act of 1853—the twenty-third section, I think—any case, to any amount whatever, may be tried as a small debt case; and there have been very few cases indeed in which the parties have agreed to try these larger cases in that way. In some counties, I believe, there has not been a single case. I know there were very few in the county of Aberdeen many years after the Act had been in operation—not, I think, half a dozen—and I know that in some places there have been hardly any at all. In short, that clause in the statute has not been brought into operation; and from that I infer that there is not that desire on the part of the public to extend the small debt jurisdiction that is often alleged. No doubt, under the Act both parties must agree; but I think one party as well as the other is entitled to have a say in that matter.

801. Mr. Campbell.—Is it not your experience, and is it not the case so far as you know in other counties, that under the Debts Recovery Act the parties have generally abstained from requiring the evidence to be taken down?—I don't know how that matter stands in other counties. I think the only judges who have tried these cases in Edinburgh have been yourself and me, and I have had only one case where the evidence was taken.

802. In the cases where the Sheriff-substitute does not take a note of the evidence at the request of parties, his judgment is final on fact?—Yes.

803. Even in cases which may amount to about £50 in value?—Yes.

804. The Chairman.—Has anything occurred to you with reference to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in criminal matters,—whether it ought to be extended in regard to the classes of crime, or in regard to the measure of punishment?—My answer to that is very much the same, with reference to the classes of crime at least, as I made before with reference to the extension of the civil jurisdiction. I don't see why robbery, fire-raising, and rape should not be brought within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff as well as the cases which he now tries. The Sheriff tries all kinds of cases, with the exception of murder, fire-raising, robbery, and rape; and I don't see that it would be at all disadvantageous that the selection of the tribunal before which these cases are to be tried should be left, as all important cases are at present left, to the decision of the Lord Advocate, and that where, for example, there is a case of rape which is not very important, or in which there is not likely to be a sentence of penal servitude, it might be sent to the Sheriff for trial. A rape may be committed on a prostitute, and that may be a very inferior offence compared to a rape committed on a respectable woman. I don't see why such a case as that might not be tried by the Sheriff, if the Lord Advocate thought fit to send it to him for trial. In general, my experience goes in this direction, that the most difficult cases that occur are tried before the Sheriff,—more so than in the Court of Justiciary,—and that the only reason why a case of theft, for example, is taken to the High Court or to the Circuit Court instead of to the Sheriff, is simply this, that there may happen to be one or two additional previous convictions of theft, and it very often happens that cases which are set down for trial at the Circuit Court, or at the High Court of Justiciary, are afterwards remitted with the very same indictment—only it is put into a different shape—to be tried by the Sheriff. I have myself in Aberdeen tried cases the day before the Circuit was held, more important and more difficult than any case that was tried at that Circuit; and I have tried, after the Circuit Court was over, cases that had been indicted for the Circuit, and which were remitted for some reason to the Sheriff afterwards. Now, when the Sheriff is dealing with cases of that kind—heavy cases, where the aggravations have been very numerous—it is impossible not to feel this: why is that individual, who has been found guilty of that heavy offence, with these aggravations, not to receive the same sentence as he would have received if he had been standing at the bar of the Court of Justiciary? It was just the other day that I tried the case of a person, about thirty-five years of age, who had been six times previously convicted of theft, and on one of these convictions the punishment had been nine months' and on another fifteen months' imprisonment; and there was no doubt whatever, that if that person had been tried in the Court of Justiciary, the sentence would have been one of penal servitude. I have felt over and over again that I was going to pass a sentence on a criminal which was not at all adequate to the offence which had been committed; and of course the impression on one's mind is simply this: why should the Sheriff not have the power of inflicting an adequate punishment if the case is tried before him? why should he not have the power of inflicting such a sentence as the Court of Quarter Sessions in England has? I don't see why that should not be the case; and as there is no difference in the mode of trial or in the evidence, and as the cases are identically the same that are tried by the Sheriff and by the Court of Justiciary, I don't see why the Sheriff should not be entitled to impose an adequate punishment. I think the effect on the public mind at present is not a beneficial one. If the public see what is going on in the Sheriff Court just before Circuit and just after it, they see quite as difficult and important cases tried before the Sheriff, and it must occur to them to ask why the sentences inflicted are so different.

805. Is it your opinion that the Sheriff should have the power to inflict penal servitude, or is it your opinion that those cases which are now sent to the Sheriff ought not to be sent to him?—I give no opinion as to that. They are very well tried; that is to say, they result in conviction.

806. But which of the two do you propose?—My answer is, either the one or the other. But these heavy cases are so very numerous, that the Court of Justiciary would certainly have a great deal more to do if they tried all the cases for which penal servitude is the proper punishment, and if the business of the Sheriff Court were diminished to that extent.

807. You suggested that in certain cases of rape, where penal servitude was not likely to be the punishment, the Lord Advocate should have power to send them to the Sheriff. In the cases which you referred to, the Lord Advocate, in his discretion, sent the cases to the Sheriff; but you think they ought not to have been sent to the Sheriff, who has not the power of pronouncing a sentence of penal servitude?—That is the result. My observation in regard to the supposed case of rape was this, that supposing you don't extend the power of the Sheriff to sentence to penal servitude, there are still cases within that which might be fairly tried in the Sheriff Court.

808. What is your own opinion on the subject?—I should leave it to the discretion of the Lord Advocate as before. If there was any miscarriage of justice, I should certainly say these cases ought not to be tried in the Sheriff Court; but there has been no miscarriage, and there is no distinction between the cases, excepting that an officer says there is an additional previous conviction or two; and that being the only difference (which, however, does not always exist), it is very difficult to see why the adequate punishment should not be awarded.

809. Have you any suggestion to make as to appeal in criminal matters?—Before coming to that, I should like to say that I am inclined to do away altogether with the charge of robbery. It has often, in my experience, turned out that a case charged as theft has on the evidence proved to be a case of robbery; and the proper result there is acquittal—first, because the Sheriff cannot try for robbery; and second, because it is not the crime charged. In the Justiciary Act of last session an alteration has been made in the law as regards this matter. In the Court of Justiciary a conviction for the crime of robbery may now be charged in an indictment of theft as an aggravation; and vice versa, in the case of robbery, a previous conviction of theft may be libelled. I am of opinion that that provision should be extended to Sheriff Courts. But in reference to the crime of robbery, it has often turned out—I have seen it frequently—on the evidence being led, that it was not theft at all which was committed, but an act of robbery; and in consequence of that, the jury have been told that they could not convict. Therefore I think the proper provision would be to do away altogether with the distinction between robbery and theft, leaving it to the Lord Advocate to try cases in the Court of Justiciary which ought to go there; and to send cases of a less aggravated nature to the Sheriff.

810. Mr. Clark.—Has the number of cases tried before the Sheriff, which in your opinion demand a punishment of penal servitude, been increasing of late?—Yes, I think so, upon the whole.

811. Are more of that class in the habit of being sent to the Sheriff now than there used to be?—No: I should not say so.

812. Dr. Barclay.—In your practice in Aberdeen, have you not seen that the cases tried before the Sheriff depended very much upon whether the crime was committed immediately before the Circuit Court, or immediately after it—I mean the same kind of cases?—That may be a very good thing to do, instead of keeping a prisoner till next Circuit; and that is just a reason for the extension of the power of the Sheriff.

813. The Chairman.—Precognitions are now taken at the instance of the Sheriff's Fiscal. Do you think that a good system of investigation, or do you think that the duty ought in any degree to be left to the constabulary?—I am most decidedly of opinion, that in no respect, and to no extent, ought it to be left to the constabulary, or rather put upon them, for they haven't it now. Any change of that kind would be fatal to the office of public prosecutor. The constabulary are utterly unfit for such work, except when acting under specific instructions from the public prosecutor. The success of our criminal system has depended on the whole investigation in criminal cases being in the hands of the Procurator-fiscal, under the Sheriff.

814. Do you find any difficulty in regard to harmonious working between the constabulary and the Fiscals in making investigations?—I have known cases of difficulty; that is to say, I have known cases where a Chief Constable, not being aware of his position, nor understanding his duty, has interfered in the matter of criminal investigation to the great detriment of the public service. That I take to be simply an instance of insubordination upon the part of the Chief Constable.

815. Do you consider yourself, as Sheriff of the county, to be the person primarily responsible for peace and order, along with the Lord-Lieutenant; or do you consider that the Chief Constable and the police committee are the persons principally responsible?—I don't think the Lord-Lieutenant is responsible for the peace of the county. The Lord-Lieutenant in Scotland is the head of the Militia, and he has an honorary position as a representative of Her Majesty; but he is not a magistrate as Lord-Lieutenant. He may not be a magistrate at all. If he happens to be a Justice of the Peace, he is not above other Justices. I think the police committee, again, have nothing to do with the executive department of the police. They are not magistrates; they may be, but they are not magistrates as police committee. They are a committee of the Commissioners of Supply, and that only; and their duty is to be found in the last Police Act which created them. I take it they have no place or power beyond finding the force, determining the number of the police, and finding the expense of their maintenance, clothing, etc. That is the position that the police committee occupy. They have the appointment of the Chief Constable; and, in general, the whole financial administration connected with the police, is in the hands of the Commissioners of Supply, or the Police Committee; but they have no power given them by the statute to interfere in any way with the executive part of the duty of the police.

816. The Chief Constable has the power of distributing the constabulary force, and directing their movements?—Yes; the police committee fix upon the districts in which the constabulary are to be placed; and if for any reason they ought to be sent either in greater or less numbers to particular localities, I think that lies with the Chief Constable, unless he is otherwise directed. That is a matter of his ordinary duty.

817. Do you consider that you are entitled to command the services of the constabulary for the peace of the county or the investigation of crime when you find it necessary?—Certainly. The Act of Parliament which created the police did not in the least degree interfere with the position and duty of the Sheriff as the protector of the peace, and the officer who had to take charge of the investigation of crime; and the constabulary by that Act, as I read it, were only an additional assistance given to him for the purpose of exercising his ancient duties in that respect.

818. The Sheriff's Fiscal is the proper officer for the Sheriff to employ in prosecuting the investigation of crime?—He is the hand of the Sheriff in that duty; and whatever he orders the constabulary to do, is either by the express or the implied orders of the Sheriff; and therefore it is the Sheriff's order, and not his.

819. Dr. Barclay.—Is there not something in the Act about the Justices giving orders; and in case of any discrepancy between their orders and those of the Sheriff, the Secretary of State is to judge?—There is a certain power given to Justices of the Peace in Quarter Sessions assembled to give an order to the constabulary; but if it differs from an order given by the Sheriff, the constabulary must obey the Sheriff till the Secretary of State tells them otherwise; but if the constabulary remain within their own province, nothing but the most harmonious feeling should prevail between the Chief Constable, or any of the constabulary, and the Procurator-fiscal.

820. Mr. Clark.—Has the Sheriff any jurisdiction over the burgh police within his county?—Yes.

821. In what respect?—He has the power of ordering them into the county. Are you speaking of Edinburgh?

822. Yes?—In Edinburgh the Sheriff occupies a peculiar position. He has the appointment, along with the Lord Provost, of the Superintendent of Police, and the power of dismissal; but independent of that altogether, I take it that the Sheriff within his county is entitled to order the police in the county, whether within or without the burgh, if what he requires them to do can be done without interfering with their primary duty within burgh.

823. Is the Sheriff responsible for the preservation of the peace within burgh?—Certainly.

824. And therefore he can use the police for that purpose?—More than that. I thought the question was as to using them otherwise. I think he is entitled to take them out of the burgh into the county, and use them there, if they can be dispensed with in the burgh; and probably, whether they can be dispensed with in the burgh or not, is a matter for his discretion. Allow me to add, that the observation which I made in regard to a Chief Constable not acting as I thought within his province, and being insubordinate, did not refer to the county of Midlothian, nor to the present excellent Chief Constable of Aberdeenshire.

825. Mr. Murray.—In the county of Midlothian the Procurator-fiscal gives his whole time to the duties of the office?—He does.

826. Is that by stipulation or understanding?—It is by arrangement on his appointment.

827. The duties are very satisfactorily performed?—They are.

828. Is it your opinion that it would be a judicious step to debar all Procurators-fiscal from private practice?—I think so. But to bring that about, you must give them sufficient remuneration, for it is the most important thing in the world to get a fit man to occupy that important office.

829. But in large counties, where the remuneration may be sufficient, is it advisable, in your opinion, to debar them from private practice?—I think so, certainly.

830. Dr. Barclay.—Do you approve of the Chief Constables being made Procurators-fiscal before the Justices under certain statutes?—I do not. I think the Chief Constable's business is to attend to his constables; and if he has any other work to do which interferes with that primary duty, I think that is objectionable.

831. Mr. Baxter.—If you were to appoint a Procurator-fiscal, and debar him from private practice, you must give him sufficient remuneration?—Undoubtedly.

832. It would not do at present in small places so to debar him?—No.

833. You would not get men of respectability to take the office?—I don't know that in small counties, such as Selkirk, Peebles, or Kincardine, you should debar the Procurator-fiscal from doing any other work. You could not get a fit man if you did so. I am talking of places where there is enough to occupy a man's attention.

834. Mr. Clark.—There is a burgh Fiscal as well as a county Fiscal in this county, and in other counties?—I think there are just two places where there are burgh Fiscals, Edinburgh and Aberdeen; but they don't stand in the same position. Aberdeen keeps its own Fiscal, and pays for him, whereas Edinburgh does not pay for its Fiscal. He is Procurator-fiscal of the county of the city, and is paid by Exchequer in the same way as the Procurator-fiscal of the county of Midlothian.

835. Does that division of duty impair the public service at all?—I don't think it is advantageous.

836. Mr. Baxter.—Does the burgh Fiscal ever prosecute before you?—No.

837. Mr. Gordon.—Would it be an advantage that superannuation allowances should be provided for Procurators-fiscal?—I should say decidedly.

838. At present there are none?—I believe there are none. I think it would facilitate the getting worthy men to take the office.

839. Do you approve of the present system of appointment of Procurators-fiscal by the Sheriff?—Yes.

840. What are the advantages of it?—I think it is a great thing that he should be appointed as he is, removable at pleasure, because he is the confidential officer of the Sheriff, and he is the person through whom the Sheriff acts. If he was in an independent position of the Sheriff, I don't think that would be for the advantage of the public service. It would not be a benefit to the Procurator-fiscal himself. If he is a worthy man, nothing can be more honourable and satisfactory than his present position.

841. It is the Sheriff's interest, I presume, to get an efficient man?—Yes, and to keep him.

842. How would you reconcile the Sheriff's power of dismissal with a superannuation allowance?—You would probably make the superannuation allowance to depend upon the length of service, so that it should be given after a certain period of service; if, during the first or second period of service, the Procurator-fiscal had acted in a proper manner, and been a useful officer, I don't see why he should not have a retiring allowance, unless he had committed some gross delict, for which he was dismissed.

843. But you would not give a power to dismiss him unless for fault or culpa?—The Sheriff has the full power to dismiss him; and he should have that power.

844. That power is never exercised?—It is never, or very seldom, exercised.

845. There are cases in which the Procurator-fiscal has been dismissed, but it was for such conduct as justified the Sheriff's removal of him?—I have an impression of some Procurators-fiscal being removed, but I don't remember the circumstances so as to be able to speak to them.

846. Dr. Barclay.—Seeing that the Procurator-fiscal is in immediate connection with the Crown officers, would it not be an advantage to have the approval of the Lord Advocate to the appointment?—I think not.

847. The Chairman.—Might it not be an advantage to have the concurrence of the Lord Advocate to dismissal?—I think not. I think the proper position of the Sheriff to the Lord Advocate and the Fiscal is, that the Crown should look to the Sheriff, and that if anything goes wrong he should not be able to say, 'But you assisted me in the appointment.' It all works most admirably as it is.

848. Does anything occur to you about the costs of litigation?—No, I have nothing to say about that.

849. As to the privileges of agents, it has been suggested whether it might not be expedient that the agents in one Sheriff Court should be allowed to practise in in any other Sheriff Court; and that the agents in the Sheriff Court should be allowed to follow their cases into the Court of Session?—Most of these bodies of agents have privileges of a very important kind, and I don't know how far it is proper to interfere with those privileges. The present members of these bodies have paid pretty large sums, and been educated in a particular way, in order to obtain admission into these bodies, and I believe the examinations are very thorough. How far these privileges should be interfered with I don't know, or how far they would like them to be interfered with themselves, because the body interfered with would interfere with another body of agents also. I have nothing to suggest as to that.

850. Mr. Baxter.—Have the procurators before your Sheriff Court any exclusive privileges?—They have.

851. Do you know what these are?—The exclusive privilege of practising before the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh.

852. Can any person who is qualified to practise as a solicitor act in the Sheriff Court?—No; he must go through a trial in the ordinary way.

853. Must he serve a certain apprenticeship?—I think he must.

854. Do you know for how long?—No, I don't remember that. But I had occasion to look into this matter some time ago, and I am able to say that the examinations are very thorough.

855. But they must serve an apprenticeship for a certain period, and pay a certain amount of money to the corporation, I believe?—I believe that is the case.

856. Mr. Webster.—In Aberdeen there is also a chartered body?—Yes, they have a royal charter.

857. Lord Barcaple.—Must the apprenticeship be with a procurator of the Sheriff Court?—I rather think the solicitors-at-law in Edinburgh require that their entrants must have, at least for a certain time, been apprentices, or served under a solicitor-at-law.

858. You mean, by solicitor-at-law, a procurator entitled to practise before the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh?—Yes.

859. Mr. Webster.—In Aberdeen is it the same?—I think so.

860. The Chairman.—Are the procurators before the Sheriff in Edinburgh a numerous body?—No, they are not a numerous body.

861. Mr. Gordon.—Are they diminishing in number?—I am not able to speak to that.

862. Mr. Baxter.—Would you allow a Solicitor before the Supreme Courts to appear in your Small Debt Court?—No.

863. Nor in the Commissary Court?—No.

864. Mr. Murray.—Do you mean that you would not allow him, or that he does not do so?—I would not allow the privileges of my procurators to be broken in upon; and if it were mentioned to me that the agent at the bar was not entitled to practise before the court, I should suggest to him that he should leave the court.

865. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose there is no way of getting admission to the body of procurators except serving the apprenticeship which has been mentioned?—I fancy not.

866. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think such limitations are beneficial to the public?—If they can always get an agent in the court, and the fees are all regulated by proper authority, I don't know why it should not. The bar of Scotland don't allow anybody to practise before the Court of Session but themselves.

867. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think these regulations have had the effect of raising the character of the body of procurators?—I don't know, but they are a very respectable body of gentlemen; and there is nothing more important than that the practitioners before the Sheriff Court should be persons of respectability and station. One thing is essential—that a judge should have full power and authority over all who practise before him.

868. Dr. Barclay.—What is your opinion as to requiring procurators to take out a licence?—I don't know that it injures the public in any way.

869. Mr. Webster.—Within your county, what other courts are there besides the Sheriff Court?—There are the Justice of Peace Court and the Burgh Court.

870. And the Dean of Guild Court?—Yes.

871. What is the jurisdiction of the Burgh Court in civil matters?—I don't know that I can exactly explain that. They never come under my observation in any way.

872. I put the question with a view to getting your opinion as to the propriety of continuing the jurisdiction of such a court in civil matters?—I cannot say whether they do any business or not. In short, I have no experience of that court.

873. Have you any opinion as to whether the Dean of Guild Court should be continued as at present, at least in large towns, or whether the jurisdiction should be transferred to the Sheriff Court?—There is a doubt how far the Sheriff can interfere with the Dean of Guild's office—how far the duties may be to a certain extent co-ordinate. Otherwise, I should say the Dean of Guild is a very useful officer.

874. Mr. Murray.—Do you think the Dean of Guild Court gives satisfaction generally?—I think very likely not; but I am not able to say that it does not. It is highly probable it does not.

Archibald Davidson.

875. You are aware that the Dean of Guild is elected by the public?—Yes.

876. And that he does the most difficult part of his duty by deputy,—the assessor?—I don't know how he exercises his function.

877. Do you think that a good theory of a court, where the judge is elected by popular election, and where he does his duty by deputy?—I think that is not exactly the best tribunal.

878. Don't you think it would be better to transfer it at once to the Sheriff Court?—I don't know; I should say the Dean of Guild has a great many duties to discharge, which he is quite competent to discharge, and which he does well; but I have not that knowledge of the court, and the way in which it conducts its business, to give a more definite answer to the question.

879. Mr. Gordon.—Has the business in the Sheriff Court of Edinburgh increased or diminished of late years?—I really am not able to answer that question. I don't know the statistics.

880. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make to the Commissioners?—There occurs to me one thing which, as I have no personal interest in it, I should like to mention; and that is, that I have always thought that the practice at Circuit of trying the Sheriffs was a very improper one, quite unnecessary, in fact ridiculous, and not tending to increase their authority, or the respect which ought to attach to them. I have seen persons complain of a Sheriff, and I have heard the answer given from the bench to such a complainant more than once, that nothing could be done, and therefore the complainant is told to go away, after being invited to make the complaint that he does make. I don't think that is a proper thing. That practice ought either to be abandoned by the power of the Court of Justiciary itself, or, if necessary, by statute.

881. Dr. Barclay.—Are you of opinion that it is expedient to extend the summary criminal jurisdiction of the Sheriff, which is at present limited to a fine of £10, or sixty days' imprisonment?—I should be against that. If a man is to be punished more severely than that, he had better be punished in the way that more serious cases are dealt with.

882. Do you consider it to be right, that when a prisoner's declaration has been taken, his counsel should not have a right to call for it to be read to the jury, when he thinks it for the prisoner's advantage, while the prosecutor has the power to read it if he considers it detrimental to the prisoner?—I should say the counsel, or agent for the person accused, has always the power to call for it; and if it was refused by the public prosecutor, the case of the prisoner would be as much benefited by that refusal as if the declaration were read.

883. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think the prisoner, through his counsel, should have the power of calling for that declaration if it may be used against him?—As the principle of a declaration is that it is no evidence for the person who emitted it, I don't see that.

884. Then you don't think he should have that power?—Practically, whenever a declaration is called for, it is always read; at least I have never seen a case in which it was refused, so far as I recollect. I thing it bad practice to refuse it.

885. Assuming that the power of refusal is exercised, don't you think the prisoner should have the benefit of it, if he desires it, through his counsel?—It is difficult to answer that question. What prevents me from answering it decidedly in favour of his getting it, is that it is no evidence for him. I think it is open to an observation of very great weight, that he has asked for a document which would have been of importance if it had been read, and that it has been refused.

886. Then you think the power should not be given?—I found my opinion entirely on the ground I have stated.

887. Lord Barcaple.—You mean that it could only be introduced as part of the evidence for the prosecution, and that it might be an inconvenient and absurd thing for the prosecutor to produce evidence which he was not relying upon?—No. I have said that, according to my experience, it has been always produced when asked for; and the only ground on which I think it should not be imperative to produce it is, that it cannot be produced as evidence for the defence.

888. Mr. Adam.—But would you make it admissible evidence for the defence?—I don't see any harm in doing it.

889. Dr. Barclay.—Where a prisoner, when brought before the magistrate, makes a statement which coincides with the evidence laid before the jury, is it not fair that he should have an opportunity of showing that his statement has all along been consistent, because if it has been inconsistent his declaration is read to the jury?—That is a case in which I think it is very difficult indeed for the Crown to refuse to produce that declaration; and its refusal would open this observation of the judge to the jury, that it was a very strong fact in favour of the prisoner.

890. In regard to declarations, don't you think the English system—which is statutory, and by which the prisoner is asked if he wishes to make any statement, and told that he need not do so, no questions being put to him, but his statement being taken down if he makes any—is more fair than that adopted in Scotland, of putting the prisoner to a sort of torture by asking him leading questions, and if he does not answer them, writing down that he cannot answer them?—I don't pretend to be personally acquainted with the English system; but as a person brought before a magistrate to make his declaration is warned with reference to any statement he may make, and told that he is entitled to hold his tongue if he pleases, I don't think a jury will attach much weight—if they are properly instructed—to the fact of his having declined to answer, unless it be in a particular case, where the answer which would relieve him could be given only by himself. Supposing a person charged with theft, and found in possession of the stolen property, if he says, 'I decline to state anything about this property,' I think that is a fact which the jury would very rightly take into consideration.

891. The Lord Justice-General.—Is that not a fact which might be proved against the prisoner, even although he was not called upon to make any declaration?—Quite so; if a policeman apprehended the man with the stolen property in his possession, and asked him where he got it, and he declined to answer, that could be proved.

892. Mr. Clark.—Is the prisoner tortured in taking his declaration?—I have sometimes taken declarations as a magistrate, and I have always discouraged putting questions.

893. And practically the questions are only put for the purpose of fairly eliciting the prisoner's statement?—Yes.

894. Mr. Campbell.—Are you aware that in Edinburgh the Procurator-fiscal abstains from putting questions to the prisoner, and that the Sheriff-substitute alone puts them; so that if the Sheriff-substitute is fit for his office, he takes good care that he only gives the prisoner a fair opportunity of stating such facts as may be pertinent to the case?—I think that is quite a right practice.

895. Dr. Barclay.—Do you think it necessary in criminal cases to have a jury of fifteen, while there are only twelve in civil cases, and in England only twelve in criminal cases?—I think that is quite unimportant. No doubt it is a great tax in the way of bringing so many jurymen, but the changes of late years have made a great difference in the labours of jurymen. The first diets which have been in operation for some time in the Sheriff Court, and which are now extended to the Court of Justiciary, have relieved jurymen from attendance to a very large extent indeed. There is one observation I would make in regard to that matter. According to the recent Court of Justiciary Act, the accused does not receive a list of the jury till he has pleaded not guilty at the first diet. In the Sheriff Court he gets his indictment with a list of the jury before the first diet; the result of which is, if he pleads guilty, that those persons who have been put down as the jurymen for that case, or these cases, if there are more than one, are relieved from attendance, and you go on to the next batch of the jury list, by which you get through the jury list quicker than you would otherwise do. I don't think that is an advantage; and I think it would be well if the system introduced into the Court of Justiciary were extended to the Sheriff Court, and if the prisoner did not get his list of jurymen till after the first diet.

896. Mr. Baxter.—Does it frequently happen that at the first diets all the prisoners plead guilty except one, and that forty-five jurymen are called for that one case?—Even if what I am proposing were carried into effect, that would still be the case.

897. Would it not be expedient to reduce the number of jurymen?—I daresay forty-five may be too many. But there might be this difficulty, that the one case might consist of a number of prisoners, and they would all have their challenges.

898. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you think the number of jurymen for the trial of each case should be reduced from fifteen?—I don't see any call for that being done, but I don't think it would be objectionable to do it.

899. Mr. Clark.—The Sheriff can only summon forty-five jurors for his own court?—I think he may summon as many as he likes. I think the words of the Act are, 'not less than forty-five.'

900. Dr. Barclay.—Do you think that the limit of age of jurymen is not drawn too low at sixty, seeing that judges remain on the bench much longer, and do their duty well?—But the judge is accustomed to sit on the bench, and a juryman is not accustomed to sit in the jury-box. Supposing you had a heavy case in the Sheriff Court or the Court of Justiciary, which was likely to last for several days, it would not be an advantageous thing to have a gentleman of 70 years of age in the jury-box.

901. Mr. Clark.—Do you find the jury list well taken up in your county?—I have had a great deal of trouble about that. I think we get through our jury list in a year.

902. Do you find that the list really includes all persons who are legally liable to serve?—I should think there must be a very great number omitted, particularly in the higher ranks.

903. From what cause?—I have never been able to get at that.

904. The Lord Justice-General.—Apart from the exemptions, don't you know in point of fact that a great many persons are not on the jury list who ought to be there?—I think so.

Archibald Davidson.

905. Can you account for that?—I cannot, except by the carelessness of the men in taking the lists up. I have tried to remedy it. I introduced a system in Aberdeen, and I have continued it in this county, by which there is a revisal of the list before the time that say a hundred persons are to be put down for service, in order to see how many are alive, or how many are above sixty; and the way we accomplished that was by sending out schedules to be filled up by the jurymen on the list. In Aberdeenshire that was admirably well done, and also afterwards in Kincardineshire and Banffshire, so that at Circuit hardly a juryman was absent, because those who returned a good excuse we struck off the list. But in Edinburgh they have found out that they are not bound to return the schedule, and they don't do so.

906. Who is the officer charged with the duty of making up the jury list?—It is the Sheriff-clerk.

907. How is he paid for that?—The Exchequer have agreed to pay the expense of the system I mentioned, and the men have been paid, so that there is no excuse in that respect.

908. How was the Sheriff-clerk paid before that system was introduced?—I think he was just allowed so much for making up the list,—a payment to officers, and no allowance to himself.

909. That was supposed to be covered by his salary?—Yes.

910. Do you think the jury list is likely to be well or carefully made up under such a system?—I don't know. There are defects somewhere, but where that is I don't know. I am afraid it is in the officers who do it, and yet they have received the fullest instructions; but now that we have got a register of voters and lists for taxes, it is very singular that anybody should be omitted who is bound to serve.

911. There is an existing evil, then?—There is something wrong.

912. But you are not able to trace the causes of it?—No.

913. Nor to suggest a remedy?—No.

914. Dr. Barclay.—Don't you often see persons in the list of common jurors that you think ought to be special jurors, and vice versa?—Very often the best men are among the common jurors. I am told they have a particular liking to be on the common list. When we send out schedules, they return themselves as common jurors, while they ought to be special jurors.

James Campbell, Esq.	James Webster, Esq.
George Harrison, Esq.	Adam Paterson, Esq.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

Francis Russell, Esq. examined.

Francis Russell.

915. The Chairman.—You are Sheriff-substitute of Roxburghshire?—Yes.

916. How long have you been so?—Above seven years.

917. You are a member of the bar?—I am. I passed advocate in 1836.

918. The Sheriff of Roxburghshire has been a resident Sheriff?—He has,—the only one in Scotland for some years. He was appointed in the year 1807, and has always resided in the county.

919. How many courts do you hold?—Two weekly at present. It has been a question with the Procurators whether there should not be only one, for this reason, that there are four considerable towns in Roxburghshire, namely, Hawick, Kelso, Melrose, and Jedburgh, and on that account there has been considerable difficulty in conducting the business. It is difficult to get the agents to attend personally to the cases. Galashiels has been taken out of Roxburgh by a recent Act.

920. The court is held at Jedburgh?—Yes; at present twice a week, proofs being of course taken on other days, if required.

Francis Russell.

921. Do you hold Small Debt Courts?—Yes, at Hawick, Melrose, and Kelso.

922. And also at Jedburgh?—Yes; there is a weekly court at Jedburgh, and the others are held at intervals of from two to three months.

923. In the Small Debt Court the judgment pronounced by the Sheriff-substitute or the Sheriff who may happen to sit, is final?—Yes.

924. In the other court there is an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff?—Yes; except in cases where the statute excludes it, and these are very numerous now.

925. Do you mean cases where statutory jurisdiction is given excluding review?—I mean so. The judgment of the Sheriff or the Sheriff-substitute, as the case may be, is there final; one of the most important of that class of cases is cases under the Bankruptcy Act. Either Sheriff may make the inquiry as to the election of trustees, or the right of voting, and there is no appeal from his judgment. Where there is an appeal at all, it is to the Court of Session. Sometimes there is no appeal at all. A number of statutes have been passed giving jurisdiction and excluding appeals. I may mention the Nuisances Removal Act, and the Police of Towns Acts, in which very important executive duties are given to the Sheriffs. There is an appeal to the Sheriff in certain cases, but in a great many there is no appeal, and in others there is no appeal to the Sheriff, but only to the Court of Session. These Acts are very numerous now.

926. Mr. Shand.—Would you mention the others?—Among them are—The Burial Grounds Act (1855); The Parochial and Burgh Schools Act (1861); The Boundaries of Burghs Extension Act (1857); The Public Health Scotland Act (1867); The Ecclesiastical Buildings Act (1868); The Mines Regulation Act (1860); and generally those Acts by which penalties are imposed for statutory offences.

927. The Chairman.—Have you any observation or suggestion to make to the Commissioners with reference to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of Sheriffs and Sheriff-substitutes?—I have here a series of questions which were issued by a committee of Sheriff-substitutes in order to get the answers of the Sheriff-substitutes to them; as these embrace the whole points mentioned in the Note with which I have been furnished by the secretary of this Commission, I shall give my answers with reference to these, if it is equally agreeable to your Lordship.

928. Mr. Shand.—Have the Sheriff-substitutes formed themselves into a committee?—It is not organized; but some time ago they named a committee on the subject of their salaries, and afterwards, when this Commission was appointed, to take what measures might seem expedient in order to bring their views under the notice of the Commissioners.

929. Mr. Webster.—Have you got the answers of the Sheriff-substitutes?—No; I have merely got the questions.

930. Mr. Shand.—But the paper before you has been prepared by an association of Sheriff-substitutes?—A committee.

931. Appointed by the Sheriff-substitutes?—Appointed by them at a general meeting.

932. The Chairman.—What observations have you to make with reference to the constitution of the Sheriff Courts?—My first observation is that in the present state of the Sheriff Court, there is great cause of delay in the frequent appeals from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff. I now hand in an abstract prepared from the Parliamentary returns, which abstract contains a good deal of information. Speaking first with reference to the delays consequent on these appeals, you will find the statistics at page 11 of the abstract. The first column states the number of appeals taken in 1863. Under the Act of 1853 it is in the power of the parties to take a judgment from the Sheriff-substitute on appeal to the Sheriff without any argument; and the second column on the page refers to the cases in which there has been neither oral nor written pleading upon the appeal. The third and fourth columns give the number of cases in which written pleadings were lodged, and the next column the number of cases in which there was oral pleading. There cannot be both oral and written pleadings in the same case; and it is in the option of the party appealing to lodge a reclaiming petition or to enter a minute craving an oral hearing. The abstract shows the average number of days occupied in disposing of the appeals; and I don't think there is overhead a very great difference between the time occupied where there is oral pleading and where there is written pleading. In some counties there is a great difference, and in others there is not a great difference. It would be absurd to strike an average over Scotland; but it may be said that three months is something like the average period, and there are not many less than sixty days. The abstract is unfortunately imperfect, because the Parliamentary returns are imperfect, some of the counties not having given in their returns. There is none for Perthshire, for example.

933. Mr. Gordon.—A return was got from Perthshire?—There may have been some supplementary tables printed since this abstract was made; but I think it will be found that, on an average, three months may be taken as the period from the date of the interlocutor appealed from, to the date of the interlocutor deciding in the appeal. It is of importance to keep in view the various points on which appeals may be taken in a process. In an address by Lord Ormidale, of which a copy was sent to me, he stated a case in which there might be ten appeals from the judgments of the Lord Ordinary to the Inner House. In our court there might be an exceptional case in which there might be ten appeals; but there may be five appeals in a very ordinary case, and I shall state at what points these might take place. The first may be from a judgment repelling a preliminary defence before condescendence and answers are ordered. It is the duty of the judge, under the Act of 1853, to dispose of the preliminary pleas at as early a stage as practicable. That is appeal No. 1. Then after he has considered the defences, and the record is closed, there is an interlocutor ordering proof, and there may be an appeal from that judgment. That is appeal No. 2. After the conclusion of the proof there is an appeal on the admission or rejection of evidence. That is appeal No. 3. Then at the conclusion of the proof, and after the parties have been heard upon its import, and on the whole cause, the Sheriff-substitute's judgment may be taken to appeal. That is appeal No. 4. Then in the very ordinary case where expenses are found due, subject to modification, there is a further appeal to the Sheriff on that point; and that is appeal No. 5. Now I have taken no extraordinary case at all, but a case which quite ordinarily occurs; and that being so, there being five appeals to a judge, who is required by statute to hold only four courts in a year for the hearing of appeals, and where it is in the power of the appellant to require an oral hearing in regard to all these appeals, it seems to me quite inevitable that there shall be great delays in that court. The next point I have to state is this, that there is no sufficient guarantee that the judge exercising the appellate jurisdiction shall be so manifestly superior to the judge exercising the jurisdiction in the first instance, as to satisfy the litigants and the public that his judgment, given in the same court, and with no other aids than those available to the Sheriff-substitute, except the judgment and note of the Sheriff-substitute, shall be presumably a better judgment. I may here state that there has been a very great change in the office of Sheriff-substitute since its institution in 1748, after the passing of the Jurisdiction Act. Originally the Sheriff-substitutes were appointed by the Sheriff, subject to dismissal by him at any time, and without any cause assigned. They were not generally lawyers, and they had no regular training; and no question of inferiority or superiority could possibly be raised between them and the Sheriffs. But things are changed now. With very few exceptions Sheriff-substitutes are members of the bar; many of them, in the opinion of those who are conversant with their exercise of the duties of their office, are well qualified to discharge those duties. Then the question arises, is the appellate judge clearly superior to the other, who is called the Sheriff-substitute, or whom I may call the Resident judge, for that is the peculiar quality which seems to distinguish him? I am aware that I am touching on delicate questions, but I cannot help it. So long as I was not called on by any public authority I have not agitated this; but I have been called to speak about it, and I must refer to it. It is a question whether the bar of Scotland, after deducting from it those quite at the head of it, who would not undertake the duties of the office of Sheriff, can afford from twenty to thirty persons so manifestly superior to those who discharge the duties of Sheriff-substitute, that the result of their appellate jurisdiction will be thoroughly satisfactory to the public or to litigants. That is the form in which the question arises for me. I am assuming that the best appointments which the bar would afford are made. In many cases, I believe, appointments are made with great judgment and seriousness; but I am afraid that they are still sometimes made with precipitancy, when political changes are imminent especially, and sometimes perhaps at other times, and without a due consideration of the very serious duties which a Sheriff has to discharge. But even assuming that the appointments are well made, I say that the public is not satisfied that there is a sufficient superiority of the judge of appeal over the ordinary judge. This is a question of delicacy, and I will not go into details of any sort in reference to it. I will only state generally that it is a question which I think deserves very serious consideration. A third point is, that when judges are appointed with such important duties as the Sheriff-substitutes have to discharge, there should be nothing done to discredit their office; and I think that the present system does so to a serious extent, in this way,—they are the ordinary judges of the court, and must necessarily be so, they are bound by law to be resident in the counties; the Sheriff is bound to be in ordinary attendance in the courts of law during their sessions, which implies that he shall be resident in Edinburgh. Of course he may be a visitor in his county as to any other county, during the recesses of the court; but that is not the point. The matter is that substantially he cannot be the ordinary judge of the court, but he is entitled at any time to sit in it; he may come down any day when a court is to be held, and say to the Sheriff-substitute, 'I will take this court to-day.' So in regard to criminal trials, he may come down for this or that criminal trial. I shall have to call attention to the statistics of these cases tried by the Sheriff. They are few in number, but this only enhances the evil; for the public get no considerable advantage from it, and the ordinary judge is discredited, because it is said, 'Here is a better man come to try these cases.' If it were cases of serious and peculiar difficulty that were selected, it would be different; but the Sheriff comes just when it is convenient for him, and if there are cases he tries them. He may sit in the Jury Court trying cases there, or in the Summary Court disposing of criminal cases without a jury. All that goes to discredit the ordinary judge, and to raise the question whether he is well qualified to discharge these duties; and the fact of the Sheriff discharging them in these circumstances, when the ordinary judge is at hand and prepared to act, implies that the other judge is the better qualified. If the resident Sheriffs are not capable of discharging to the satisfaction of the public the duties with which they are entrusted, they ought not to be there, and the sooner they are out of the place the better; if they are sufficiently qualified, they ought not to be discredited by any arrangements by which the ordinary exercise of their duty shall be thus interfered with by an authority which is superior in fact,—superior in effect,—without necessarily being superior in quality. These are the principal grounds on which I think it is really desirable that the whole of this question of the constitution of the court shall be reconsidered, in order to avoid the evils which I have mentioned, namely the delays, with the unsatisfactory result as respects the judgments, and the discredit thus put upon the Sheriff-substitutes. One of the questions put for the consideration of the Sheriff-substitutes raises this question of appeal from the resident Sheriff, 'Ought the present system to be continued, modified, or abolished?' What I have said implies that there are serious evils attending it, and the question is, how are these to be met? I am not prepared to say that at present either the resident Sheriffs of the counties are so strong and well prepared to discharge all duties, or, on the other hand, that the Court of Session is so free for work, that some intermediate court between the Sheriff-substitute and the Court of Session can be safely dispensed with. I say, at present. We have had very important reforms in the Court of Session, and we shall have reforms in the Sheriff Court, and what the result may be at some future time I cannot say, but I think at present we require some intermediate court between the resident Sheriff and the Court of Session. I think it of great importance that the judges discharging these duties shall be in such a position as to give great weight to their judgments. Of some of the Sheriffs at present holding office, one would say that there cannot be better than they are; in fact they might hardly be got even for the duties of an appeal judge, but perhaps they might. I would suggest that there should be a limited number of districts in Scotland, and an appeal judge over each, whose duty it should be to hold Circuit Courts once a month, or at other short intervals, for the disposal of appeals at all the places in his district at which ordinary courts are held, and on days named either by statute or by the Home Secretary. As it is desirable to get rid of the expense of written pleadings (which is not very easily subject to regulation), I think that there should be no written pleadings allowed unless in quite exceptional circumstances, if at any time, and that the appeal should be a mere minute of appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and an oral hearing at the next Circuit Court held by the judge of appeal for the district.

Francis Russell.

934. Mr. Campbell.—A single judge of appeal?—I think so, for one or two reasons. There has been a proposal made that the court, instead of consisting of one judge, should consist of two or three. But there are great difficulties in the way of that proposal. Printing is almost a necessity if you have several judges of appeal, and that alone greatly increases the expense; and if the papers are not printed, two or three copies of the proceedings must be made, which would be nearly as expensive. I have also great faith in the increased responsibility which a single judge feels when he knows that all rests upon him, and that he cannot throw the blame upon somebody else if the judgment does not turn out quite so satisfactory as at the time it was thought to be. What geographical arrangements would be necessary to carry out any view of this kind, would require a good deal of consideration. I was confidentially asked some time ago,—I am not at liberty to say by whom,—to prepare a scheme for a reduction of the number of Sheriffs; but that was not upon the footing of so great a change as I have now proposed. I have here a copy of the scheme which I prepared. The number of Sheriffs at present in Scotland is, I think, twenty-four; but when the reduction of the number contemplated by the Act 16 & 17 Vict. cap. 92, is fully in operation, there will be twenty-two remaining. My scheme proposed to reduce these to eleven; but if they are only to act as judges of appeal, I think that a very much smaller number would be sufficient, and that from six to eight, or perhaps even less, would cover the whole of Scotland. It would be necessary to make some exceptional arrangements in regard to the northern parts of the country. It is not necessary that appeal judges shall travel to remote parts of the Highlands, where there are almost no appeals, as is seen from the returns; and in regard to these, some arrangements might be made for written pleadings, or some other exceptional arrangement to meet the exceptional case. But taking the wealthy and populous parts of Scotland, including all of it except Argyleshire on this side of the Caledonian Canal, there would be no difficulty in holding these courts at these intervals. There is direct railway communication to all the places at which the courts would have to be held; and I think an energetic man would have no difficulty in overtaking the duties of a pretty large district, and holding courts once a month. In England the County Court judges have to hold a circuit every month; and I remember Mr. Elmslie, who is not now alive, but who was a County Court judge in Derbyshire, telling me that he got through his duties in the first fortnight of each month, and that he had the second fortnight to himself, the duties being all discharged in court. That may be taken as a very fair average, though some have very heavy duties, and may take a longer time to get through them. But I don't think that such duties as I refer to here would take anything like so long as a fortnight in most cases. In most of the districts I should think a week would overtake all the duties of holding courts at the different points where they would have to be held. In some cases it might take ten days, but that would be quite sufficient. It may be a question whether, when there are two local courts in any county, there is any necessity for the appellate judge going to each. Take for example Falkirk and Stirling. If there is an appeal court for the county held at Stirling, any agents residing at Falkirk could go to Stirling with their papers and debate their appeals. There is no question here about witnesses, which would make it important to hold courts at all the places at which ordinary courts are held. In many of these appeal courts, I think that counsel might be employed, at less expense to the litigants than at present, when frequently employed in drawing written pleadings, and at greater advantage to the courts. In proposing this arrangement, I am assuming that the duties of the Sheriffs not resident in the counties would be confined to the duties of appeal judges, and that they should be relieved of the quantity of detail which they have now in their hands as exercising administrative duties. Some of these cannot be very conveniently administered by a judge who is not in the county. I am quite aware that there are some advantages in the present system as regards that. There is a convenience in having at headquarters, as a means of communication with the Lord Advocate, and with any other local authorities, one who is familiar with the county in regard to special difficulties that may arise. But these are exceptional; and I am afraid that if we are to secure the efficient discharge of the ordinary duties of judge, we must be prepared to part with some of the advantages which the present system affords. If that were done, I think appeal judges might be got of so high a position, and with such important duties to perform, as would ensure their efficiency. They would be thoroughly acquainted with their duties, and there would be a very great advantage in this way, that there would come under their notice the proceedings in the different courts, and that would be likely to bring out any defects in the manner in which records were prepared or cases debated in a particular court; and the general tendency of that would be to raise the character of the proceedings in each court more effectually than can be done by each Sheriff making a remark in his own county without knowing by intimate acquaintance what is done in other counties. There is another question which arises here—not a question of law, but a practical question: Ought there to be a direct appeal in all cases from the resident Sheriff to the Court of Session? Such an appeal is competent at present; but when it was taken in the case Malcolm v. Ballantyne, some strong remarks were made by the Court upon the impropriety of bringing a judgment direct from the Sheriff-substitute. Now I think it should be in the option of the parties, if they think it right, to take an appeal direct to the Court of Session without going to the appeal judge. I think there would be great facility of access to the appeal judge, and it is probable that in comparatively few cases would there be a desire to go direct to the Court of Session; but I think it might be convenient to give parties the option, and it would be a kind of test as to public feeling, and as to whether there is satisfaction felt with the appeal judge. If the public were not satisfied with him, they would more frequently bring their cases direct to the Court of Session; and I dare say that with the improvements which have been introduced, or shall be introduced, in regard to the conduct of business in that court, it will be able to overtake these cases with less delay than heretofore.

Francis Russell.

935. Mr. Webster.—How would that work in the case of a party wishing delay?—That depends on the Court of Session. The Court of Session may be in a condition to decide the case quite as quickly as the appeal judge. The appeal would be taken at the same point of time as that at which it would be taken to the appeal judge. You are now asking a question about the Court of Session, and it may have its hands so free as to be able to decide the case with as little delay as the appeal judge, for it has not to wait till next Circuit. It takes the case the day it comes into its hands, and it rests with the court how long it shall be in its hands.

936. Would you put it in the power of a party wishing delay to enter an appeal to the Court of Session direct just before the long vacation, instead of going to the appeal court?—It might be in the power of the Court of Session to send it back.

937. But the appeal might be taken at a time when the Court of Session would not meet for several months?—These are details, and regulations might be made as to these. That was not the objection taken by the court in the case of Malcolm v. Ballantyne; the objection taken there was, that it was wrong to pass over the intermediate court. However, I don't think that a matter of much importance, because I believe that if the appeal court sits monthly, and is attended, as it will be, with very small expense to the litigants, there will be very little need to run to the Court of Session, unless in exceptional cases, for which there would probably be some good reason, other than a desire for delay. The next question put for the consideration of the Sheriffs-substitute is, 'What in your opinion is the best mode of securing a cheap and speedy review of the judgments of the resident Sheriffs?' I have already answered that, and I have stated that, in the event of there being appeal judges, their duties should be restricted to those of appeal judges. Then there is the question, Ought the right to review the judgment of any resident Sheriff, following on oral probation, to be confined to the power to review in questions of law? It has been matter of great discussion whether there should be appeals from a judge who has heard the evidence, to a judge who forms his opinion on notes of the evidence, and I feel that that is a question of great difficulty; but I am not prepared to say that it would be safe to dispense with the appeal. Whether there is any particular class of cases in which it might be dispensed with, may be a question; for it is a difficult duty and not very satisfactory to have to judge of the whole facts from mere notes of evidence, not only the witnesses not being seen, but the ipsissima verba of the witnesses not being before the judge; but that is a point which will deserve consideration. The next matter is directly connected with the other, and it refers also to the constitution of the court. Ought the power of appointing the resident Sheriffs to be transferred to the Crown? In regard to the Sheriffs-substitute, I think there is a universal feeling that it will be more consistent with nearly universal practice, and more consistent with the position which they occupy as resident judges discharging very important functions, that they should be appointed by the Crown. They are now appointed by the Sheriffs, but are not removable by them. There has been a great change since the report of the Law Commission in 1834 on that subject. The Commissioners in their first report, speaking of the manner in which the Sheriffs-substitute should be appointed and dismissed, state this: 'On the other hand, the great majority of the Sheriffs and other persons whom we have judged it proper to examine, are of opinion that as the Sheriff is answerable for his substitute, it is indispensably necessary that he should have the power of summarily dismissing him.' The Commissioners made a qualified recommendation; they recommended that the Sheriff-substitute should only be dismissed with the approval of the Heads of the Court, and upon that footing the office has stood ever since.

I have made this quotation to show how great has been the change of opinion since that time. I suppose no member of this Commission, and no witness examined before it, will propose that the Sheriffs shall have the power of summarily dismissing their substitutes, though that was the general opinion in 1834. If the system of giving more extensive jurisdiction is carried out, and appeal judges are appointed, the force of the argument is greater. It would be quite out of the question that these appeal judges should appoint the other judges who are to act in the different counties over which they have an appellate jurisdiction. I have a very clear opinion—I believe it is the universal opinion of the Sheriff-substitutes, and I think it is the general opinion of the public, or of all who have inquired into this matter—that it is inconsistent with the position of a judge exercising such important functions, that he shall be appointed by a private person who is irresponsible, —in this sense, that nobody can call him to account for having made any particular appointment. The only existing check on it is this, that the appointment is now subject to the approval of the Heads of the Court of Session,—of the Lord Justice-General and the Lord Justice-Clerk for the time. I am not aware whether that has had much effect as a condition of the appointment, the general understanding being that in almost no case, or in no case, has the approval been refused, which would lead one to say that the Sheriffs have in general made good appointments. If one were to say anything else, it would imply a criticism in the conduct of the Heads of the Court which I should be the last to say there was any propriety in making, or any call for being made. It is a delicate thing to ask judges to refuse their assent to the appointment of a member of the bar; but I believe the judges would exercise the duty to the best of their ability. In some cases they have personal knowledge of the person, in other cases they require evidence, and to a certain extent I assume that the check has been successful. At any rate, I believe the general opinion is that the Sheriff-substitutes as a body discharge their duties satisfactorily.

938. Mr. Campbell.—Don't you think, on the whole, considering the appointments that have been made during the last twenty years, that the patronage of the Sheriffs has been generally exceedingly successful, that is to say, that they have generally secured the very best men they could get to accept the office?—I think the appointments have been very good; but I don't put it on the ground of their not having been good.

939. Have you ever known any patronage in which, on the whole, the public service has been more successfully advanced than in the appointment of the Sheriff-substitutes?—I am not prepared to say that; but I make no question about it.

940. But, as contrasted with the patronage of the Crown, don't you think there has been an absence of political and other partialities which has honourably distinguished the appointments of Sheriff-substitutes? —Well, that is a leading question. I really don't like to say so, and I am not prepared to say so. I think some Sheriffs have not made successful appointments of Sheriff-substitutes, and I think a good many appointments have been made which have not been the best possible appointments. I may state further, that if there is a bad appointment of a Sheriff, it follows probably that, should a vacancy occur, there will be a bad appointment of a Sheriff-substitute, because if a weak man is appointed Sheriff, he is not going to put a strong man into the office of Sheriff-substitute. There is a very natural jealousy felt; and a Sheriff does not like to appoint a man his substitute whom he feels to be stronger than himself.

941. Assuming that the Sheriff still retained his right of nomination, do you think it would add to the respectability of the position of Sheriff-substitute, that he should receive his commission to sit as judge in the Sheriff Court, in the first instance from the Crown?—I was going to say that. The ground on which I put it is not that the selections will be better, but that the office will be in a better position. The present system puts the Sheriff-substitute to some disadvantage. He has in his court others who get their appointments from the Crown—the Sheriff-clerk, for example, and it does not seem to me becoming that the judge sitting in that court should be appointed by a private person. I don't want to go into details, or to name persons; but I will say, that there is much more disposition now than there was some years ago, to exercise the patronage with a strong, clear sense of responsibility; and I hope the public will exact that sense of responsibility, and have no mercy on appointments that may be made without due regard to the exercise of the duties of the office, to which any person shall have been appointed. If a Crown presentation is not good here, what is it good for? Our superior judges must be appointed by the Crown, and we must assume that the Crown, through its officers, is well qualified to ascertain the capabilities of persons to be selected for inferior offices; and if they don't do so, it is not from want of capacity, but from want of due care, for they have the means of getting the information. I am not raising any question as to the appointments at present in force having been good.

942. Mr. Paterson.—Is it your opinion that the appointments of the Sheriff-substitute should be left with the Crown?—Yes.

943. Supposing the Crown to be the patrons, would you still continue the veto of the heads of court?—They could not veto with a Crown presentation.

944. Would that, then, not be in some degree more irresponsible than it is now?—But I am afraid it would not be consistent with the Crown presentation.

945. I am speaking of the protection of the public? —The Sheriff might be entitled to make a suggestion to the Lord Advocate. I think there should be some other person than the Lord Advocate, whose recommendations are understood in matters of Sheriffships to be very nearly conclusive at the Home Office. If the Commissioners can see any other person to divide the responsibility with, it might be an improvement.

946. Can you fancy any one who has a stronger motive to appoint an efficient Sheriff-substitute than the Sheriff himself?—I think he has a very great interest to do so.

947. Supposing him to make a mistake in the original appointment, don't you think the public are sufficiently protected by the veto of the two heads of court?—So far as I know, that has been inoperative. I don't know that in any case it has been exercised. Where a right of veto has never been known to be exercised, I don't know that one is entitled to rest much on its existence. I never doubted that the Sheriffs have a very great interest in having efficient Sheriff-substitutes appointed, and, as a general rule, I think they have been so appointed. But even if the Sheriff were to nominate the substitute, I think the appointment ought to come from the Crown, and he should have all the advantage which would attach to deriving his commission from the Crown.

948. Mr. Shand.—Would it satisfy your view if the Sheriff-substitute were nominated by the Sheriff, but appointed by the Crown?—That would meet my view very much.

949. What you desire is that the Sheriff-substitute should have the dignity of a Crown appointment?— Yes, and hold his office on the same tenure as other judges.

950. You have said you remember the time when these appointments were filled by much inferior men?— I remember some of them.

951. To whom do the public now owe the improvement which has taken place in that respect?—There has been an improvement in the position of the Sheriff-substitutes, and an increase in their salaries. There was no salary originally paid them by the Crown. The substitutes appointed under the Jurisdiction Act had no salaries at all provided to them; then there was a salary which at first was very small, and that was afterwards improved. That was one of the means of improving them. That was not due to the Sheriffs.

952. Of late years has there not been a considerable improvement in the class of men?—Yes.

Francis Russell.

953. Is that improvement not owing to the fact that the selection by the Sheriffs has been careful?—Partly, and also that the position was so high that you got a better class of men to take it. The Sheriffs might select whom they liked; but they did not get the men to go. The office has risen in position and salary, and it is practically a different office from what it was when originally instituted.

954. But the Sheriffs have, as a rule, chosen the best men they could get for the office?—I think they have made very good appointments. Of course to say they have taken the best men they could get is putting it strongly. I think they have made good appointments.

955. I understood you to object to the Crown appointment of Sheriffs in many instances as being too precipitate?—Not in many instances.

956. But in a number of instances you think the Crown appointments were not good?—I said they were not good in all cases.

957. Would not your proposal rather open the evil in regard to the Sheriff-substitutes which you have deprecated in regard to the Sheriffs?—I think it is better that it should be the Sheriff-substitute than the Sheriff, even though he has a great part of the local duties to do. I assume that the present arrangements in the Crown office are continued, as to which Lord Advocates naturally feel great anxiety when any changes are proposed in respect to the office of Sheriff; and if the Sheriff-substitute were appointed by the Crown, it would then be open to the Lord Advocate to recommend for appointment any well-qualified Advocates-depute to the office of Sheriff-substitute, instead of, as matter of usage, appointing them to the superior office of Sheriff after they have had experience in the Crown office as Advocates-depute for some years, although they have had a very limited experience in the matter of civil practice, the civil practice being what they require when they become Sheriffs. As regards the criminal work, they do very little in most counties, though if some of them are at leisure, they may go and do a little of it; but as regards civil cases, they have a great deal to do, and it is far more essential that they shall be well qualified to dispose of civil cases on appeal than that they shall be familiar with the conduct of criminal business. On the other hand, if they are well qualified for the disposal of criminal business, it will give them very great advantage as Sheriff-substitutes, who have criminal business to discharge. The great bulk of the criminal business is discharged by them. I may state that of the whole criminal cases tried, only two per cent. were tried by the Sheriffs; and in a detailed return given in 1861 of the whole criminal causes tried in the Sheriff Courts in all Scotland, there was not so much as ten per cent. of the jury cases tried by the Sheriffs, the other ninety per cent. being tried by the Sheriff-substitutes. Now if persons familiar with the conduct of business in the Court of Justiciary were appointed to the office of Sheriff-substitute, they would have very great advantage in regard to the criminal business; and if they were familiar to some considerable extent with civil business, they would be the better qualified for the discharge of the whole duties of their office.

958. Mr. Campbell.—The theory of a double judgment is inherent in the constitution of the Sheriff Court as now understood?—As now understood.

959. In order to secure that, it is essential that the Sheriff-substitute should, in the first instance, try and determine all ordinary cases and most summary causes?—All appealable causes.

960. Then in sitting in his court the Sheriff-substitute is not properly the substitute or deputy of anybody, but a judge in the first instance?—Practically; but there is no doubt that the Sheriff is entitled to dispose of cases in the first instance sitting in his own court.

961. But is that ever done in practice?—It is done for the convenience of the Sheriff-substitute when he happens to be absent. I have had that advantage, the Sheriff residing in the county.

962. It would take away the power of appeal if that was done?—Yes; and the Sheriff would give judgment without the advantage of the comments of the Sheriff-substitute.

963. Has it been found a grievance that the name 'Sheriff- substitute' is employed?—I don't call that a grievance. It reminds me of an expression of John Foster, the essayist, that often 'words, instead of being the signs of things, become their monument.' I think the name is a monument of a state of things which existed when the whole essential work was done by the Sheriff, and the substitute was merely his hand to carry out what he did. But now it is not so. Only one Sheriff is resident in the county, holding the ordinary court; and I think resident judge is a more appropriate term than substitute. There may not be much in names; but I think it is more appropriate and distinctive of the particular office that he holds now.

964. You said something about Sheriff-substitutes being removable with consent of the heads of the court: has anything of that kind ever taken place within your memory?—No, I don't think so. I have stated that nine-tenths of the whole criminal jury trials were tried by the Sheriff; and it appeared from the same return for the year 1861, that there were twenty-one jurisdictions in which there were criminal jury trials during that year, and they were all disposed of by the Sheriff-substitute. I think it is very important that the Commissioners should have in view practically the duties that are discharged by the Sheriff-substitute, and not go on the hypothesis that the serious and difficult cases are usually taken by the Sheriff. It is not so in the counties generally, but a very large proportion of the duties are discharged by the Sheriff-substitute.

965. Mr. Webster.—By the appointment flowing from the Crown, although the selection was perhaps made by the Sheriff, the duration of the office would be more in accordance with correct theory than at present, where you are appointed by a Sheriff who dies or resigns; but you still continue to act as Sheriff-substitute?—Yes; I am glad you have mentioned that. One of the grounds on which it was thought very desirable that the Sheriff-substitute should be appointed by the Sheriff, was that he might be entirely in accord with him—a person with whom he could act comfortably. When the law was so far changed that the Sheriff-substitute continued in office after the Sheriff had ceased to hold his office, that advantage ceased to be one on which much could be rested, and in point of fact at the date of these returns the majority of persons who were Sheriff-substitutes in Scotland had not been appointed to their office by the existing Sheriffs, but by their predecessors. This shows that that purpose is very far from being accomplished by the arrangement on the footing on which it now stands.

966. The Chairman.—What was the date of the Act that made the change?—The 1st and 2d Vict. c. 119.

967. Mr. Campbell.—The Sheriff-substitute, in the absence of the Sheriff, is expected to take an active part in the general business of the county, to attend as a Commissioner of Supply, to sit as a member of the Prison Board, and to act as one of the Commissioners in disposing of appeals under the Valuation Act?—Yes.

968. Has it been found sometimes that his authority is a little diminished, and his character affected by the fact that he is at any moment, in the course of deliberations by these different bodies, liable to be superseded by the arrival of the Sheriff?—There are some of these cases in which he is independent of the Sheriff. As a Commissioner of Supply he sits as Sheriff-substitute. But as a member of the Prison Board and of the Police Committee he only acts in the absence of the Sheriff, and it is rather inconvenient if the Sheriff comes when he is there, and the Sheriff-substitute who may be ordinarily in attendance is not entitled to attend as a member, and so can only be aware of the proceedings from the minutes. There is that obvious inconvenience.

969. Mr. Shand.—He can always be present?—He has no right to be present.

970. He always is?—I don't attend.

971. You would always be invited?—I don't know that. Some members of the police committee are not fond of the Sheriffs, and they don't like Sheriffs interfering very much with them. I have not attended meetings of the police committee, unless I had a right to be there.

972. Mr. Paterson.—I understood you to say, that the public were not satisfied that the principal Sheriff was superior in all cases to his substitute? Have you ascertained that to be the public impression?—I did not say that there was a general impression to that effect; but I said there was not sufficient superiority to justify the appellate jurisdiction. It is difficult to ascertain public impressions, as they come from so many quarters; but I have found that impression in a great many quarters. I may mention one influential public quarter which I think is much entitled to consideration on any occasion,—I refer to members of the House of Commons. On two occasions I have had to go to London to see them about the Sheriff-substitutes' application for increase of salaries, and I found but one opinion, that our salaries should be increased. On the first occasion that I had the honour to appear before Sir George Grey, twenty members of the House of Commons attended.

973. Mr. Murray.—Twenty Scotch members?—Yes. In 1866, there were twenty members of Parliament who went to Sir George Grey. It was practically arranged that the salaries should be increased; but the Government, of which Mr. Moncreiff was Lord Advocate, went out of office before the matter could be finally settled, and we had to begin again. The following year I had again the honour to go to the Home Office as a member of the deputation of Sheriff-substitutes, and on that occasion thirty-six members of Parliament attended. On both these occasions I had an opportunity of seeing a great many of the Scotch members, and I found a very large number of them who strongly objected to the office of Sheriff, upon the ground that there was no sufficient superiority of the Sheriff over the Sheriff-substitute. On that ground a number of them who thought the office of Sheriff should be altered, declined to go with us to the Home Office, though quite agreeing that the salaries were inadequate, and ought to be increased. But they said, 'We will not settle your question till the other question is settled,' because they thought the present position of the office unsatisfactory. That is one indication of public opinion in the highest quarters. It is secondary public opinion; it is the opinion of men who have been influenced by public opinion, and who to a large extent form their own opinions from what they hear from many quarters.

974. Mr. Paterson.—Did they form their conclusion on views in the direction of utility or of economy?—I think utility, decidedly, although some of them also on the other view; but I think the Scotch members don't care much about economy as a general rule in reference to any requisites for Scotland.

975. I suppose they were aware of the statutory requisite that the Sheriff-principal must be a practising advocate in Edinburgh?—They know the conditions of the office substantially.

976. You mentioned as one of the advantages of the Sheriff being resident in Edinburgh, that he had more immediate access to the Lord Advocate and other officials. Is there not another advantage that he has—the power of immediate communication with all the other practising advocates who are non-resident Sheriffs?—Clearly. I feel the isolation of the Sheriff-substitute more than anything else. There is no person in the county to whom he can speak about difficult questions of law. He cannot speak to the procurators of his court, who are the only other lawyers in the county. I myself take every opportunity to communicate with my brethren at the bar when I happen to be in Edinburgh, and I spend more of my time in the Parliament House than anywhere else.

977. Do you think a Circuit Appeal Court of the character you have mentioned would be greatly superior to the present system, by which the Sheriffs have the benefit of the advice of their brother Sheriffs in the Parliament House?—I mean the appeal Sheriffs to be resident in Edinburgh, so that when not on their circuits they will be in the Parliament House. Their duties may in some cases be consistent with practice if matters are well arranged, or a person of large experience may sacrifice his practice in order to take the appointment of a district judge, for I assume they will be so well paid as to make it worth the while of men of high position to accept the office. It is a question whether they should be prevented from practising. One proposal is that they shall be so prevented, because there is great risk of their private practice competing with their public duty. There is no doubt as to that; and any one who has seen work in the Sheriff Courts will see that. And it is a question for the consideration of the Commissioners whether they should take private practice or not.

978. Mr. Campbell.—Would not such an appeal judge as you propose have reasonable hope of promotion to the bench?—He would be the most natural person to promote if he continues in the Parliament House when not in Circuit. I assume that he is a man so high in his profession, that if he had remained at the bar he would have had a fair chance of being promoted. I don't think his holding district courts, while he continues to reside in Edinburgh, and haunt the Parliament House, is a reason why he should not be promoted to the bench.

979. Mr. Webster.—Is it conceivable that a counsel in large practice could be holding Circuit Courts and carrying on business at the bar during the long period that the court sits?—I think not. I think it would not be consistent with his being in large practice. He may have to sacrifice his practice, and it is a question whether it would not be better to prevent him from taking any practice. A Sheriff-substitute is absolutely prohibited from exercising any office or employment except that attached by statute to his office; and when their salaries are considered, that must be taken into account, for while their salaries have been materially increased since 1853, in all cases the emoluments have not been increased. Some of the Sheriff-substitutes used to hold offices of great emolument as factors and bankers, and other such appointments, and the revenues derived from their whole sources of income were greater than those derived now by the Sheriff-substitutes from their sole source of income, which is their official salary. I may add that there are fees for examinations in bankruptcy, which are insignificant in most counties; and the sooner the better that is abolished, because it is unseemly that the judge should be paid fees where there is not money to pay creditors. The fee of one guinea for each examination is the whole emolument they have besides their official salaries.

980. Mr. Murray.—Would not the salaries of eight appeal judges, such as you propose, amount to more than the salaries of the twenty-two Sheriffs?—I don't know. I am not putting it as a question of economy, and I don't say that there are to be eight of these appeal judges. It may be no saving, but the work would be much better done. The question of economy is another thing. Perhaps it may be as expensive a system, and no doubt you will find difficulties with the Treasury if there is to be an increase of the salaries. People were all agreed that the salaries of Sheriff-substitutes were inadequate; but whenever it came to the Treasury giving the money, then there were difficulties.

981. Mr. Shand.—Then you don't think that the scheme you propose would be a saving of money?—I have not calculated it in that view.

982. Mr. Murray.—What are the total salaries of the Sheriffs?—In 1866 there were twenty-five Sheriffs with salaries amounting to £18,350.

983. What would the salaries of six or eight appeal Sheriffs amount to?—I think if you take six at salaries of £1500 or £2000, that would be about the number required.

984. Mr. Harrison.—Then you don't suppose that your scheme would cost more than the present system?—No, you would save five or six thousand pounds.

985. Mr. Murray.—Would you not have to add travelling expenses?—£50 or £100 would go a long way for travelling expenses. I think that for £1500 or £2000 a year you would get men at our bar glad to do these duties.

986. The Chairman.—Do you except Glasgow and Edinburgh from your scheme?—Yes; but I mean four districts besides Glasgow and Edinburgh.

987. Are Glasgow and Edinburgh included in the £18,000?—Yes; but there is room to deduct these and still have a large saving. I should say that £1500 to £2000 is such a salary in Scotland that many well-qualified persons would not refuse to perform for it duties which are not very arduous. The salaries of the County Court judges in England, some of whom are in very good position indeed, vary from £1500 to £1800.

988. Mr. Shand.—You made an observation in regard to the office of Sheriff at present, that it was such that men at the head of the bar would not accept of it?—In some cases.

989. Is there any one at the Scotch bar, that you are aware of, of high position, who has not accepted the office of Sheriff when offered, except the law officers of the Crown?—I think there are some. I think I have known some who have refused to do it.

990. Are you aware that one of the existing Sheriffs has declined promotion to the bench?—Yes, I understand so.

991. Am I not right in saying that, with the exception of the four law officers of the Crown, who cannot hold the office of Sheriff, the office is taken by any other member of the Scotch bar?—Yes.

992. And that it commands the highest members of the bar?—Yes, very high members.

993. Do you think that an appeal judge, such as you refer to, could be obtained from the same class of men?—No; two or three would be excluded. You would have to pass over perhaps four or six at the head of the bar; but if you take off those who have a large practice, and who look forward with confidence to the bench, you would still find persons well inclined to accept this office; and while they might not be so good in some respects as the best of the Sheriffs, they would be far better than the average of them. Besides, they would be specially destined to this duty, and it would not be an incidental thing which they were to do with more or less diligence, according as they might find it convenient.

994. Do you propose to make the appointment a life appointment?—Certainly, and with a retiring allowance.

995. Is it not obvious that if you propose to appoint a member of the bar to an office which would take him from a week to ten days once a month away from practice, a practising member of the bar could not hold it?—Yes, and I doubt if he should.

996. Therefore he must give up the hopes of future practice?—Like a great many of the Sheriffs who have no considerable private practice, and who occupy themselves with the duties of Sheriff.

997. Mr. Campbell.—But they may carry on an extensive chamber practice, and act as arbiters in many cases?—Yes.

998. Mr. Murray.—Are you aware whether any County Court judge in England was ever appointed to the bench?—I cannot tell; but I think a person in the position proposed is very much higher relatively to Scotland, than a County Court judge relatively to England. There are about sixty County Court judges in England, and I think we could secure for the district appeal judges in Scotland men of far higher position relatively to their own bar, than are obtained in England for their County Court judgeships. They are more like Sheriff-substitutes; and Sheriff-substitutes in Scotland have a great deal higher work than County Court judges. Their work, when examined, comes to be to a large extent what we dispose of in our Small Debt Courts; and there are far more difficult cases disposed of by the Sheriff in his ordinary court, than are disposed of by the County Court judges in England. Their jurisdiction is limited to cases of £50, whereas in the Sheriff Courts it is unlimited.

999. Mr. Shand.—You have said that you think it an advantage to have a single judge, in respect of the responsibility which he feels to attach to him. Does it occur to you as objectionable that the appeal should be to one judge only?—If you secure the superiority of the judge to whom the appeal is taken, that may be justified, but not in the same court.

1000. You say the present system does not guarantee that the Sheriff shall be superior to his substitute. Do you think that a system which would exclude men of the highest practice at the bar from the office of superior judge would be better than one which includes that class of men?—It would be better for the country generally, but perhaps not for the small part of Scotland in which these men exercise their jurisdiction. The average of Scotland, as to professional level and ability, would be much higher under that system than it is at present.

1001. Why do you think so?—Because persons are now eligible for the office of Sheriff, and are appointed, who are very far from being at the head of the bar, and who never had almost any practice.

1002. Would you expect men in large practice to accept the office you suggest with £1500 or £2000 a year?—I think very many would take office for life with a salary of £1500 or £2000, and a retiring allowance.

1003. Renouncing their practice?—Yes, except a little that they may pick up, and they might take proofs. But I think that for £2000 a year you would get very good men indeed. Unless the bar is a great deal wealthier than it used to be, I think there are not a few men of good position who would not reject £2000 a year, with a retiring allowance, without serious deliberation.

1004. You have mentioned the delay which exists at present in the Sheriff Court; suppose the Commissioners came to be of opinion that the constitution of the court should remain as at present, have you any suggestions to make for lessening that delay?—I am coming to that.

1005. One of your reasons for requiring a change, is the delay that occurs between judgments; would that not be obviated by requiring the Sheriff to go more frequently to his county?—Of course, and that would interfere with his private practice also.

1006. Except that you would not contemplate the same length of visit?—No. All these are considerations. Besides what I have proposed, there is an intermediate proposal providing for eleven Sheriffs; and I think if you take away their administrative work, and make them do mere appellate work, that would do.

1007. Do you think the number of Sheriff-substitutes might with propriety be reduced?—I think they may.

1008. Mr. Paterson.—Do I understand you to say that the duties of the Sheriff as a practising advocate in Edinburgh sometimes conflict with his duties as Sheriff?—I am afraid so. Unless he is extremely zealous in the discharge of his public duty, if he has his own private cases, he will not hurry to go down to his county, even though his own presence may be desirable. It is a sacrifice to give up cases in the court, though he knows that there are appeals waiting for his decision in his county which can only be disposed of after an oral hearing.

1009. Do you know any special cases?—I understand so, but they don't come under my observation. The Sheriff of the county in which I am has always lived in the county.

1010. Of course you are aware that he cannot practise in cases from his own county?—Yes.

1011. Another of your observations was, that some of the Sheriff-substitutes felt themselves discredited by the principal Sheriff occasionally presiding in their courts?—I put it as a general theory that it is a discredit to the office. If you have a person holding an office of that kind, and somebody else is to come down, not to relieve him, but to supersede him, that has a tendency to discredit the court. Happily most of the Sheriffs are gentlemen of such delicacy and propriety, that they will take care not to make it disagreeable.

But there it is, and the fact of their doing so discredits the office.

1012. Your opinion is that it tends to throw discredit on the Sheriff-substitutes?—Yes.

1013. You said the principal Sheriff of your county takes your duty occasionally?—Yes; but it is always by arrangement with me, and the cases in which he has done so have always been for my accommodation.

1014. Can you say that there is any feeling of discredit from the Sheriff-principal presiding, on the part of the practitioners at your bar?—I don't suppose it.

1015. Or the community of your county?—It never happened in my county.

1016. The Sheriff-substitutes don't feel it?—Oh yes; I believe they do. What I stated was, that it tends to discredit the office, and I have heard some of the Sheriff-substitutes express that feeling more than once. Unless the Sheriff discharges his duty with a great deal of delicacy, it is very likely that it will occur.

1017. May there not be cases in which Sheriff-substitutes would find themselves rather encouraged by the Sheriff-principal taking the bench occasionally?—I think there may be.

1018. And where the practitioners would feel themselves satisfied?—I have never spoken to them about that matter. It is a very delicate thing to talk to them about their feelings with reference to Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute.

1019. Do you not believe that in some cases public confidence in the Sheriff Court may be strengthened by the Sheriff-principal occasionally doing the duties?—It could only do so in the particular cases which he disposed of.

1020. You don't think it would have any beneficial effect on the community in general?—I don't think so; but I am particularly ill qualified to give evidence about that. I have spoken to other Sheriff-substitutes about it; but it has not happened in my own experience, because my Sheriff has thought that I discharged the duties quite efficiently, and he has not found it for the public advantage that he should discharge them except when I was not present.

1021. In regard to the inconvenience of the Sheriff-principal not having an opportunity of seeing the witnesses, and noting their demeanour, have you found in your own experience any real practical difficulty to arise from that?—Yes. I have thought that the cases would have been differently decided on appeal had the witnesses been seen. There is a very large number of cases in which the question is as to credibility, especially in cases of affiliation and aliment, where the pursuer and defender are both examined, and make conflicting statements, the question being, which is speaking the truth? In regard to the matter of credibility, I think that seeing the witnesses is of very great importance, and that the notes of evidence, even if very well taken, don't afford sufficient means of judging of the matter of credibility.

1022. The Sheriff-substitute's notes give the import of the evidence?—Oh yes; my own notes have been taken very carefully. It is very hard work taking them; and I have a suggestion on that subject to make to the Commissioners.

1023. Is it your practice where you find a witness who hesitates, or pauses for an unusual time, or gets confused, to make a record of it for the use of the Sheriff?—No; I have never done that. I have sometimes observed that this witness gave his evidence with great candour, or with every appearance of veracity, where I thought the witness a good one; but beyond that I did not see that it was the function of the judge to make comments.

1024. Supposing the witness had not given his evidence with candour, might that not be done with advantage?—I have done that, not in the evidence, but in my note upon the case. I have stated that the manner in which the witness gave his evidence did not inspire confidence.

1025. Would that assist the Sheriff-principal in advising a proof?—I think so.

1026. In that way you would give a picture of the evidence, if not a photograph?—I would rather have a photographer, and let the picture of each witness be taken. It is the expression of the face that is the thing, and it is not possible to describe it. One always looks you straight in the face, like an honest man, and another looks away from you; but I don't think it would be safe for judges to write down their impressions.

1027. Mr. Webster.—Would you apply to the judges of appeal the same limitation that is applied to the Sheriff, namely, not to take business from their own district?—I suppose that would be necessary; but I think their local ties would be so inconsiderable that it would not be of much consequence.

1028. The Chairman.—Your view seems to be that they should have no practice at all?—I think most likely that would be the result. If their districts were large so as to occupy a good deal of their time, that would prevent them from practising. If the Commissioners are of opinion that while the present system should be changed in the way of enlarging the area of the jurisdictions, the area shall not be so large as to prevent practising lawyers holding them, something like the present system would be continued. These matters deserve the serious consideration of the Commissioners.

1029. Mr. Murray.—The judges you propose would have none of the administrative work which the present Sheriffs do?—By the proposal to reduce the Sheriffs to eleven, they would be relieved of the duty of holding courts when they happened to be in their county, and of holding Small Debt Circuits, which I think is a waste of time, and of no advantage to the public. I believe the Sheriffs are nearly all of that opinion. But whether they should be relieved of their administrative duties is a large and important question. If the districts are made large, they cannot exercise their administrative functions; if what I propose be adopted in its fulness, their duties would have to be confined to those of appeal judges. If an intermediate scheme is adopted, such as reducing their number to one half, it is for the Commissioners to consider whether they should be relieved of their administrative duties, or to what extent they should be relieved of them.

1030. Mr. Webster.—If the administrative duties are not left with the Sheriff-principal, or the appeal judge, in whom would you place them?—There is no choice. In the resident Sheriff.

1031. How would you do in counties where there are several substitutes?—I think it is very easily disposed of. The whole administrative duties would rest upon the resident Sheriffs. I would give each of them jurisdiction over the whole county. I have not yet stated whether I would propose that the number of the Sheriff-substitutes should be reduced; but supposing the present system to continue, each Sheriff might have power over the whole county, because there would be great practical difficulty in dividing the counties; but each would act in his own district by mutual arrangement. In such places as Edinburgh and Glasgow there is no difficulty, because though there are three or four Sheriffs, one of them would be primus,—primus inter pares if you like,—and it would be his duty to take charge of the keeping of the peace, and of the arrangements for the distribution of the business among the whole body of Sheriffs. In Glasgow there are three or four Sheriffs; but that is such an exceptional case, and the number of appeals is so great, that it is more than ordinary work for an appeal judge. You could not include it in any appeal district; and you would have to make a special arrangement, Lanarkshire being quite large enough for an appeal judge, even if the appeals were greatly reduced. I was asked whether I proposed an alteration of the districts of the Sheriff-substitutes. I was requested by a person in authority to make such a proposal, and I did so. That proposal has no peculiar value, and it is entirely my own. It was just an attempt, with a little study of the geographical conditions of the country, to make out a rough scheme by which eight or nine of the jurisdictions might be dispensed with by enlarging them.

1032. Mr. Shand.—What is the number now, and to what do you think they might be reduced?—The number of districts at present is fifty, and deducting ten would reduce it to about forty. There are difficult questions in regard to the Highlands and Islands, owing to their geographical position; but I have not gone into detail in regard to these.

1033. You hand in your scheme as part of your evidence?—Yes, I can do so.

1034. The Chairman.—Did you prepare it with reference to your examination now?—No. I prepared it with reference to the duties of the Sheriff-substitutes, at the time when I was in communication with Government. I state this because it was not an ultroneous proceeding on my part; but I did so at the request of a person entitled to ask me to do it.

1035. Mr. Gordon.—I think you prepared them at my request?—I did. I prepared one of them at your request.

1036. And I think the other also. You thought there might be a fund set free by the consolidation of Sheriffs' districts?—Yes. When you were Lord Advocate you suggested that there might be a difficulty with the Treasury, and one of the tables was made up with reference to that.

1037. In point of fact, do you know that the public avail themselves largely of the power of appeal to the Sheriffs?—Yes; much too largely. The Sheriff in my county has again and again told me that he thought nine-tenths of the appeals were taken for the purpose of delay, and a large proportion without the slightest prospect of the judgment being altered.

1038. How many of your judgments have been altered in the course of a year?—I have not a return; but very few.

1039. You said there were many cases in which there were alterations in consequence of the Sheriff not having had the benefit of seeing the witnesses?—If I said many I was wrong; all I meant to say was that there were cases.

1040. How many cases have been advocated from your Sheriff?—I have not got the return. The advocations don't come back to the Sheriff; but they are not very many. The expense has been the impediment; but under the recent Act considerable facilities have been given for bringing appeals to the Court of Session, no caution being now necessary; but it will depend very much upon the Court of Session how far advantage can be taken of it, for the expenses are too heavy to make it easy for litigants to go there. What they principally complain of is the expense of printing, and the expense of two counsel in the Inner House. So long as that is considered necessary, I don't think that there will be a very large number of appeals, but there is every facility for bringing them.

1041. You have said that a certain degree of discredit attaches to the resident Sheriff from its being in the power of the Sheriff-principal to supersede him at any time. Do you think that operates in any way to prevent efficient men from accepting the office?—It is difficult to tell. They probably don't know it till they have accepted the office, and it is difficult to say how far it may have presented itself to their minds.

1042. Mr. Shand.—Are there not a great many applicants from very good men for every office of Sheriff-substitute that falls vacant?—Those who are in the Parliament House have better information as to that than I have.

1043. Mr. Gordon.—Is there not a convenience in the Sheriff being able to take the business, and in that way to liberate the Sheriff-substitute for a short time?—A very great convenience, and that is one of the things to be looked to. There must be arrangements made for their absence. The judges of the County Courts in England have two months during which they don't hold courts. At present the absence of the Sheriffs-substitute is not generally by arrangement with the Sheriffs; in the majority of cases they have to make their own arrangements. Sometimes the Sheriffs are exceedingly accommodating, and take the duties; but I think, as a rule, the absence of the Sheriff-substitute must be without special arrangement with the Sheriff, except getting his consent to the appointment of any particular substitute.

1044. Do you know whether it is the fact that local Sheriffs, who are discharging their duties in a limited district, are sometimes apt to get mixed up with local disputes?—Occasionally, and the only way of preventing that is to raise the character of the office; and I don't think there is much of that now.

1045. Mr. Murray.—Have you ever considered whether that objection might be obviated by applying to the Sheriff-substitutes the principle applicable to military and other appointments—namely, removing them every five or six years?—That never occurred to me; but I don't see any reason why they should always live at the same place, except their domestic arrangements. When you have given them official residences, which they want very much, I don't see why they should not be transferred to other jurisdictions if they are getting into entanglements of any kind in the immediate locality, just as Methodist preachers are transferred periodically from one place to another. But one of the great difficulties in regard to the Sheriff-substitutes is the difficulty in getting houses, because very often houses of the kind they require are not to be had at the places where they are stationed.

1046. Mr. Shand.—You have stated as one reason why you thought there should be an alteration of the constitution of the courts, the great cause of delay by frequent appeals. Don't you think that admits of considerable improvement?—I think so. I shall refer to that afterwards. Another question is, Ought any resident Sheriff to be capable of acting for any other resident Sheriff as his deputy, and if so, under what conditions? In the English County Courts Act (1867) there is a clause by which any County Court judge may act for any other judge of County Courts as his deputy. There is great convenience in that. The duties to be discharged in two counties are much the same duties, and no one is so well qualified to discharge them as a judge from another county; and if what I propose were adopted, the work would probably be better done than it is at present by a deputy, who has no special experience in regard to the duties. My answer to that question would therefore be, Yes, with the approval of the Lord President. In the case of the sudden illness of a Sheriff-substitute, where the Sheriff cannot be got, it would be extremely convenient to have the Sheriff-substitute of another county, who would come and hold courts for him, either in civil or criminal cases, or in both, such arrangements being made as would prevent abuse.

1047. Mr. Campbell.—Are you aware that that end has been attained under the existing system?—I doubt if it is lawful, though if he acts without getting any additional emolument, perhaps it may be; but I doubt whether it is lawful for the Sheriff to appoint the Sheriff-substitute of an adjoining county to act in his county.

1048. The Chairman.—What is the disqualification?—He is not entitled to hold any office of profit.

1049. But it is not an office of profit if he gets nothing for it?—No; but the terms of the Act are 'any office.'

1050. Mr. Shand.—You spoke of arrangements to prevent abuses; what abuses do you refer to?—The Sheriff-substitute is not entitled to be absent from his county more than six weeks in any one year, or more than two weeks at any one time.

1051. What abuses do you contemplate?—He might go away more than was convenient. I think there should be a general provision, such as there is in the English County Courts Act, that it should be competent for any judge of a County Court to act as substitute for any other County Court judge. The next question is, Ought there to be any alteration in the rules as to occasional absence of the resident Sheriffs? There might be some alteration, I think, if a substitute is provided. At present the Sheriff-substitute is not entitled to be more than two weeks absent, which is a very short time: it entirely precludes an excursion to the continent or to any distant place, and I think it is an unnecessary limitation. If proper men are appointed, and they have the responsibility of seeing the duties discharged, I don't think there should be so labsolute a rule as to their periods of absence.

1052. Mr. Campbell.—On special cause shown, the Sheriff has the power to extend his substitute's leave of absence?—The condition is the providing of a substitute. He must either do the work himself or provide a substitute. The next point is, Ought there to be a readjustment of the periods of session and vacation? I think that such an alteration might be made with advantage. At present the first session is from 1st October to 15th December, and there is then a recess for a month till 15th January, and the court then sits till 15th March; there is then a recess till 3d April, and from that there is no break until the 31st of July—four months. That is rather a long time for a session, and I think an improvement might be made by regulating the periods without making the time occupied by the sessions any shorter. I would propose that the sessions should be—from 1st October to 20th December, from 10th January to 15th April, and from 15th May to 31st July.

1053. What is the inconvenience of one of the sessions lasting four months, as at present?—In large counties, the labour without any break is very heavy to the agents; and there is no advantage of its being without a break.

1054. Mr. Gordon.—How many court days have you in each week?—Two.

1056. The Chairman.—Do you take proofs in vacation?—Yes, occasionally; but not as a rule, unless they are pressing. The procurators think it hardly fair, and there is an unwillingness on their part to do it. If the court was so crowded with business that one could not get through the proofs without taking them in vacation, I should have no hesitation in doing so; but it is easy to take the proofs in session without making special arrangements. I think it would be a good deal objected to if I would make it a practice to take them in vacation. There is next a question of considerable importance. Ought there to be some restriction imposed on the existing option of bringing before the Court of Session, in the first instance, actions in which the pecuniary interests involved do not exceed £50, and are such as may be competently disposed of in the Sheriff Court? I would refer on that subject to the County Courts Act of 1857, which provides that the superior courts can send down for trial in the County Courts actions of smaller amount; and in sections 7 and 10 there are provisions with a view to keeping the business which is thought proper for a County Court within the County Court, for there are a good many provisions in that Act to prevent the superior courts from being occupied with cases which are proper for the local courts. I think there will now be many more appeals coming to the Court of Session from the Sheriff Court, and it is desirable that the time of the superior courts should not be occupied with cases which can be properly disposed of in an inferior court.

1057. Would you regulate that in any degree by the amount at stake?—Yes, what I propose is £50. It might be made £40, but I suggest £50, which is the sum fixed in the English County Courts.

1058. Then you would hold actions for debt not to be competent in the Court of Session below £50?—You might either do that, or you might give a power to send cases of the kind, that you thought should not be tried in these courts, to the Sheriff Court. That power is given to the judges of the superior courts in England. There was a provision in Mr. Moncreiff's Court of Session Bill of 1863, sec. 189, that actions up to £25 should not be competently raised in the Court of Session.

1059. Actions for debt?—Yes, where the pecuniary interest involved did not exceed £50. The Court of Session might have power to remit to the Sheriff Court questions which were not pecuniary claims, if they thought they were actions which could competently have been brought in the inferior court, and ought to have been brought there, and where they thought the expenses to be incurred in the higher court were disproportioned to the importance of the inquiry.

1060. Mr. Paterson.—Could the Court of Session make such a remit without previous inquiry into the nature of the case?—The Court of Queen's Bench does it, and many of these things appear on the face of the case. An action of affiliation and aliment is competent in the Court of Session. Now I don't see that the time of the Court of Session should be taken up with questions of aliment of £1 a quarter. I think it has enough to do in reviewing such judgments of inferior courts.

1061. The Chairman.—Do you not think there is a sufficient check to the improper bringing of small cases into the Court of Session, in the power which that court has to deal with the matter of costs?—I doubt if it is sufficient. In point of fact, those now in the administration of the court will have their attention called to this, whether there are not now cases brought into the Court of Session which would more properly be brought in the inferior court in the first instance, with a right of appeal.

1062. Mr. Paterson.—In some important questions of marine insurance, it is not uncommon to take the premiums paid by one underwriter, which may not amount to £50; would you shut the door of the Court of Session to that case?—No; because there the pecuniary interest is more than £50.

1064. The Chairman.—You put it at £50?—I put that as a suggestion.

1065. £25 has a sort of principle derived from the rule of advocation?—Yes.

1066. Mr Gordon.—Is there not an incompetency in any action below £25 at present?—No; not an incompetency. If it had been incompetent, I don't think there would have been such a clause in the bill of 1863; but my suggestion is that it should be £50. Then, in regard to taking proofs, I think it would be an advantage if it were in the power of the presiding judge to take the assistance of a shorthand writer,—not that the shorthand writer should take the evidence from the witness' mouth, but that the judge should dictate it, so that you would have it more full than most judges would write it, and you would have it coming with the authority of the judge. I think it would not be safe to adopt in the Sheriff Court the practice in the Court of Session, because that demands such high qualifications in the shorthand writer that it would be very difficult to get shorthand writers who could be trusted to take the evidence directly. But any shorthand writer can take down evidence to dictation. It would be the duty of the judge to read over the evidence after it was written, to satisfy himself that there was no mistake as to words, which would be the only probable mistake. I believe in some courts, where the work is heavy, that could be done with great advantage. It is a very laborious thing to take notes for eight hours; and if the judge could be relieved from the manual labour of it, I think there might be some advantage to the public.

1067. Mr. Campbell.—You mean such discretionary power as is given in the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes.

1068. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Has that ever been acted upon?—I understand so.

1069. The Chairman.—You think it would save time?—Those who have experience of it in the Court of Session tell me so. The shorthand writer would be writing while the judge is dictating. He will write it faster than the judge, and probably a little more fully than most judges would think it necessary to take it.

1070. Do you think that would diminish or add to the cost?—It would certainly add to the cost, assuming that the proofs can be concluded in one day, which is generally the case in my court. I have discharged my duties for seven years, and I think there is hardly any case in which I continued a proof a second day, except where witnesses could not attend. With despatch, I find that a great many witnesses can be examined in eight hours, and perhaps forty folios of notes written. If the proof were to be concluded in one day, the employment of a shorthand writer would not lessen the cost, excepting that it would save an hour or two, and the charges of the agents would be somewhat less. There might also be a saving in not detaining witnesses so long, as in some cases witnesses have to stay over a night in consequence of its being late before the proof is concluded; and if by greater despatch it could be concluded earlier, there might be a saving of expense. I suppose the shorthand writer's fee would be a guinea or two.

1071. And the writing out of the evidence?—I think it should only be done with the consent of parties, and that would remove any difficulty on the ground of expense. These are all the points I have to refer to in regard to the constitution of the court. With reference to the extension of the jurisdiction, the first question is, Ought the criminal jurisdiction to be enlarged so as to confer the power of sentencing to penal servitude for any term; and if so, for what term of years? These powers are exercised in England by the Quarter Sessions; and it is a question whether it would be for the public advantage that the Sheriff should have that power, leaving it to those in the administration of the Crown Office to send the case to the Sheriff, or to reserve it for trial before the Court of Justiciary, as they might find it expedient. I have not a strong opinion on this matter one way or other. A very large proportion of the cases which are tried before the High Court or the Circuit Court are cases tried there, not because the particular offence is of an aggravated kind, but because the criminal has a very bad character, and has been several times convicted of theft. It is therefore necessary that a sentence of penal servitude should be passed; and the Sheriff not having the power to pass such a sentence, these cases are reserved for the Circuit Court or the High Court. It would be a considerable relief to these courts if it was thought safe to give the Sheriff the power of dealing with these cases; and while we have the efficient establishment that we have always had in regard to the general management of the Crown office, I don't think there is much risk of evil being incurred by it. But I only put that as a suggestion deserving of consideration. The next point is, Ought the jurisdiction of the Sheriff to be so extended as to embrace any of the pleas of the Crown? Now there are occasionally charges of robbery in which a question arises on the evidence whether it is theft or robbery. As the Sheriff has no jurisdiction to try for robbery, it must be libelled as theft in order to be tried before him; and so slight cases of robbery, such as snatching with some slight violence, must be tried before the Circuit Court. I think it would be for the ends of justice that the Sheriff should have jurisdiction to try these cases.

1072. Mr. Campbell.—Might not the Sheriff also have jurisdiction in such cases of rape as Crown counsel might think proper to send to him?—We don't want these cases. We would rather give them to the judges of the Court of Justiciary to try. There are many slight cases of fire-raising, which I think it would be quite proper to give the Sheriff jurisdiction to try.

1074. The Chairman.—Notes of evidence preserved, for what purpose?—For the purpose of appeal to the Circuit Court. I would not propose to interfere with the power of appeal at present existing in criminal cases. I would preserve the notes of evidence, also, for the sake of affording security that the trial is carefully and seriously undertaken; and also, if necessary, for the consideration of the Secretary of State, in the event of any question being raised about the propriety of the sentence, so that he might have the materials for forming a judgment. The next question is, Ought the Procurator-fiscal to be prohibited from private practice? At present the Procurators-fiscal in some counties occupy themselves very much with their private business as agents and factors, and also as bankers. I think it is a question deserving of consideration, whether it is for the public advantage that they should continue to conduct private business. It may depend partly on the extent to which the districts may be enlarged. If they continue small, it may not be easy to get a person of sufficient position to accept the office of Procurator-fiscal upon the condition that he shall have nothing but his salary; but if the districts were sufficiently large to afford a sufficient salary without drawing unduly on the public revenue, I think it would be for the public advantage that the Procurators-fiscal should not be embarrassed with their private practice.

1076. And that he should be in the confidence of the Sheriff?—Clearly; and the question is very much a question of expense, whether you can afford such emoluments as will secure the services of a sufficiently good man, if he is precluded from private practice. I think it would be a great advantage to the public, because it is impossible but that he must sometimes be embarrassed in conducting the business of the criminal court with questions in which the interests of his own clients are concerned. Besides, he is often absent on his private affairs when it is very desirable that he should be on the spot to take charge of any criminal matters that may arise.

1077. Mr. Murray.—Do you consider that he should be appointed by the Sheriff?—No; I think an appointment by the Crown would probably be better. I believe it is the practice of Sheriffs, when one succeeds another, to continue the appointment of Procurator-fiscal, unless there is some serious objection to the man. But at present he ceases to hold office when the Sheriff who appointed him ceases to hold office.

1079. The Chairman.—Do you not think it important that he should be appointed by the Sheriff, whose confidential officer he is, and who is responsible for the performance of his duties?—That is very important, and I think it is a question of considerable practical difficulty. He ought to be on the most confidential footing with the Sheriff; at the same time, he is a public officer, and he ought to be secured from any undue pressure from any quarter in the discharge of his duties.

1080. Are these not duties which the Sheriff has to see discharged?—Very much so, but not altogether. He corresponds directly with the Crown Office.

1081. That is a matter of convenience?—I suspect he is under the orders of the Lord Advocate, though of course the Lord Advocate may send his directions to the Sheriff. However, this is a matter on which, as I said before, I have not a very strong opinion; but I think he ought not to be subject to arbitrary removal.

1082. Are you aware that for a considerable time, not very long ago, the person who communicated with the Lord Advocate was in some counties the Sheriff-substitute, and in other counties the Procurator-fiscal?—I don't know to what extent that was so. The next subject is the extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction in civil matters; and the first question is, Is it expedient that the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended over all parties in any action where the defenders, or one of them, resides or carries on business within the county, or where the cause of action, whether contract or damage, has wholly or in part arisen within the county? That is taken from the first section of the English County Courts Act. It has happened, I suppose, to all Sheriffs, that cases which were proper to their courts could not be competently brought there, because only one of the defenders resided within the jurisdiction. Now that is not convenient for the public service, and it has been provided for in the County Courts Act by the provision which I have just mentioned.

1083. Mr. Paterson.—Are you speaking of the case where a copartnership happens to be the defenders?—No; a copartnership is one person.

1084. These three or four parties may be in different counties, but all individually liable?—Yes; and if the action is competent in any of the Sheriff Courts, I don't see any disadvantage in its being brought in the court which happens to be most convenient.

1085. The Chairman.—It would probably be brought in the court of the forum of the pursuer in that case?—Probably; a defender must be in the county.

1086. But if there were several defenders, the pursuer would select the county to suit himself?—Perhaps he would.

1087. Is that altogether consistent with our principle?—He cannot call the defenders in all their courts, and his only course at present is to go to the Court of Session. Now I don't know that that is an advantage. The principle actor sequitur forum rei holds in England as well as in Scotland; but the difficulty I have referred to was provided for in the County Courts Act.

1088. Are you aware that some years ago an attempt was made to alter the course of procedure from that maxim, and to make all persons resident in Scotland amenable to creditors in Westminster Hall?—Yes; but cases occur every day in which it would be convenient to have such a provision as I have stated. The town of Galashiels has been removed out of my jurisdiction, but formerly one half of it was in the county of Selkirk, and the other half in Roxburghshire; and I remember having a question brought before me in which a firm was in one place, and the partners in another, and there was very great doubt whether I had jurisdiction to try it.

1089. Mr. Paterson.—Suppose a case where there were three debtors, and only one of them was convened in Roxburghshire?—But there would be authority to convene them all. The provision is, that in a question with more than one defender residing in different counties, if one of the defenders resides in a particular county, the Sheriff of that county shall have jurisdiction for the purposes of the action over all the defenders. That may require some limitation, but I think it would be attended with advantage. The next question is, whether the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended in all cases of aliment or maintenance, as between husband and wife, or parent or child, and as to the custody of children, legitimate or illegitimate. I am not prepared to say whether it would be convenient to extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction in these respects. There are very few cases that occur as between husband and wife, and I don't know that it would be desirable to extend the jurisdiction as to these.

1090. The Chairman.—Would you propose to extend the jurisdiction to cases of divorce?—No; only aliment and maintenance. I do not think it is desirable to extend it to cases of divorce; and there are very few of these cases.

1091. Mr. Paterson.—Would you extend it to declarators of marriage?—I certainly would not propose to have declarators of marriage in the Sheriff Court, because they seem to me to be about the most difficult cases that can occur. The next suggestion is as to extending the jurisdiction in applications for the appointment of a judicial factor or a curator bonis, where the value of the estate does not exceed £500 in personal property, and £50 per annum in heritage. This is to provide for a cheaper means of managing properties of small value, and I do not see any great risk which would arise from entrusting the Sheriff with the appointment of a judicial factor or a curator bonis in regard to small estates. The expenses incurred in the Court of Session, where the estate is of small value, are very considerable. The next question is, Ought the Sheriff's jurisdiction to be extended to questions involving right to heritable property, where the rent or annual value of the subject in dispute does not exceed £50? There is a provision in the County Courts Act by which the judges have jurisdiction of that kind in regard to heritable property of limited amount. A great many questions occur in the Sheriff Court where the Sheriff can only pronounce possessory judgment, and where the possessory judgment is of no use. The most ordinary case is that of building a house, where a question arises about the marches, and the adjoining proprietor says, You are encroaching on my ground. There a possessory judgment will not answer the purpose. The party will not build his house on the chance of finding that he has been building it on ground which does not belong to him. Now I think there might safely be a power in the Sheriff Court to decide questions of right to heritable property where the amount is of small value. The next point is, whether the jurisdiction should be extended in all questions depending on use or enjoyment for forty years, or for time immemorial. I don't think it is desirable to extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to that. Then it is suggested to extend it in all actions of removing, whether arising at common law ex pacto, or under the provisions of any statute or Act of Sederunt. I don't know that there would be any objection to that. The next question is, whether it should be extended, 'where in any pending action the validity of any writing is impugned, to determine, for the purposes of such action, the validity of such writing.' It has happened now and then to myself, that in a case where a very small amount was at stake, a question was raised as to the validity of a writing, and the case had to be sisted till declarator was brought in the Court of Session at an expense quite inconsistent with the importance of the matter at issue. I think it would be an advantage to give the Sheriff power to determine the validity of such a writing.

1093. Suppose the challenge of the validity was on the ground of forgery or fraud, would you have the Sheriff try that question himself without a jury or with a jury?—There was a time when there were no juries in the Court of Session to try these cases, but now they are tried by a jury.

1094. Do you propose to give the Sheriff this jurisdiction?—That raises the question whether there should be trial by jury in the Sheriff Court. My own opinion is, that there should not; and that if such a case is to be tried, it should be tried by the Sheriff without a jury. It has been proposed that the Sheriff should try cases with five or seven jurors; but with the experience we have had of jury trial in Scotland, I am not at present prepared to say that it would be for the advantage of the public to have such a thing in the Sheriff Court. The time may come when we shall have that, but we can afford to wait for it. The next questions are with regard to Forms of Process. The first proposal is to adopt the form of writ and indorsement, as in the Court of Session Bill of 1863, where the conclusion is wholly for the payment of money, and to adopt the form of bill or petition where the conclusion is wholly or in part ad factum præstandum.

1095. What do you mean by bill or petition?—It is an English form.

1096. Can you not put it in Scotch law language?—I cannot. It is a new term for a new kind of writ, and it was proposed in the Scotch Bill of 1863. However, I am not myself prepared to recommend it. The next suggestion is to alter the present form of process in the Sheriff Court, by making summons and minute of defence imperative, abolishing condescendence and defences, and substituting a replication where the defence opens new matter. At present, under the Act of 1853, the provision is, that if the Sheriff is satisfied that the record can be closed without condescendence and defences, it is closed upon a minute of defence prepared under his eye by the parties or by himself, and in that case there is no opportunity for the pursuer to make any statement as to any matter which may be raised upon the defence. That seems a difficulty in dealing with cases where the record is closed on a minute of defence; and this proposal is, that the pursuer shall have power to make a replication where the defence opens new matter, so that if compensation be stated, the party shall state the nature of that compensation, the result of which may be that the question is resolved into one of law, and a proof is dispensed with; but where there is nothing of that kind, a proof cannot be dispensed with. The other alternative is this: By closing the record on a short summons with a note of the pleas of parties, made up at the sight and with the aid of the Sheriff, condescendence and answers being ordered only in cases in which a full detail of the facts is thought requisite. I think it deserves the consideration of the Commissioners which of these two would be best,—whether the minute with or without any answer, or the note of pleas of the parties stating the pursuer's plea, either in fact or law, as well as the defender's. The summons now states nothing but that he is due this account for goods furnished, and contains no detail of facts. If either of these were adopted, the summons for ordinary debts might be made like the summons in small debt cases, and some expense saved. The pleas of parties at the first diet might be made up as under the Debts Recovery Act.

1097. I understand your general view to be, that the pursuer should have an opportunity of shortly meeting what is in the defence?—I think so. In many cases in my experience a proof would be saved by that, because the pursuer will make such admissions as to make the question one of law. But I beg to say that I have made no special study of the very difficult matter of pleading, which unfortunately in Scotland is very little attended to. I don't say our modes of pleading are bad; but it is a matter which is not so much studied in Scotland as in England; and we have no book on the subject.

1098. Mr. Paterson.—In your court, is the record in the majority of cases closed on a summons and short defence?—No; I think in the majority of cases there are condescendence and answers.

1099. Mr. Gordon.—Are you aware that the old system of pleading in the inferior court was by replies and duplies?—Yes.

1100. The record was made up upon the reply?—Yes.

1101. That was abolished by the Act of 1853?—Yes.

1102. Replies were also the form in the Court of Session, until that form was abolished by the Act of 1825, after a Commission had been issued on which a number of English lawyers served?—Yes. Of all these, the one I should prefer is a note of pleas made up at the sight and with the aid of the Sheriff.

1103.—Would you allow no amendment of the defences or of the replies by way of revisal?—I would allow them to be amended at any time before final judgment; and that is the next matter to which I was coming. By the Court of Session Act of 1868, sec. 72, the Court of Session have that power in cases coming from the Sheriff Court. I think it would be for the ends of justice that there should be a power at any time to make additions. At present an appeal is not unfrequently taken to the Sheriff, for the mere purpose of allowing the record to be opened and new matter added. The Sheriff-substitute has not power to open the record.

1104. Mr. Paterson.—Have you found that the short form of record led to any inconvenience in disclosing the whole facts upon proof?—Not upon proof; but I think proof may be sometimes avoided. The statements in the condescendence and defences frequently afford materials for disposing of the case without a proof. The next suggestion, I think, deserves the consideration of the Commissioners. It is: In causes under £25 in value, whether arising in the ordinary or in the Small Debt Court, ought it to be in the power of either party to require the Sheriff, after judgment, to state a case for the decision of one of the Divisions of the Court of Session, on any point of law (but not of fact), the party asking the case consigning £5, 5s. in security for the costs? The statement of cases is comparatively new to us in Scotland, and in questions arising with reference to registration it was not very successful at first; but I understand that this year they have been in all cases successful, and that no case has been stated which did not sufficiently bring out all the points, so as to enable the judges to decide them satisfactorily. This would give an appeal at very small cost, and I don't think it likely that it would be abused, if the person taking the case had to deposit £5, 5s. in security of costs. There are examples of cases stated in reference to trustees in sec. 63 of the Court of Session Act. It might be a little laborious for the Sheriffs to prepare these cases, if many of them were taken, but it might be a check on the judgments of the Sheriff that he might be called on to state a case.

1105.—Would you combine with that a power to the parties, or either of them, to remove the case to the Court of Session?—I have already suggested that there should be power to take the case direct from the Sheriff-substitute to the Court of Session.

1106. That would obviate the inconvenience of the case remaining in the Sheriff Court, but the point of law going to the Court of Session for decision?—The judges would have nothing to do but state their opinion in the case laid before them, just as in the Registration Court.

1107. The Chairman.—Where would the decree go out?—From the Sheriff Court, I presume.

1108. Mr. Paterson.—What I understand you to mean is, that a joint case, stating the facts which would bring out the point of law, should go up to the Court of Session pending the process?—No, I mean after judgment. The expenses would not be disposed of in the meantime. One of the parties thinks the Sheriff's judgment bad in law, and asks him to state a case for the Court of Session. That might be done at very small expense. The next point is a very important one. 'In the event of any intermediate appellate jurisdiction being retained, ought there to be any appeal before a judgment disposing of the whole cause, unless with the leave of the resident Sheriff?' There is a provision in the Court of Session Act of last year, secs. 53 and 54, by which reclaiming notes against interlocutory judgments of the Lord Ordinary are not competent without the leave of the Lord Ordinary. I think it might be an advantage that a similar power should be given to Sheriff-substitutes. It is open to abuse, but I don't think it likely to be abused; for it is not to be assumed that they will withhold leave when any serious question arises. But in point of fact, many of these appeals are taken for the mere purpose of delay; and I think this suggestion would be a decided improvement. The next matter is with reference to the Debts Recovery Act; and here there are three questions, viz., Ought it to be repealed, or ought it to be amended? and if so, in what respects? and ought it to be extended to all pecuniary claims under £50? I have never been able to see why persons bringing these actions under those particular heads, which are covered by the triennial prescription, should be preferred to all the other lieges by getting speedier justice. The cases are not more easy. An action on a bill, for instance, cannot be brought under the Debts Recovery Act, because it is founded on a written document. I think a good many of the details of this Act might be reconsidered; and I very much doubt whether it should be restricted to a limited class of cases. It is not a very convenient mode of framing an Act, to include in it a number of clauses of another Act, in this case of the Small Debt Act; and I think that an independent Act might be drawn up, which would be shorter and more efficacious than the present Act, as it has been constructed.

1109. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think that the average fees payable under that Act are fairly remunerative?—They bear no proportion to the work done. No other professional employment is paid on that principle. The same fee is allowed for two cases, although in one of them there may have been ten times more labour involved than in the other. I have had a few cases in my own court under the Debts Recovery Act; but I cannot say that the fees are remunerative.

1110. Are you aware that the system of ad valorem fees has been found to work well in the English County Courts?—I am not aware.

1111. The Chairman.—In your taxation of accounts, what is it that fixes the scale that applies to the particular case?—The amount of the claim.

1112. Then the principle is similar to this?—No; the principle of the Debts Recovery Act is not that there shall be a small charge for each piece of work done, but a slump sum for the whole.

1113. But it involves so much of the principle, that the remuneration is made to depend on the amount of the claim, on your mode of taxing accounts?—Yes, there are three scales of taxation in the Sheriff Court—£25, £100, and above £100. There is a scale applicable to each of these, the agent being paid according to the amount of the labour, though not on so high a scale in cases of small amount. But under the Debts Recovery Act they are not paid according to the labour. That system has certainly this advantage, that the agent has no interest to prolong the case.

1114. There is this difference of principle, that on your mode of taxing accounts, the amount of the account will depend upon the work done, but the rate charged is different?—Yes. The next question is, whether the small debt jurisdiction ought to be extended; and if so, how far? At present it is limited to £12; and unless there is to be an appeal, I don't know that it is desirable to extend it. Whether, with an appeal upon a case stated, it would be safe to extend it, is a matter for others rather than for the Sheriffs to consider. I am not prepared to recommend its extension. It is not a very satisfactory court, for no opportunity is given for considering the cases, because it is very inconvenient to continue them from one court to another, the courts being generally held at considerable intervals. Judgment must therefore be rapidly given, and it cannot be so satisfactory as if there was time for consideration. That is a matter on which others will probably give evidence; but I would recommend that the appeal which I have suggested should apply in small debt cases on a case being stated; and I think it would not be abused.

1117. Whether pursuer or defender?—Yes; of course it will be the loser.

1118. Would you put it in the power of the judge to limit it?—If he thought it frivolous, I think it should be in his option to decline stating a case; but I think he should be required to give his reason for doing so, because we are all tempted to be a little lazy, and sometimes we might desire to be saved the trouble of making out a case.

1120. In some counties enormous?—Yes.

1121. A small percentage of these appealed would add greatly to the business of the Supreme Court. Would you make such cases summary causes in the Court of Session?—I think they should be dealt with precisely as registration appeals are dealt with.

1122. Do you mean in a Division of the court, and as a summary case?—Yes.

1123. Would that not greatly augment the summary roll of the court?—I don't think many appeals would be taken under the stringent condition of depositing £5, 5s. in security of costs. But there are many cases in which the power to require a case to be stated might prevent careless decisions.

1124. Are not expedition and finality the great principle of the Small Debt Court?—Certainly. But what I am suggesting does not apply exclusively to the Small Debt Court.

1125. Mr. Shand.—At present fifteen days must elapse before the Sheriff sees the judgment. Do you think that is too long a period?—I don't think it is too long if there are written pleadings; but I think there should be no written pleadings, and then the cause might be heard at the next sitting of the court five or six days afterwards.

1126. Is it not a common thing that the process lies in the Sheriff Court for fifteen days, and that the case then comes to the Sheriff without an application for an oral hearing or written pleadings?—I believe so.

1127. And these fifteen days are among the days estimated in the delay which occurs?—Yes; and I think it is perfectly possible to shorten the time.

1128. The Chairman.—Would that delay be obviated by requiring the appellant almost instantly to state whether he desires an oral hearing, or to give in a petition if he wishes to do so, within a few days?—I think he should state whether he wishes an oral hearing, and then the Sheriff would dispose of the case on the earliest opportunity; but if written pleadings are still to be competent, there must be some time allowed, and fifteen days are not a great deal too much if two papers have to be written.

1130. Should he have fifteen days to put in his petition?—No, clearly not. I think the appeal might be entered very safely within three or four days of the judgment, and the party should at the same time state whether he wishes an oral hearing; and if not, he might have three or four days more to lodge the reclaiming petition; and I think it is worthy of consideration whether that petition should go to the Sheriff to see if it should be answered. Some Sheriffs seem to think that they may order written pleadings wherever they think it advisable; others take the stricter view, that it is only in peculiar cases that they are authorized to order written pleadings. If the Sheriffs are to be frequently in their counties, I believe it would save expense and prevent delay if written pleadings were not allowed, but the discussion confined to an oral hearing. With reference to the amount of work done in the criminal courts, I wish to state for the information of the Commissioners, that in the year 1865 there were tried in the High Court of Justiciary 39 cases, and in the Circuit Courts 316, being in all 355; while in the Sheriff Courts there were tried, with a jury 1064, and without a jury 1111, making a total in the Sheriff Courts of 2175, showing that more than four-fifths of the whole trials after commitment take place in the Sheriff Courts. I have already stated that at least nine-tenths of these are disposed of by the Sheriff-substitutes, and that they are thus doing very important work in criminal matters. I have said nothing of the question of salaries of the Sheriff-substitutes, but I am sure the Commissioners will be disposed to take a fair view of that. I could enter into details, but I don't know that that is desirable. I think the salaries at present are very inadequate. The expense of living in the country is great,—in many respects greater than in towns. That is so in respect of education, the necessity for providing some means of conveyance, and in a good many other respects. I myself have found that living in the country is more expensive than living in Edinburgh on the same sort of scale; and there is no allowance made for travelling expenses. Moreover, their emoluments are not equal to the total emoluments of the offices of those who work along with them. The Procurators-fiscal and the Sheriff-clerks no doubt have to pay certain expenses of their offices; but deducting these, their total emoluments are often greater than those of the Sheriff-substitute, who is, unlike them, precluded from other means of income. The salaries were fixed after the Act of 1853 was passed, and not on a very liberal scale. The Act fixed them at from £500 to £1000, and the average is about £600; but that average includes the higher salaries. They have been materially increased in Edinburgh and Glasgow, but they have not been increased systematically in Scotland since 1853. In 1863 a memorial was presented to the Government, but it was not very favourably received. Mr. Jameson, then Sheriff-substitute at Edinburgh, interested himself very much in it, and also Mr. Glassford Bell, who was then Sheriff-substitute at Glasgow. The answer to the memorial was, that certain cases would be considered, but that no general revisal would be conceded. In 1865 I was appointed convener of a committee of Sheriff-substitutes to communicate with the Government on this subject, and our first communication was with the Lord Advocate, Mr Moncreiff. We went as a deputation to him, and privately asked his support; but we were not much encouraged by our reception, the question as to the offices of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute being plainly the embarrassing one. We did not lose heart, however, and I continued to communicate with him and others; and before he went out of office he intimated that the Government were favourably disposed to consider our claims, and that he hoped to get the matter arranged before the end of the session. That Government, however, went out of office. I have placed in the hands of the Commissioners copies of the memorial then presented to Government, which shows, in some detail, the nature and amount of the work done by the Sheriffs-substitute. We again applied to the next Government, and we were largely supported by members of Parliament. Mr. Hardy was then Home Secretary. He looked at the returns, and said he thought that, considering the amount and variety of our duties, the salaries were inadequate. A good deal of negotiation took place with Lord Advocate Gordon, and he gave us his cordial support; but the Reform question came on, and nothing has been done in the question of our salaries. We have, however, the admission of two successive Governments that the salaries are inadequate, and deserve to be reconsidered; and upon that footing the matter now rests. There is one subject which, speaking of Sheriff Jameson and Sheriff Bell, I wish to state to the Commissioners, and that is the claim of the Sheriff-substitutes, where well qualified, to be appointed to the office of Sheriff when a vacancy occurs, assuming that the office, even if modified, is to be continued. Since 1853 there have only been three such appointments. The first was Mr. Bell, who was Sheriff-substitute at Kilmarnock, and who was removed to the Sheriffship of Banff and Elgin; the second was Mr. Jameson, senior Sheriff-substitute at Edinburgh, who was promoted to be Sheriff of Aberdeen; and the third was Mr. Glassford Bell, who the other day was promoted to the Sheriffship of Lanarkshire. I think there are many cases in which it would be right that Sheriff-substitutes should be so promoted, and it would be a great encouragement to them to discharge their duties with energy, if they knew that they had a chance of promotion. At present there is no prospect of promotion held out to them. This was much pressed in the memorial of 1863; and it would be very desirable, I think, that the Commissioners should make a recommendation, if they think it right to do so, that where Sheriff-substitutes have shown themselves well qualified to discharge their duties, their claims should be considered in making appointments to the office of Sheriff. They are eligible for the office by statute, but practically there has been only one promotion in five years since 1853, and the instances have been more or less exceptional.

1131. I suppose you would limit it to such of them as are members of the bar?—Certainly, and those of them who have shown themselves efficient judges.

1132. But you would limit it to members of the bar?—Yes; those who are not members of the bar are not eligible.

1133. Jedburgh is the only royal burgh in your district?—Yes.

1134. Do the magistrates exercise a civil jurisdiction in debt there?—No, I don't think so.

1135. Is there a Dean of Guild Court in Jedburgh?—Yes.

1136. Does the Dean of Guild hold a court and exercise jurisdiction?—I understand so, but rarely; questions being generally settled extra-judicially. In regard to the Commissary Court, I think there is a pretty general opinion that it might be combined with the Sheriff Court. The Sheriff is both Sheriff and Commissary, but there are two offices and two sets of clerks, and I don't see any advantage in that. I think all the duties could be more beneficially discharged in the office of the Sheriff-clerk, and there would be a saving of expense to the public. In the county in which I reside, the offices of Sheriff-clerk and Commissary-clerk are separate, but in some counties the same person holds both offices, and I think it would be an advantage to combine them.

1137. Is the Commissary-clerk paid by fees or by salary?—By fees. As to Justice of the Peace Courts, there seems a great variety of usage in different counties. In some counties the Justices of the Peace exercise a considerable civil jurisdiction. It is not so in the county in which I reside. They exercise only statutory jurisdiction. There are district Justice of Peace Courts held in the four towns of the county—Jedburgh, Melrose, Hawick, and Kelso; and at each of these there used to be a Procurator-fiscal for the Justice of Peace Courts, so that in the case of any crime being committed in any of these districts, the criminal could be immediately apprehended on a warrant got by the Procurator-fiscal of the district from a Justice of the district; but two years ago it occurred to the Justices of the Peace to make a change, and they arranged to have one Procurator-fiscal residing in Jedburgh for the prosecution of all cases in the Justice of Peace Court, and that his duty should be restricted to the prosecution of statutory offences; so that at present, in the large county of Roxburgh, there is no authority to deal with a criminal case except the Sheriff; and persons from the remotest parts of the county, such as Liddesdale, twenty or thirty miles from Jedburgh, are continually brought up before me on the most trifling criminal charges, such as cases of assault which are punishable by a fine of 5s. or 10s., in consequence of this practical restriction by the Justices of the Peace of their power to deal with cases. The cases mostly dealt with before them are offences against the Road Acts, the Tweed Acts, Public-houses Acts, and poaching cases. To show the large number of offences against the Tweed Acts, I may state that during the last year the Justices have tried them all, and I have had nothing to do with them; but in the year before last I tried ninety persons for offences against the Tweed Acts, and there were besides about twenty-four more who were tried by the Justices of the Peace for the Kelso district, making in all about 114 persons. At present these are all disposed of by the Justices of the Peace, the Procurator-fiscal going down from Jedburgh to whatever district the cases may be tried in. I may mention that the fees payable to the Justice of Peace Clerk in these cases are considerably higher than those payable to the Sheriff Clerk (to be accounted for to the Crown), amounting sometimes, when several cases are tried at one sitting of the Court, to not less than £6 or £8; and I will furnish, for the information of the Commissioners, a copy of the table of fees now in force, as fixed by the Commissioners of Supply. These cases are prosecuted under the Summary Procedure Act, with no record of the evidence.

1138. Do you think the mode of paying Fiscals has anything to do with that?—In Roxburghshire we have tried several different systems. They were at one time upon fees, and then they were put upon small salaries. Does your Lordship mean the expense that the county is put to?

1139. Yes?—I think so. That is an element. They get it done at less expense by having one than having four.

1140. But you think that system is not conducive to the preservation of peace, and the suppression of crime?—It is no advantage that a person brought up from a remote part of the country shall be tried before the Justices of the Peace, but there was an advantage in having him tried on the spot. It is a great expense to bring a man twenty or thirty miles by rail to try him for a common assault, or breach of the peace, where all that goes to the Crown may be 5s. or 10s.; but all that is necessary in consequence of there being no local authority at the different parts of the county to dispose of these cases.

1141. Mr. Gordon.—Are you favourable to the jurisdiction of the Justices being retained?—That is a very difficult question. The public voice is going very much against it. I don't think the poaching cases are those that they should try.

1142. But for petty offences?—The difficulty is to get hold of them in these cases. I spoke to the Duke of Buccleuch once as to Liddesdale, and he said there are plenty appointed, but that it is difficult to get them to act.

1143. The Chairman.—They act in licensing matters?—Yes, both in Petty and Quarter Sessions.

1144. Are you satisfied with the manner in which that is done?—No, I am not. I think individual Justices, whose views are known, are pressed to attend the court. Some persons think there should be no licensing at all.

1145. How would you remedy that?—You must alter the court I am afraid.

1146. What is your suggestion?—I am not prepared to make any suggestion consistent with the retention of their jurisdiction in the matter.

1147. Do the magistrates of the burgh of Jedburgh exercise that jurisdiction?—Yes.

1148. Do they do it in a satisfactory way?—It is more uniform, and the same persons are sitting there. I have not studied the matter, but I think the jurisdiction is unsatisfactory. There is another thing which I wish to point out with reference to the trials before the Justices in poaching cases. The usual practice is to get one or two Justices to try the case; there is no summoning, the judges are selected. I do not mean to say that they are selected because they will be under the influence of those who conduct the prosecution, not being persons of position, or legal experience; but that is the mode adopted, and I don't think it is a satisfactory way of holding a court. If it is a court of Petty Sessions, the Justices of the district should get notice, and have an opportunity of attending if they like, so as to let the judgment of the court have the weight of a considerable number of persons. At present the selection of them is left very much to the prosecutor and the clerk, and I don't think that is satisfactory.

1149. Mr. Shand.—Is there a general feeling in your county that it would be better that game cases generally should rather be disposed of by the Sheriff than by the Justices?—There is a very strong feeling among the public.

1150. Mr. Gordon.—In the event of the Sheriff being abolished, what would be the proper salary for the persons discharging the duties of resident Sheriffs as you call them?—The Act gives power at present to raise the salaries to £1000, and I think if the jurisdiction were extended, that would in most cases not be more than the proper salary. I think some might be a little less, and perhaps some a little more; but £500 is not a salary for a person exercising the duties of a resident judge. I think there might be exceptional arrangements in the extreme north.

1151. Supposing there was an immediate change, would you continue the resident Sheriff, or give an option to the principal Sheriffs to do the duty?—Give them an option to retire on their salaries? You might do that if you like.

1152. The Chairman.—The question was whether you would give an option to the principal Sheriff to take the local duties?—Probably he would have his option. That is a matter for consideration. Some of the good men would not take it. The Sheriff holds his office ad vitam aut culpam; and we are practically on the same footing in that respect. I think it should be the person who has carried on the ordinary duties on the spot who should have the preferable claim. The Sheriff has not had an opportunity of attaching himself to the place, and he has not discharged the duties of ordinary judge. If there is to be a person appointed to continue to do the ordinary duties, I think the person who has the preferable claim is the person who has hitherto discharged them.

1153. Mr. Gordon.—Do you think there might be a saving of time by the Sheriff being required to go more frequently to his county than he is by the Act of 1853?—No doubt of it.

1155. Mr. Adam.—In the case of there being only one resident Sheriff, would you select that Sheriff from the bar only?—It is desirable to do so, I think, so long as they can be got. I would not make it a statutory requisition; but I think if members of the higher branches of the profession are available for such appointments, it is not for the public interest that the person selected should be taken from the lower branches of the profession, unless on special grounds. I think a barrister is better qualified to discharge these duties, from his education and experience, than members of the other branches of the profession; but I don't say that that should be a statutory requisite. In point of fact it is very rare now that appointments are not made from the bar; and if the office were put on a better footing, there would be greater inducements to members of the bar, of unquestionable position, to accept it.

1158. You have been a member of the bar for a number of years?—I was called to the bar in 1854.

1159. Have you any suggestions to make as to the constitution of the Sheriff Court as consisting of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitutes?—Yes; I have turned that over in my mind, and I shall be glad to state my opinion if the Commission wish it. It is perhaps rather a delicate matter for one holding the office of Sheriff-substitute to urge changes in the matter of the constitution of the court; but, at the same time, having formed an opinion, and the Commission having been good enough to ask what that opinion is, I think it right to state that I consider the present constitution of the court anomalous, and in some respects unconstitutional. There is no doubt, I think, on the other hand, that there are certain advantages attending the present constitution of the court, and it is for the Commission, and ultimately for the Legislature, to say which of these counterbalances the other. My own opinion is, that the anomalous and unconstitutional character of the constitution of the court counterbalances any advantages which are derived from its form. I say it is unconstitutional, in the first place, that one judge should have the appointment of another judge. Still more, I think, it is unconstitutional that a judge should have the power of doing his duty by deputy, which, I believe, is the true theory of the present constitution of the Sheriff Court. I shall speak afterwards as to the matter of appeal, which enters largely into the subject of the constitution of the court, and therefore I say nothing about that at present. But I would observe, in the next place, that it appears to me very desirable that the chief magistrate of a county should be resident within that county. That was the principle on which I understand the office of Sheriff was constituted at the time the heritable jurisdictions were abolished; but that principle was departed from subsequently, and I think ought now to be returned to. You will observe that I do not say that the Sheriff-depute should be abolished. On the contrary, I say that the Sheriff of the county ought to be resident within the county, and doing the work of Sheriff. Of course it is quite another matter, and a personal matter, in which I give no opinion, whether the fillers of the one office or the other should be selected for the purpose of filling the single office of Sheriff. With reference to the present state of matters, while stating that I do not mean anything personal to the gentleman with whom I have the honour to serve, and with whom I am on terms of the most perfect cordiality in the management of the office, I would say that it is very undesirable that the Sheriff should be entitled at any time to come down to the county, and to take his seat on the bench, and thereby supersede the ordinary resident judge. It may be said that is not a thing very likely to happen; but I should wish to call the attention of the Commissioners to the words of the Act of 1853, sec. 46, where it is enacted, after the enactments about the visits of the Sheriff to his county, that he shall hold a Small Debt Circuit once a year, 'and shall on such occasions, in addition to holding a Small Debt Court, despatch as much of the ordinary business that may be ready for adjudication as the time may permit of.' Therefore it is contemplated by the Legislature that the Sheriff shall come down to his county, and while he is there shall supersede the Sheriff-substitute in his ordinary court. That, I think, is an undesirable thing, because it must necessarily, if done, affect the position of the resident Sheriff in the eyes of the public and of the functionaries in the court. I am further of opinion that it seriously affects the position of the resident Sheriff, who at present is the Sheriff-substitute, that he does not hold the direct commission of the Crown. I think his duties are so important, and his position in the county is of such weight, that he ought to hold a direct commission from the Crown. He ought to be the officer of the Crown in the county. This, I think, should be the case whether the double office is retained or not. If the double office is retained, I think the resident judge ought to be appointed by the Crown, and hold his commission from the Crown equally with the Sheriff of appeal. If it is determined to retain the double office, I should further suggest that the number of the Sheriffs-depute should be materially diminished. The reason for this will be more apparent afterwards, when I come to speak of appeal, as I am of opinion that appeal may be very much limited; but I bring it in at present as it affects the constitution of the court, that the Sheriffs-depute, if retained, should be reduced in number. The result of that would, I think, also be, that if they have many counties to superintend, their functions should be limited to the office of appeal judge, and that they should not be entitled to discharge the ordinary duties of the Sheriff Court. There are other duties of the Sheriff which are at present usually discharged by the Sheriff-depute. In the first place, there is the registration business of the county, which I think might very well be left to the resident Sheriff. There is the duty of returning officer, which, if the number of Sheriff-deputes were diminished, would necessarily fall to the Sheriff-substitute, because, in the hurry of a general election, it would be impossible for the Sheriff-depute to act as returning officer in several counties; but that is a duty also which I think the present holders of the office of Sheriff-substitute might safely be trusted with, and in point of fact they do frequently exercise these duties at the time of a general election. Another function which in my own county the Sheriff-depute discharges to a considerable extent, is that of criminal jury trials. It is the general rule in my county that the Sheriff-depute fixes jury trials, and comes down to the county and takes them. If he finds it inconvenient to do so, after waiting some time, and occasionally I think longer than is desirable, he intimates to the Procurator-fiscal that he cannot take the jury trials, and requests the Procurator-fiscal to apply to me to take them, which I am always very happy to do. I don't think it desirable that there should be such a system in what I suppose is considered by the public a more important part of his duty than the ordinary work,—that it should be the practice of the Sheriff-depute to come and to supersede the Sheriff-substitute in the exercise of it, unless in special circumstances. I should wish here to say that I mean nothing personal to Mr. Mackenzie, with whom, as already mentioned, I am on terms of the greatest cordiality. I would also say, that whether the double office is abolished or retained, I consider the number of resident Sheriffs might be very materially diminished, and that probably a dozen might be struck off. The districts were assigned before railway communication was known in the country, and places are now very much nearer each other, measured by time and not by distance. I think also, that if you take a man and pay for his whole time, which is the thing that the public does in this case, the Sheriff-substitute being prohibited from taking any other business, it is right that he should have full occupation if possible. In my own case that is not so; and there are several other small jurisdictions in my immediate neighbourhood which are even in a worse position. I might refer particularly to the county of Kinross, which is within a very few miles of my residence, where the population is under 8000, and where the full staff of Sheriff-substitute, Sheriff-clerk, and Procurator-fiscal is kept up. I think that jurisdiction might be amalgamated with my own. A few years ago I considered the matter with reference to other jurisdictions; and the districts that I think might well be abolished are Bute, Clackmannan, Kinross, Nairn, Peebles, Tain, Selkirk, Falkirk, and probably some of the Highland districts, although upon that I speak with diffidence, not having sufficient knowledge in the matter, and being of opinion that probably the Highlands and Islands must be dealt with as exceptional in some degree, owing to the facilities of communication not being so great as in the Lowlands.

1160. Mr. Baxter.—Do you mean to reduce the Sheriff-principals only?—No; I mean the Sheriff-substitutes, if the double office is retained, and the single resident Sheriffs if it is abolished.

1161. The Chairman.—You mean that these places should cease to be the seats of Sheriff-substitutes?—Yes; but I think it might probably be well to continue them as seats of court, and that the Sheriff or Sheriff-substitute shall hold courts there once a week, or oftener if necessary.

1162. Dr. Barclay.—What counties do you propose to amalgamate?—I may refer to a scheme which will be found in the Journal of Jurisprudence, vol. x., p. 129. With reference to my own district in the county of Fife, I should wish to bring under the notice of the Commission the very unequal division of that county, for which I am quite unable to account. The Cupar district comprehends a population of 119,000 odds, and the Dunfermline district a population of only 35,400. Of course the business from the two is divided in somewhat the same proportion. The difference in the salary of the two Sheriff-substitutes is only £100 a year, and the work is about three times as much in the one as in the other. These are all the observations that I have to make in regard to the constitution of the Sheriff Court.

1163. The Lord Advocate.—Why do you think it desirable that the chief magistrate should reside in the county?—Because he is the person responsible for the peace of the county.

1164. Are you aware of the ground upon which he was prohibited from residing in the county?—I understand it was in order that he might be in closer communication with the Lord Advocate and other officials in Edinburgh.

1165. Was it not also that he should be removed from local influences?—It may be so.

1166. Do you not think that a material and important element in the matter?—I do not think so.

1167. Supposing it had been found before the Act of Parliament passed that that did take place, what would you say?—Society was in a very different state then.

1168. You would not apprehend that that would take place now?—I think not; and in Edinburgh and Lanarkshire, where the Sheriff-depute is resident within his county, I am not aware of any inconvenience having been felt.

1170. Don't you think that, as a rule, the Sheriff-substitutes throughout Scotland are very good men?—Of course I would say yes to that; but it is a delicate question, I think, to urge on a Sheriff-substitute.

1171. The Chairman.—The question is substantially this, whether the Sheriffs have, as a rule, well exercised their power?—I think so. I put the objection to the system upon the constitutional ground.

1172. Dr. Barclay.—Is it not important that the sanction of the heads of court must be got to the appointment of a Sheriff-substitute?—I am aware of that, which is no doubt in some respects a safeguard.

1173. Mr. Shand.—Has not the Sheriff a material interest in appointing a very efficient man?—I should think so.

1174. What do you refer to when you say you should think so?—I think it is desirable to have an able coadjutor in the work of the court. I cannot conceive a man appointing an inferior person for the sake of the public thinking that that person is inferior.

1175. Therefore the Sheriff has the strongest possible motive to appoint a good man, and in point of fact that is the rule?—I think so.

1176. Mr. Paterson.—Have you found any practical difficulty to arise from the principal Sheriff occasionally taking part of the ordinary business of your court?—No; he does not as a general rule in my district do so, unless in jury trials as I have explained.

1177. Have you any complaints from your bar on the subject of his taking the duties which you think might be done by the Sheriff-substitute?—No; I am not aware of it. I am not likely to hear of such complaints.

1178. Mr. Adam.—With reference to extending the jurisdiction of the resident Sheriff, would you take a prisoner to make a declaration from the end of one county to the middle of another?—Yes, by railway, and that would probably be done much quicker than in the old days when he was taken to the county town by gig.

1179. Mr. Baxter.—These cases will not be numerous?—No.

1180. Mr. Adam.—Don't you think it is an objection with reference to a man who is only apprehended on suspicion, to send him by the public railway in the custody of police officers?—That is a question of degree. It is always unpleasant to be taken by officers through the public streets; but that must be done.

1181. Mr. Baxter.—It is done in every case in the county when a man is apprehended and taken before the Sheriff?—Yes.

1182. Mr. Adam.—You say it is a question of degree?—Yes; and in the districts which I propose to amalgamate with my own, Kinross is not above fifteen miles from Dunfermline by railway, and Alloa is about twelve miles on the other side. I cannot see that it is a greater hardship to take a man by railway from Alloa or Kinross to Dunfermline, than to drive him in a gig from the borders of Clackmannan or Kinross-shire to the county towns of these jurisdictions.

1183. The Lord Justice-General.—What do you mean exactly by saying that it is unconstitutional for one judge to appoint another?—Because I am not aware of any other instance in which that is done.

1184. You mean that it is unknown?—It is unknown to the British constitution in any other case, so far as I am aware.

A. Beatson Bell.

1185. Mr. Campbell.—You think it is not conformable with the theory of judicial appointments that such a thing should be done?—Quite so. I think the appointment should flow from the Crown.

1186. The Chairman.—Is that also what you have in view when you say it is anomalous?—Yes.

1187. The Lord Justice-General.—Then your chief objection to the existing system is, that it is an arrangement that is unknown in other cases or in other countries?—Yes.

1188. Do you think that a great evil in itself?—I think so.

1189. Mr. Shand.—You stated that you have a scheme by which about a dozen resident Sheriffs might be dispensed with; does your scheme also embrace the number of the Sheriffs-depute that you think might be dispensed with?—No; I have not considered that fully.

1190. Have you considered it at all?—Yes, I think that might be done; but I have not considered the details.

1191. Have you formed any idea as to the number?—No; not the precise number.

The next head of the notes which have been furnished to me is, the Sheriff's jurisdiction with reference to limits, and, first, in civil matters. I am of opinion, under this head, that it is expedient that the small debt jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be extended. I have come to be of that opinion from its expeditious and its cheap character, and from finding that it is the most popular jurisdiction which the Sheriff exercises. In the returns of 1863, I find that there were 396 cases raised at Dunfermline under the Small Debt Act in 1863, and in 1867 I find, from statistics which the Sheriff-clerk-depute at Dunfermline has been kind enough to prepare for me, that the number was 627; the amount sued for in 1863 was £1450, while last year it had risen to £2430. On the other hand, I find that the ordinary court business has fallen off to a considerable extent; for while in 1863 there were 19 cases raised under £25, concluding for a total sum of £279, last year there were only 8 cases raised, concluding for £161, 19s.; and of actions above £25 in 1863 there were 23 raised, concluding for £2300, while last year there were only 13 raised, concluding for £563. The result of that upon the whole is, that the small debt cases are very much more numerous than the cases in the ordinary court, and are for three times the pecuniary amount. It may be a somewhat limited experience in a small district; but from that I would be disposed to say that the small debt is a favourite jurisdiction with the public, and I think therefore it is capable of being extended.

1192. The Lord Justice-General.—Do you think it is as popular with defenders as with pursuers?—The number of cases brought into a court can only be judged by the number of pursuers. I suppose no action is popular with the defender.

1193. Not the action, but the court—the jurisdiction?—In small matters, I think the defender, when not fighting merely for delay, would rather have the case disposed of at once, than have the delay inseparable from the ordinary court.

1194. Then you think it is equally popular with defenders as with pursuers?—I should think so, as far as I can judge; but my opinion is not much worth upon that, as that is a point which statistics cannot touch, and I do not come into contact with litigants so as to hear from defenders themselves whether they consider the court popular. I was also going to give another reason why I think the small debt jurisdiction might be extended, and that is from the experience we have already had of the Debts Recovery Act. That Act seems to be giving satisfaction. In the first few cases notes of evidence were asked with a view to an appeal; but that has become entirely obsolete, and it is quite exceptional now that notes of evidence should be asked. Both parties prefer that the decision of the judge who tries the case should then and there be given, and should be final in point of fact. From that I am disposed to think that it has been a popular measure, and that it may be extended to other actions. I call it a small debt jurisdiction, but I ought to explain that it is with certain limits. I would not extend the small debt jurisdiction further than it is at present, without appeal in matter of law. I think that £12 is sufficiently high to be final both in fact and law; but I would be disposed to take the limit of the Debts Recovery Act, namely £50, and to apply the small debt procedure to all cases under £50, and to give an appeal in point of law in such cases between £12 and £50.

1195. The Lord Advocate.—Do you prefer the small debt form of process to the Debts Recovery Act?—They are, to a large extent, at present the same.

1197. What object have you to gain by extending the small debt jurisdiction to £50, if you think the Debts Recovery Act has been working well?—Because it has been working well as a Small Debt Act,—not as an Act under which appeal has been practically taken.

1198. Then, substantially, it meets the object you have in view?—With reference to the class of cases to which it applies, but I would extend it to all cases. That is my proposal.

1199. Mr. Campbell.—When a note of evidence is not asked to be taken, the proceedings, with the exception of noting the pleas, are the same in a small debt action, and in an action under the Debts Recovery Act?—Precisely; and the finality is precisely the same, because, though an appeal in point of law is provided for in the Debts Recovery Act, the machinery for working that appeal has not been provided.

1200. The Chairman.—You would have an appeal in point of law under the Small Debt Act?—Not under £12.

1201. Would you abolish the Debts Recovery Act?—I would abolish it to this extent, that I would consolidate the whole into one. There should not be a particular form of process for debts to which the triennial prescription applies, and another for debts to which it does not apply.

1202. Mr. Shand.—Which form of process would you adopt under your consolidated statute?—A modification of the small debt, giving power of appeal in point of law, and providing machinery for carrying that out by means of a stated case, as it is sometimes called, or by means of what is very much the same thing, an interlocutor containing findings in fact and law, such as Sheriffs pronounce at present in proofs.

1203. The Chairman.—Would the extending of the Debts Recovery Act to sums under £12, but without an appeal in law, accomplish your object?—I think that is very much what we have at present.

1204. Under the Debts Recovery Act you cannot take a case under £12?—But you have the small debt process.

1205. Mr. Shand.—Which of the two forms of process do you find in practice works best,—the proper small debt, or the debts recovery?—The proper small debt; so much so, that the debts recovery is worked in that way without appeal.

1206. Mr. Baxter.—If you appeal under the Debts Recovery Act, what does the Sheriff judge of? What goes to him?—The notes of evidence taken by the Sheriff, or dictated to a shorthand writer, and extended.

1207. Does he hear the parties?—No. He has the power of reversing on the proof, or of ordering a new trial, but not the power of ordering an oral hearing. He reviews, without the advantage of a debate, or of seeing the witnesses, the judgment of a judge pronounced after personally taking the proof and hearing parties.

1208. Have you ever heard of a reversal in such an appeal?—No, I have not; not in my own experience.

1209. Mr. Shand.—Do you attribute the falling off of your ordinary cases to any dissatisfaction with the ordinary process?—I think so. I think there is dissatisfaction with the ordinary form of process in the Sheriff Court.

1211. What leads you to think so?—Because in many cases the summons is restricted to such a sum as to bring it within the small debt jurisdiction. Under this head of extension of jurisdiction there have also been various proposals made for the extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction with reference to the matters falling under his jurisdiction, as well as to the mode. It has been proposed that the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended so as to give him jurisdiction over all parties in any action where the defenders, or one of them, resides or carries on business within the county, or where the cause of action, whether contract or damage, has wholly or in part arisen within the county. I believe that much inconvenience has been found from the jurisdiction of the Sheriff not being extended to that, necessitating, where defenders live in different jurisdictions, very small matters to come to the Court of Session. It has also been proposed to give the Sheriff jurisdiction in the appointment of judicial factors on small estates, and I think that that might be of advantage in some cases. With regard to giving a jurisdiction in matters of heritable right, I must say I am more doubtful. That is more for the public to say. I think the Sheriffs would be quite willing to accept such jurisdiction, if the public think it ought to be extended to them. The privative jurisdiction of the Court of Session at present no doubt sometimes acts injuriously; at the same time, it is a difficult thing to draw a line—to give a jurisdiction up to a given point in value in heritage, as a piece of land only worth a few pounds a year may have a pretium affectionis to the owner, which makes it desirable that a question of that sort should not be disposed of by the Sheriff.

1212. Mr. Baxter.—Though that were given, do you think that many cases of great importance would be appealed?—I don't think so.

1213. Mr. Shand.—Do you know of cases of hardship occurring in your own district about small heritable subjects, where parties have failed to get a remedy in the Sheriff Court?—I have had to sist process in very small matters, to allow parties to bring a declarator in the Court of Session; and very probably I have heard no more of the case, the expense being so serious.

1214. The Chairman.—Would you be disposed to give jurisdiction in cases of status?—I think not.

1215. Mr. Baxter.—Would you give the Sheriff jurisdiction in questions under the Conjugal Rights Act—in petitions for protection of a wife's earnings?—I believe that might be done. I believe in England that is competent to a police magistrate; and if it is found to work well there, I see no objection to it.

1216. Extraordinary removings?—I believe there is some kind of a removing that is not competent to a Sheriff Court, but I have never seen one. I don't think that is a clamant case of hardship; but if there are really many of such removings, I think undoubtedly the Sheriff's jurisdiction ought to be extended to them. I thought that such a slight matter that I did not mention it.

1217. Would you extend the jurisdiction to suspensions on bills?—To an unlimited amount, do you mean?

1218. Yes; or a higher limit?—I have not considered that point fully, and I should not wish to give an opinion upon it.

1219. Mr. Paterson.—You have said you would extend the jurisdiction to the appointment of judicial factors on small estates. Have you considered what the limit should be?—The limit that has been suggested, and that has met with pretty general approval, is where the estate does not exceed £500 in personal property, and £50 per annum in heritage. That is a hard and fast line, and it must be drawn somewhere.

1220. Mr. Murray.—You would not give the Sheriff jurisdiction in questions of divorce?—No.

1221. Dr. Barclay.—Though you would not give the Sheriff jurisdiction in cases of divorce, would you give it a mensa et thoro?—I think not.

1222. Are you aware that the inferior commissaries had that up to 1826?—I am aware of that.

1223. Have you not found in your jurisdiction clamant cases of maltreatment of a woman by her husband, where there was no remedy to be got?—I do not see how I could have been officially aware of such cases.

1224. By their coming before you and making complaints, or the agents for the poor taking them up and saying they had no remedy?—No, I have not heard of any such cases in that way. Of course I have tried criminally husbands for assaults on their wives. I have also had married women, who have been deserted by their husbands, coming to me to ascertain if they could be compelled to come back, but not apparently wishing to have a separation.

1225. Mr. Baxter.—Are you not aware that the lower orders are debarred from the remedy of divorce by having to go to the Court of Session?—I am not aware of that. On the contrary, when at the bar I was counsel for the poor, and I saw many poor people get the remedy of divorce in the Court of Session at little or no cost.

1226. Mr. Clark.—Were these cases frequent?—They were very common indeed. About one half the business of the poor's counsel was in that class of cases.

1227. Mr. Shand.—How many poor cases of divorce have you seen in a year in the Court of Session?—I should say about half a dozen, which, I think, gives a large enough proportion for Scotland.

1228. Dr. Barclay.—Were both husband and wife on the Poor Roll?—I have frequently seen that; but most divorce cases are undefended.

1229. Mr. Campbell.—Have you had repeated cases of interim aliment?—Some, but not very many.

1230. Is there any reason why the Sheriff should not have power to dispose of cases of permanent aliment?—That comes to giving him jurisdiction in cases of separation and aliment, which I have already stated I think he should not have.

1231. Mr. Shand.—Do you mean to say that there are only six cases in which divorce should be given among the poorer classes in this country in the course of a year?—I think so.

1232. Do you think that is about the number of poor people who have a right to divorce in Scotland in course of a year?—Not who have a right, but who are in such a position that it is right for them to exercise it.

1233. Mr. Paterson.—You have a large mining population in your neighbourhood?—Yes; a large mining and manufacturing population.

1234.—Do you think that a cheap and easy means of getting divorce might increase the number of cases of divorce?—I have no doubt of it. I have no doubt that if the Sheriff got jurisdiction in divorce cases, there would be plenty for him to do.

1235. The Chairman.—Do you think it would add to the laxity of morals if divorce were more easily got?—I think so.

1236. Dr. Barclay.—In what way?—I think there should not be very much facility for divorce. It is a very serious matter, and a man should not be entitled just to go to the court and get divorced on the spot.

With reference to the Sheriff's jurisdiction in criminal matters, I think it works very well upon the whole. It might be perhaps advisable to extend his jurisdiction to cases of robbery, but I think to none of the other pleas of the Crown. The Crown authorities would still have the option of sending such cases to be tried before the Sheriff or not as they pleased; but there are many cases of what is legally robbery which are adequately punished by the sentence which the Sheriff has power to inflict. It has been proposed to give the Sheriff power to pronounce a sentence of penal servitude. I think that is more a question for the public than for the Sheriffs; but as long as the Circuit Courts are kept up, I think it is probably more desirable that sentences of penal servitude should be confined to them. I am very clearly of opinion that there should be no extension of the summary power of the Sheriff to award imprisonment beyond two months. In some quarters there has been a proposal to extend it to six months; but I am of opinion that the powers of the Sheriff are sufficiently high in the matter of summary jurisdiction already. With reference to the matter of criminal jurisdiction, I may here remark that I think the Procurators-fiscal should not be allowed to have private practice.

1237. Mr. Baxter.—Do you mean in all localities?—Yes, with this explanation, that, as I have already stated, the districts of the Sheriffs should be so enlarged that it would be possible to give an adequate salary to Procurators-fiscal, and to get their whole time. At present it is out of the question. The idea of keeping a Procurator-fiscal for Kinross alone, and paying for his whole time, could not be entertained; but the districts should be enlarged; and if so, the Procurators-fiscal should be debarred from private practice.

1238. At present, in small districts, could you get men to do it?—Certainly not. But it is obvious that the Procurator-fiscal is often placed in a false and delicate position, having clients, and practising as a lawyer.

1239. Did you ever know any evil to result from that?—I cannot speak from my own knowledge, but I have heard traditions to that effect.

1240. Mr. Clark.—Do you mean all forms of private practice,—conveyancing, bank-agency, and everything else?—Yes, and bank agencies in particular. I have heard of a case in which a Procurator-fiscal was a bank agent, where he had to investigate a charge against a prisoner who was a clerk in a rival bank, and where he had to examine the books of that bank. I should add that that case did not occur in my district.

1241. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that the matter of bail is upon a right footing at present, the test now being whether the crime was capital or not?—Yes, that is the test.

1242. Supposing a man to commit three petty acts of theft on three different days, you could not admit him to bail?—Not without the consent of Crown counsel.

1243. Supposing a man to be guilty of fraudulent bankruptcy to the extent of thousands of pounds, you would admit him to bail?—I must.

1244. Do you think that a good system?—I think that should be considered.

1245. Would it not be better to leave the matter of bail to the bailing magistrate?—I have not considered that; but speaking on the spur of the moment, I should say that there is no objection to that, and that the Sheriff-substitute should be entrusted with that power as well as Crown counsel.

1246. Reset of theft you would admit to bail to any extent?—I must.

1247. Don't you think it would be better to give the magistrate a discretion?—Do you mean an unlimited discretion?

1248. With an appeal to the Court of Justiciary?—I have not considered the point, but I see no objection to give the discretion to the magistrate, and not to the Crown counsel, to accept bail in cases technically capital. The limitation or abolition of the right of every prisoner to demand bail in cases not capital is a very serious matter; and I hesitate, without more consideration, to give an opinion on it.

1249. Mr. Paterson.—What is your experience as to the number of bail-bonds forfeited, and those that are not?—I have never seen a bail-bond forfeited in my jurisdiction. I have seen it in Circuit Courts often, but I have never seen it in my jurisdiction.

As to the writs, pleadings, and procedure, including the investigation of facts,—first in civil matters. First of all, I would say a word as to the record, which I presume is the first writ. The summons, I think, should be as short as possible. The printed form of small debt summons does well in practice. Something analogous to that might be adopted in all cases. With reference to making up the record, after the case comes into court, I have found in practice that making up the record by condescendence and answers is in general not advisable. I find that the short form of record provided by the Sheriff Court Act of 1853 works well, upon the whole. It is cheaper to the clients, and it saves great delay. If condescendence and answers are ordered, I find that nothing more is heard of the case, it may be for months from the prorogations given of consent by the agents to each other, in the way with which we are all familiar in the Court of Session. When the Sheriff has the case before him at the first or second calling, he gets the record closed then and there, and pronounces orders for proof in many cases, and the case is tried and disposed of very soon.

1250. Dr. Barclay.—That would do where the defender denies the libel; but where there is a reply, how would you do?—That is a defect, and I think the form under the Debts Recovery Act is decidedly preferable. Under that Act I have always put down the pursuer's reply where there is a separate statement by the defender. I think the rule as to making up the record should be amended to that extent. I would still retain the power of ordering condescendence and answers.

1251. Mr. Clark.—Have you found in practice that not making up condescendence and answers leads to continuations of proof on the ground of surprise?—That has led to a few motions, but I have very seldom granted them, because in point of fact I thought there was no surprise.

1252. In most of the cases which have been made up with that form of record, has the proof been as continuous as if the record had been made up by condescendence and answers?—Quite as continuous. I am very strict in adhering to the Act of Parliament about continuity of proof in all cases where that is possible.

1254. But you don't abolish the present form?—Not the power of the Sheriff to order it where he thinks proper. With reference to proofs, notes of proofs are taken in all cases at present; but if the proposal which I made a little ago, to extend the small debt jurisdiction and the debts recovery jurisdiction to £50, were adopted, with finality in regard to findings in fact, it would not be necessary to take notes of proof in cases under £50. The findings in fact, or the stated case, would be made on the spot immediately upon the conclusion of the trial. In cases above £50 I am not prepared to abolish notes of proof or review upon the facts as well as the law. Therefore some mode of reducing the proof to writing will still be necessary in these cases; and I am of opinion that there ought to be a power given to the judge or the parties to appoint shorthand writers where these can be obtained, the judge dictating the proof to the shorthand writer. I would still retain the power of the Sheriff to take the proof with his own hand if he thinks fit, because in small cases it might be hard on the parties to make them pay for a shorthand writer.

1255. Mr. Clark.—You would give the Sheriff power to order proof to be taken by a shorthand writer if he thought proper?—Yes; and I have no doubt the discretion would be used fairly.

1257. The Sheriff dictating?—Yes. In country towns you could not get shorthand writers of such accomplishments as to be able to take down the evidence without dictation; but even then it would abridge the labour very much.

1258. Mr. Baxter.—And the Sheriff dictating would also be a check on the shorthand writer?—Yes.

1259. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think that would lead to prolixity, even supposing that the Sheriff dictated the evidence?—I have not found it so in the few cases under the Debts Recovery Act in which I have used a shorthand writer.

1260. Dr. Barclay.—Do you find any difficulty in getting a shorthand writer?—No; there is a newspaper in Dunfermline, on the staff of which there is a shorthand writer.

1261. Mr. Shand.—Do you not think it would lead to prolixity throughout the country?—I don't see how it should. The power of the judge to check that would be as great in dictating to the shorthand writer as if he was himself writing the evidence.

1263. But don't you think it would be an expedient thing, in the event of a shorthand writer being employed in the ordinary court, where the cases are of importance, that to prevent all after dispute he should, before the witness leaves the box, read over his evidence to him, and that the notes should then bear that the evidence had been so read over, and that the witness expressed himself satisfied with it?—I am not aware what delay that would cause, and I don't know whether a shorthand writer can read off his notes as quickly as ordinary manuscript. If he can, I think that would be a desirable provision.

As to the writs, pleadings, and procedure in criminal matters, I have no observations to make. I think they work very well at present.

1264. The Lord Advocate.—Do you attend the taking of precognitions yourself?—In serious cases; as a general rule, in all the pleas of the Crown.

1265. Mr. Adam.—Would you give a judge the power to allow an indictment to be amended at any time during the trial, provided that it did not prejudice the prisoner?—He has that power at present, under the Summary Procedure Act; but with regard to an indictment before a jury, that is a more solemn matter, and I think either the Procurator-fiscal or Crown counsel should take care that it is in proper form.

1266. Mr. Baxter.—But suppose there was a slight clerical error which would be fatal to the indictment, and that the alteration would do no harm to the prisoner?—But who is to be the judge of that?

1267. The judge, of course?—I think that is putting a delicate duty upon him.

1268. Supposing articles were libelled as the property of John Alexander, and that they turned out to be the property of John Alexander & Co., don't you think that an amendment of the libel to that extent might be fairly made during the trial?—I am adverse to amendments in jury cases. I think the power has gone far enough in summary trials.

1269. Mr. Clark.—You mean that you are adverse to amendments after the panel has been passed to the knowledge of an assize?—Yes.

1270. Dr. Barclay.—Are you aware of a case in which the only mistake in the indictment was putting the parish as Collessie instead of some other parish, and where the prisoner would have suffered nothing by a correction of that mistake?—That mistake should not have occurred, and I think it would be letting in the thin end of the wedge to allow its correction after the trial was in progress.

1271. Would any injustice have been done to the prisoner by substituting the right name of the parish?—I think the principle of the law of Scotland, that after the prosecutor has moved that the panel be remitted to the knowledge of an assize, the libel should not be touched, is so sacred that no alteration should be allowed upon it.

1272. Mr. Shand.—Would you not allow an amendment even if it were proved that no injustice would be done to the prisoner?—No, I would not.

1273. Mr. Baxter.—Supposing a mistake was made in naming the parish in which the prisoner himself resided, would you not allow that to be corrected?—No; not after the stage of the trial to which I have alluded.

1274. Mr. Clark.—Have you found any difficulty in your county, as to the relation of the Chief Constable and the Procurator-fiscal?—Not the slightest.

1275. Do they always work harmoniously?—They work most harmoniously together.

1276. The Chief Constable admitting the authority of the Procurator-fiscal as the hand of the Sheriff in making his investigations?—I understand so.

1278. Dr. Barclay.—Does your Chief Constable hold an appointment as Procurator-fiscal before the justices?—He does; but I shall speak as to that in the sequel, when considering Justice of Peace Courts.

1279. The Lord Advocate.—Do you think that coal-pit accidents are satisfactorily investigated under the present system?—I think so. The present system is, that the owner of the mine is bound to give notice to the Lord Advocate and to the Government inspector; and very often, before the notice through these channels comes to the county officials, we have already received notice of the accident from the police; and that gives a double chance, so that no coal-pit accident can escape being investigated.

1280. Are they thoroughly investigated?—Thoroughly. A precognition is taken in all serious cases.

1281. Do you think that there is as much care as might be reasonably expected shown by the proprietors of the mines?—I think so, upon the whole.

1282. Does the Fiscal investigate cases of sudden death satisfactorily?—I think so.

1283. Have you nothing to suggest as to that?—Nothing. A warrant for precognition is granted. If there is no suspicion of foul play, I am not present at the precognition; but it is usually laid before me previous to its being sent to Crown counsel.

1284. Mr. Clark.—In precognitions in ordinary cases, of course, the prisoner is not there?—No.

1287. There are cases where there has been suspicion of very grave crime, such as murder, where the public mind is a good deal excited, and it is sometimes said that a prisoner is put on his trial to satisfy the public mind. Would that be avoided by taking the precognition in public?—It would, but the precognition is not upon oath.

1288. It may be?—It may be, but in practice it never is. That would come to be a coroner's inquest not upon oath, and without a verdict.

1289. It might be on oath in these cases?—Not if the party who is suspected of the murder is one of the witnesses examined; at least I should not think it safe to put him on oath.

1290. But he may be put on his trial to satisfy the public mind, though the precognition is not sufficient to convict?—I am not sure that that is the legitimate object of a trial for murder.

1291. But is it not sometimes done?—I never was a Crown counsel, and I don't know their motives for sending cases to trial.

1292. Mr. Adam.—Have you seen it done in cases of railway accidents, where death has resulted from carelessness?—I have seen parties put to the bar, and the Advocate-depute give up the case after he has led his proof.

1293. Why?—I did not know the motive of the Advocate-depute for putting the man on trial, or for giving up the case. I think it is not desirable that an Advocate-depute should put any man on trial, if he does not think that he ought to be convicted; but I speak with great hesitation on that point, never having held the office.

1294. The Lord Advocate.—Do you think that the present system of taking precognitions in secret is a protection to the innocent? Does it not prevent rumours from getting abroad as to innocent people?—No doubt of it.

1295. Do you think that a material element?—I think so.

1296. Do you think that secrecy or publicity would be most available for securing the ends of justice?

A. Beatson Bell.

—I think secrecy in most cases. Of course there are certain cases where publicity might be the means of bringing forward witnesses who could speak to the case.

1297. Mr. Shand.—How are the declarations of prisoners taken in your county? Are the questions put by you or by the Procurator-fiscal?—Generally by the Procurator-fiscal, and the answers are always dictated by me. I often interpose with questions, and I often disallow questions which the Procurator-fiscal wishes to put.

1298. But the prisoner is put under examination by the Procurator-fiscal in your presence?—He is.

1299. Do you approve of that system?—It goes very deeply into the whole criminal system in Scotland, and, with the safeguard of a magistrate closely superintending, I am not prepared to say that it is in most cases objectionable.

1300. The Lord Advocate.—Don't you think it would be better to reduce it simply to asking the prisoner whether he has anything to say?—I think so; or, at most, a few simple questions.

1301. Mr. Clark.—Can he make any statement, if you merely ask what he has got to say?—He may make a rambling statement.

1302. Must you not put some questions to bring out his mind on the matter of the charge?—I think so.

1303. And if these questions are few, is there any harm done?—It ought to be done within careful limits, I think.

1304. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think any questions of that kind should rather be put by the judge than by the Procurator-fiscal?—The judge is not so familiar with the case as the Procurator-fiscal. If the questions were to be put by him, he would require to study the police information beforehand.

1305. Is there any reason why he should not do so?—The information is not to him; it is to the Procurator-fiscal. He may lay it before the Sheriff, no doubt, but that is a third thing that the Sheriff would have to consider. He would have to consider first the police information; second, the precognition; and thirdly, he might have to try the man. I don't think it is desirable to have more passing through the mind of the judge who is to try the prisoner than is absolutely necessary.

1306. Dr. Barclay.—Do you see any objection to the prisoner having a right to ask that his declaration shall be read to the jury, if it is libelled?—I am aware that it is not competent for the prisoner to put his declaration in evidence in his own favour when it is not used by the prosecutor, but I have seen it refused in very few cases where it was asked by the prisoner; and these were cases where I thought it was quite right to refuse it, the prisoner having made charges against innocent parties in his declaration, which it was not desirable should be read in open court. Therefore I don't think that, as a matter of right, he ought to get it.

I had reached the matter of review, and first within the court itself. Upon that matter I am of opinion, as I said before, that the double Sheriffships should be abolished, and that there should be no review within the court itself. I am of opinion that an appeal from one judge to another is an absurdity, especially upon matters of fact, where the one judge has heard the witnesses and the other has not. Therefore I am of opinion that there should be no appeal within the court itself.

1307. The Lord Advocate.—You don't mean to state it as an absolute proposition, that an appeal from one judge to another is an absurdity?—There may be exceptional cases, when, from the nature of the court or of the questions dealt with by it, it may not be so.

1308. Mr. Clark.—Are you aware that there is an appeal from the Vice-Chancellor to the Lord Chancellor?—Yes, but I don't know if the Vice-Chancellor sees the witnesses.

1309. Mr. Shand.—Are you aware that the Lord Chancellor sits in very numerous cases of appeal both from Vice-Chancellors and from the Master of the Rolls?—Do you mean both on fact and law?

1310. Yes?—I am not sufficiently familiar with the English courts to speak on that subject.

1311. If that is so, would it be liable to the same condemnation as you have expressed?—I don't think it a good thing in principle, that one judge should review the judgment of another.

1312. Therefore that falls under the same observation that you have made with reference to the Sheriff Court?—I think so; and if there is to be no appeal from one judge to another, I think it is conclusive that there should be no appeal within the court itself, because the system of reclaiming petitions to the same judge is radically vicious. It still lingers in matters of cessio, where it is competent to reclaim to the Sheriff-substitute; and if he is disposed to refuse the reclaiming petition, he sends it to the Sheriff. I think that should be abolished.

1314. He must then come to the Supreme Court?—Yes; but, as I have already explained, there would be very few appeals, because the great mass of appeals at present are on matters of fact. I shall now briefly sketch the scheme of appeal which I would suggest. It is that there should be an appeal to the Court of Session upon stated cases, or upon interlocutors containing findings in fact and in law, between £12 and £50, as already explained. If the case is not capable of being measured by pecuniary value, I would give it on leave from the inferior judge. Above £50, I think, it would be unreasonable to demand finality in point of fact, and I think an appeal should be allowed there both in fact and in law to the Court of Session. It will be for the Court of Session or for the Legislature to determine how that appeal shall be heard there—I mean before how many judges; probably either two or four would be the proper number for an appeal court. Three is rather an unsatisfactory number for an appeal court, because in the event of difference of opinion, the whole judges who have heard the case are then divided two and two. That disadvantage does not apply to two judges or four judges. But I would further say, that such appeal should only be in fine causæ, and that there should be no appeals from interlocutory judgments except with leave. Limiting the appeal in matters under £50 to points of law, and limiting the appeal in all other cases to final judgments, I think the Court of Session would be quite able to overtake the whole appeal work of the country, the appeals would be so much diminished in number. With reference to the matter of expense—the smallness of which is, as I understand, urged particularly as the advantage of the present system—I think when you have findings in fact and in law, you will be saved the necessity in cases under £50 of almost any printing at all when the case comes to the Court of Session. All that will be brought up will be the stated case containing the facts and the law, and it will not be necessary to have the mass of printing of evidence which was one of the great causes of expense in the old system of advocations to the Court of Session.

1315. Mr. Paterson.—Then you would have no appeal within the Sheriff Court itself?—No.

1316. The Lord Advocate.—Have you made any calculation as to the probable expense of an appeal to the Court of Session?—That depends on whether the court is to enforce the rule of having two counsel on each side in every case.

1317. What do you think is the least that it could be had for?—I should think five guineas on each side, if it is a simple point of law.

1318. Mr. Clark.—Do you mean nothing but a point of law, or an easy point of law?—I mean a point of law not extending over more than one day's debate.

1319. The Lord Advocate.—Do you know any case where an appeal has been decided for that sum in the Court of Session?—I don't think so in ordinary cases; but in registration appeals on stated cases, which much resemble the system I propose, I do not think the expense much if at all exceeds that.

1320. Have you made no inquiry as to what the expense is in point of fact?—I am aware of the general expenses of the Court of Session,—the amount of fees to counsel, and the amount payable to agents. That would be all that would be required in such an appeal. For one day's hearing, I think the fees would be three guineas to counsel, and two guineas for other expenses.

1321. Have you not inquired into the average expense of a case in the Court of Session?—I am aware that generally it is very much larger than that.

1322. So that your opinion is formed without any information as to the probable expense?—On the contrary, I think the expense of the Court of Session is very large at present; but it is capable of being very much reduced.

1323. What suggestion would you make as to that?—I think a great amount of the present expense is caused by the printing; and I have pointed out how, in cases under £50, that might be reduced to the minimum.

1324. A point of law may arise on the evidence?—I would not print the evidence, because it has not been recorded in these cases.

1325. In cases above £50 that would not apply?—I don't say that five guineas would pay the expenses if the cases were above £50, but such cases could well bear a larger expense.

1327. Then, unless the appeal is to be much better in quality, the litigant had better take the present appeal to the Sheriff?—But I should think it would be much better in quality; and even if it were more expensive, it would be worth the difference.

1328. Are litigants of that opinion? Do they, as a general rule, take the judgment of the Court of Session?—No; because they are deterred by the expense and the delay.

1329. Would they not be deterred under your system?—I think not. They have already had the expense of an appeal under the present system, and that is all they are willing to risk.

1330. But you think the delay and the expense ought at present to prevent cases from coming to the Court of Session?—Yes.

1331. That would not operate, you think, in the other case?—By the time a case is decided in the Sheriff Court by both the Sheriffs, after preliminary appeals before proof, and on appeals on the merits, the losing party is utterly worn out, his means are exhausted, and he would rather submit to a loss than go further.

1332. On the whole, you think the appeal to the Court of Session would be as cheap and rapid as an appeal to the Sheriff?—It might be made so, I think.

1333. What do you suggest might be saved, in addition to the printing?—Do you mean me to go into the details of the way in which an action is heard in the Court of Session?

1334. That is almost essential in order to confirm your opinion?—I shall be glad to do so. I think that the way in which a case is frequently heard in the Court of Session leads to great expense. I may explain that I sat for four years in the First Division as a reporter, and I saw a good deal of what went on in the way of hearing advocations in the Inner House; and undoubtedly, from the mode in which the cases were heard, there was expense which I thought might have been avoided. The system of refreshing fees to counsel has taken such deep root in the bar, that I suppose it cannot very well be got rid of; but I have seen an advocation called at a quarter before four o'clock when the court rose at four; and I have heard agents say that the hearing then cost about a guinea a minute or thereby. I think that might have been avoided, either by abolishing the system of refreshers, and sending a fee to counsel for the case, however long it took or whenever it was taken up, or by some other arrangement as to calling the cases. These are two points on which a good deal of expense might be saved.

1335. Are you of opinion, on the whole, that the appeal might be made as cheap as it is to the Sheriff just now?—Not quite.

1336. Does it not cost at least double?—Double for one appeal; but there would be in general only one appeal in the case, so that I don't know that the expense of appealing would be greater, considering the number of appeals now competent in each case.

1337. But suppose you restrict the appeals to the Sheriff in the same way, what object have you in taking a litigant to the Court of Session, when he is to pay double for the remedy he gets there?—It is always worth more to get the decision of the Supreme Court.

1338. Mr. Clark.—Do you think that if there was only one judge in the Sheriff Court, there would not be a great many more appeals to the Court of Session than there are now?—Undoubtedly. There are very few at present.

1339. Dr. Barclay.—Do you mean that the appeal should be without caution?—Yes, as is now competent under the Act of this year.

1340. That would increase the number of appeals?—Yes.

1341. Mr. Shand.—You spoke of the expense of a Sheriff Court litigation as being ruinous and wearing out to the litigant. What is the average expense, in your experience, of a litigation concluded before you?—Do you mean with a judgment of the Sheriff-substitute and the Sheriff?

1342. Yes?—The statistics will show that.

1343. Mr. Clark.—What is the average sum in your decree for expenses?—It varies very much. In the ordinary court it is about £18.

1345. Mr. Shand.—Can you give the highest and the lowest?—I cannot give that.

1347. What is the average expense of an appeal to the Sheriff, without an oral hearing?—A few shillings.

1348. And with an oral hearing?—It depends on the scale of the case.

1349. But from what to what?—From £2 to £4.

1350. You mentioned five guineas as what might be the expense of an advocation in the Court of Session. Is that the whole expense?—That is the expense per side.

1351. How do you reach your estimate of five guineas?—I think the counsel should get three guineas; and probably the other two guineas would be sufficient to pay the agent.

1352. And printing, and clerks' fees?—There would be no printing. The stated case or interlocutor might be read by counsel at the beginning of the hearing, or a written copy handed to the judge.

1355. Mr. Webster.—And that is only on one side?—Yes.

1356. The Chairman.—And £3, 3s. for counsel on each side?—Yes.

1357. For a case that is heard on one day?—Yes; not to occupy the whole day, but to be called and disposed of on the same day. The counsel may have many such cases in a day.

1358. Mr. Baxter.—Then judgment must be pronounced on the same day?—Yes.

1359. Mr. Webster.—You allow nothing for counsel's clerk?—The magnitude of these fees is an abuse too, I think.

1360. Mr. Shand.—Do you contemplate keeping up the power of appeal for the purpose of progress under the Judicature Act, as distinguished from review?—I have not considered that fully. I think it depends a good deal upon whether it is expedient to introduce jury trial into the Sheriff Court. If the public are anxious to have that, I think it would be unnecessary to remove cases to the Court of Session for jury trial.

1361. How many of your twenty cases are advocated or appealed to the Court of Session?—There has been only one advocation since I went to Dunfermline four years ago, and there have been two appeals since the new Act came into force, by which the necessity for finding caution was abolished.

1362. Do you attribute the bringing of these appeals to the facility afforded by that Act?—One of them. One would have come at any rate; it was a heavy case. In the other the Sheriffs differed.

1363. Do you approve of the abolition of caution?—Undoubtedly.

With regard to review in criminal matters, I have no observation to offer. I think the review by suspension in the Court of Justiciary is very satisfactory.

As to costs: of course costs will be much diminished if my plan were adopted in the Sheriff Court. The system of costs introduced by the Debts Recovery Act is an experiment, and I am not prepared to give an opinion upon it one way or other. I don't find that there is any difficulty in getting agents to take cases under that Act; but it may be matter for consideration whether the uniform system is a right one, and whether a person who has a difficult case is to get part of his agent's fees paid by another litigant who has an easy case—the one being overpaid, and the other underpaid. That system is still on its trial, and I think it is more a matter for agents to give an opinion upon than for me.

1365. Mr. Webster.—Is it right that a man with a very plain and simple case should pay the costs of another who has a difficult case?—That is what I was putting; but I think it is a matter for agents.

1366. Mr. Harrison.—Have you heard any complaints from litigants, that they have had to pay more than their fair share of the expense?—I don't come in contact with litigants.

The next matter is the privileges of agents; and I would suggest that the time has now come when there should be a general body of agents for all Scotland, admitted by the Supreme Court, with power to practise in all courts, both supreme and inferior.

1367. Mr. Shand.—What would be the advantages of such a system?—If you adopt the system of appeal which I have suggested, it will simplify and cheapen matters, because the same agent will either himself conduct the case in Edinburgh, or he will have a partner in Edinburgh who will do it. He will be saved the trouble and expense of instructing another agent. At present it is considered pactum illicitum for a country agent to have a partnership with an agent in Edinburgh, and to share the profits of a litigation in the Court of Session. In England I understand it is not so; and I see no reason for its being considered pactum illicitum. On the contrary, I think that, from the raising of the status of the Sheriff Court procurators, the time has come when there should be one body of agents throughout Scotland.

1368. The Chairman.—But suppose your more general view not to be adopted, do you see any objection to removing the obstruction of pactum illicitum?—No, I never could see why an arrangement of the kind I have indicated should be pactum illicitum.

1369. Mr. Murray.—If your view of having one body of agents was adopted, I suppose the qualifications would be the same for all. In that case, would you level up or level down?—Country practitioners have been very much levelled up already by the Procurators Act.

1370. According to the present system, a Writer to the Signet must have passed an apprenticeship of five years, and attended a university for five or six sessions; would you require that qualification from all country practitioners?—Not so much as five or six sessions.

1371. Then would you bring down the qualifications of the Edinburgh practitioners?—I think the Writers to the Signet are quite entitled to keep up the qualifications of their body to any extent they think proper. I don't propose to make the others Writers to the Signet.

1372. But you propose to make all one body?—All practitioners. I do not propose to interfere with the corporations of Writers to the Signet, or the Solicitors before the Supreme Courts.

1373. Mr. Harrison.—Would you propose that they should still retain certain exclusive privileges as to practice?—Not as to practice. Until very recently, the Writers to the Signet had exclusive privileges in preparing certain writs, but that has been very much broken in upon by recent legislation. Under the Act of this year, a Writer to the Signet is bound, on payment of a small fee, to sign any summons presented to him.

1374. Mr. Murray.—What advantage would any one have in being a Writer to the Signet, if a man of lower qualifications were admitted to do everything that a Writer to the Signet can do?—If signet letters are still to be kept up, he would not be a Writer to the Signet, and he would not have the social status that Writers to the Signet have.

1375. Then you don't contemplate that the general body of practitioners should be able to practise in everything?—They would be able to practise before the court.

1376. Dr. Barclay.—I thought your remark was only applicable to provincial Solicitors following their cases into the Court of Session?—No, I go further than that.

1377. Mr. Murray.—You would make one body of practitioners for the whole country, to practise in all courts?—Yes.

1378. Mr. Paterson.—Supposing your plan for a general body of practitioners for Scotland was carried out, what test would you impose as to their qualifications? Would you require them to have attended college?—I think so. They are all obliged to do that at present.

1379. For how many sessions would you require that they should attend?—I have not considered that fully, but long enough to give them a liberal education.

1380. Without such a test of their qualifications, I suppose you would not place them on a parity with any of the legal bodies in Edinburgh or elsewhere, having exclusive privileges?—No, I think not, only as practitioners before the court.

1381. Mr. Murray.—Would you think it just to require from a practitioner in Mull all the qualifications that you would require from a Writer to the Signet in Edinburgh?—I think the further that you are away from Edinburgh, there is the more necessity for having a well-educated lawyer to assist the court.

1382. The Chairman.—Did your observations apply to Writers to the Signet?—No; not to Writers to the Signet as such.

1383. Writers to the Signet require a certain education, and apprenticeship with members of their own body, that is, qua Writers to the Signet?—Yes.

1384. But as practitioners before the court, they have no higher powers than a solicitor, and what you are alluding to is the agency of causes before the court?—That is precisely my meaning.

1385. Mr. Shand.—Do you think that the present system of double agency has kept business from the Supreme Court which would otherwise have come to it?—I am disposed to think so. If it had not been for the rule of pactum illicitum, I think that more cases might have come from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session.

1386. The Chairman.—How does that arise? Do you think that there is an indisposition to bring them to the Court of Session because the adviser in the country has no benefit from that; or is it because the adviser in the country has an interest to keep the case there till the client is exhausted?—I understand Mr. Shand's question to refer to the end of a cause in the Sheriff Court. The adviser in the country has then no pecuniary interest that the case should go further.

1387. But the client has the same interest, and he can take advice from somebody else?—Yes; but the country agent has then ceased to have any pecuniary interest in further proceedings, and without his advice the client is not likely to go further.

1388. And you think that without a stimulant from him, the client would not come to the Court of Session?—I think not very often.

1389. And you think this would be a stimulant to the client?—I think so.

1390. Have you any other suggestions to make?—I would suggest that, in revising the salaries of the Sheriff-substitutes, or resident Sheriffs, if that is to be done—and I assume that it will necessarily be done—it would be desirable that the system of fees in bankruptcy cases should be abolished. That is an unpleasant part of the emoluments of Sheriff-substitutes at present: they take no fees from rich people coming before them; but when a poor man who has lost his all comes before them, the Sheriff gets a fee of £1, 1s. I think that is degrading to the Sheriff, and I would suggest that it should be abolished.

1391. Mr. Paterson.—Is it the poor man or his creditors who pay the £1, 1s.?—It is equally unpleasant, whichever it is.

1392. Dr. Barclay.—The fee is paid by one of the practitioners?—It is handed to me by the Sheriff-clerk, and I feel it rather a degrading proceeding.

Another matter which I would refer to, is the regulations as to leave of absence to the resident Sheriffs. At present these are very stringent. No Sheriff-substitute can go out of his district for more than a fortnight without leave from the Sheriff. If he grants leave, he is bound either to go to the county and do the work himself, or to appoint some one to do so. In practice, that substitute must be paid by the resident Sheriff, and that is practically an obstacle to any resident Sheriff getting a vacation of any length, except once in six or eight years or so. I think that might be relaxed. At present it is a grievance to some extent.

1393. The Chairman.—But you have proposed that there should be no principal Sheriff to do the duty?—I am speaking on the assumption that the present system is to be continued; and I think it might be provided that the principal Sheriff should come to the county during part of the vacation, and that the resident Sheriff should get a holiday. If the double office is to be abolished, it will be necessary that some provision for occasional leave of absence be made; and what I point at is, that the present limit of a fortnight at a time be somewhat extended. I do not complain of the annual allowance of six weeks in all.

1394. Mr. Clark.—Are not three fortnights in a year a tolerable holiday?—If one were allowed to take these fortnights together, or even to take two periods of three weeks each, I would not complain.

1395. Mr. Baxter.—Have you considered the propriety of strengthening the court of review within the court itself, by grouping the Sheriffs?—I have considered that; but it was found to work so ill in the Court of Registration Sheriffs, that I think it would not be expedient to revive it.

1396. The Chairman.—In what respect did it work ill?—Different decisions were given by different groups of Sheriffs in different parts of the country.

1399. Mr. Campbell.—It has been suggested that it might be convenient to vary the periods of vacation in the Sheriff Courts; have you anything to suggest as to that?—I think that might be done with advantage. The winter vacation is a month, which is rather long; the spring vacation is too short, and too early. This arose from a misapprehension, from thinking it necessary that the court should meet on 3d April, so as to call cases of removing from farms forty days before Whitsunday, which is not now necessary. It may be right to explain that the word vacation is not to be understood absolutely in the Sheriff Courts, as during vacation all criminal business goes on as usual, and much summary civil business is also done.

As to other local courts, I think the Commissary Court might well be amalgamated with the Sheriff Court, at all events so far as the clerks are concerned.

1400. The Chairman.—You think the same machinery might do for both?—Yes. As to the Justice of Peace Court, I may explain that I frequently sit as a Justice of the Peace; but, so far as I know, no civil cases are ever brought before the Justices of the Peace in Fifeshire, at least in the western district. Their jurisdiction, in practice, is confined to trying public-house cases, road cases, and poaching cases; and, on the whole, that works very well. The Justice of Peace Fiscal is also Chief Constable, and that raises a question which has been considered in some counties. With us it works, on the whole, well; but we have a particularly energetic and able Chief Constable. As a general rule, however, I think the Procurator-fiscal of Court should be a trained lawyer. I believe the change was made from motives of economy. The fees of the Justices' Fiscal pressed on the county; and when a Chief Constable was being appointed, the opportunity was taken of getting him to do the Fiscal's work without any additional salary. The Government Inspector of Police has reported against it several times, but the system still continues; and though it works well with us in practice, I think it is wrong in theory, and it only works well in practice from the excellence of the individual.

1401. Mr. Baxter.—Has he not involved himself in a number of actions of damages?—He got into an action of damages as Chief Constable in connection with a case in the eastern division of the county, but not in his character of Justice of Peace Fiscal. There has not been a single suspension since he was appointed Justice of Peace Fiscal.

1402. Dr. Barclay.—What is your opinion as to admitting the defender's oath in cases of paternity?—That is a very painful class of cases. There is perjury in almost every case on one side or the other; but I am not prepared to say that the remedy is to make the defender incompetent as a witness.

1403. Don't you think that the ends of justice were better served by the old law of semiplena, where the defender was judicially examined, but never could be a witness?—The law of semiplena was abolished before I came to the bar, so that I cannot speak as to that.

1404. The Chairman.—You think there is a risk of perjury?—That is so under the present system.

1405. Is that not an objection to the law which allows parties to be witnesses in their own cause?—It is.

1406. It is an objection to the new Evidence Law?—Yes; but the new Evidence Law is a great improvement on the whole, and I would not wish it altered in any respect.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

Henry Cowan Gray.

Henry Cowan Gray, Esq., examined.

1407. The Chairman.—You hold an official situation in Ayr?—Yes; I am auditor of the Sheriff Court of Ayr, and have been so since 1845. I have also been senior magistrate of Ayr for two years. I was Dean of Guild for five years, and I am at present agent for the Commercial Bank of Scotland.

1408. Have you been in practice in the Sheriff Court?—No.

1409. As auditor of the court, have you had occasion to observe the course of litigation, and the costs of litigation?—I have. I may state that, taking the printed note with which I have been furnished, I have jotted down a few remarks; and first, with reference to the constitution of the courts as consisting of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute, I have long been of opinion that the double Sheriffship should be abolished, and that it would be an improvement to have only one resident Sheriff. The present state of matters is far from satisfactory. The substitute does the principal work, and he is assisted by other substitutes who have an honorary appointment. These gentlemen have not been bred to the law, and are often employed in taking the declarations of prisoners, trying accused parties, and exercising other important functions for which they are not qualified. This is certainly objectionable; but the great objection to the double Sheriffship is, that an appeal from one judge to another does not inspire confidence and fosters litigation. An appeal, in my view, should always be to a plurality.

1410. Would you explain what you mean by the honorary Sheriffs?—They are gentlemen engaged in business, to whom a commission has been granted to act in the absence of the Sheriff-substitute without pay.

1411. Do you think that objectionable?—I do; they are easily accessible, and are called on when the Sheriff-substitute ought himself to be present.

1412. Are you of opinion that the duty of the Sheriff-substitute is not effectively performed?—I do not undertake to offer any opinion as to its not being effectively performed. I merely state what are facts. If the acting Sheriff-substitute is not in the way, what the clerk or the Fiscal immediately does is to send for one of these honorary substitutes to do his work.

1413. Do you allude to criminal matters?—Sometimes civil matters too, such as petitions requiring an instant warrant, which cannot be delayed.

1414. How would you remedy that?—I think it would be remedied very much if the Sheriff-substitute was obliged to give attendance in his chambers so many hours every day, when he is not engaged in court. In that case he would be found. But it is not so with us, and that is especially the case in Kilmarnock, the resident Sheriff-substitute there residing several miles from Kilmarnock.

1415. Are there any periods of the year when the Sheriff-substitute has a vacation?—During the recess he generally takes a short period of vacation.

1416. What do you call the recess?—The time the court is not sitting—two or three times in the year.

1417. How do you propose to deal with that?—There ought to be some party who would be able to take the Sheriff-substitute's place when he is necessarily absent.

1418. Who would that party be?—There might be a supernumerary, as there is, I believe, in connection with the Advocates-depute.

1419. Do you mean a paid officer?—Yes; one conversant with the administration of the law, and paid to supply the place of any of the Sheriff-substitutes who go away for recreation or otherwise when they get leave of absence. We have gentlemen, some of whom have been in business as merchants, and others as bankers, but not trained to the law, who act as these temporary substitutes.

1420. You think it would be better to have some person trained to the law, and paid for it?—I think so.

1421. Does the Sheriff take any part of the duty in the absence of the Sheriff-substitute on leave?—I am not aware of the Sheriff-principal coming to the county except at stated periods of the year, when he is required by Act of Parliament to hold courts. He also attends when the Circuit Courts are sitting, and at Registration Courts.

1422. You would still have a Sheriff-substitute residing in Ayr, I presume?—Yes.

1423. Where would the supernumerary reside?—I presume there would be no difficulty in having a supernumerary in Edinburgh, who would be sent to supply the place of the Sheriff-substitutes throughout Scotland when they were absent. I don't think there is sufficient work for two substitutes in one division of the county of Ayr.

1424. You think an appeal from a single judge to a single judge is not a good thing?—I don't think it a good thing; it does not give satisfaction or confidence.

1425. What would you substitute for it?—If the double Sheriffship were to be continued, I think it would be a very good thing to have three or four sitting in circuit, hearing appeals from different counties; but I should myself prefer a direct appeal to the Court of Session.

1426. As auditor of the court, can you give us an idea of the expense attendant upon an appeal to the Sheriff from the Sheriff-substitute?—It cannot be very great. There are simply the appeal and the debate, for which a certain fee is allowed. It costs not above £2 in some instances, or perhaps £2, 10s. at the outside.

1427. Mr. Baxter.—On both sides?—I speak of one side. It would be double that for both sides. The fee allowed for an appeal varies according to the amount in dispute.

1428. The Chairman.—If your suggestion were adopted, that two or three Sheriffs should hold a circuit, how would you distribute the business? What Sheriffs would hold the circuit from which the appeal would lie from the Sheriff-substitute at Ayr?—The counties of Wigtown, Dumfries, and Ayr lie contiguous to each other, and the Sheriffs of these three counties might be appointed the appeal court for these counties.

1429. Sitting in the different towns in which there are Sheriff Courts held?—Quite so.

1430. Would you have them to sit at stated periods?—I think so; and more frequently if the business called for it.

1431. Would that add to the expense of the appeal?—I don't see that it would.

1432.—What do you consider the particular advantages of such a court?—I don't advocate that court, because, as I have said, I prefer a direct appeal to the Court of Session; but it has this advantage, that you would have the opinion of three judges instead of one.

1433. And you would have that at a cheaper rate than going to the Court of Session, I suppose?—According to the present rate of expenses, I believe it would be cheaper.

1434. What are the duties which the supernumerary substitutes perform at present?—They take declarations of prisoners very frequently. They sometimes preside at the trial of prisoners.

1435. Summary trials?—Yes.

1436. Never at jury trials?—No. We have a supernumerary who is an advocate. I don't refer to him; I refer to the others. They frequently dispose of important summary petitions.

1437. What kind of petitions?—For interdict, it may be, where there is a very delicate question whether the interdict ought to be granted or not.

1438. You mean that they dispose of questions of interim interdict?—Yes; and they sign general warrants.

1439. What do you mean by general warrants?—Warrants upon petitions of everyday occurrence.

1440. Mr. Gordon.—Warrants of service?—Yes.

1441. Mr. Shand.—Mere orders of intimation?—Yes. I would consider them administrative more than anything else.

1442. These duties are never performed by such parties except in the temporary absence of the Sheriff-substitute?—I don't say that exactly. Of course the Sheriff-substitute is occasionally from home, and very properly so; but even when he is in town he may not be in his chambers, and the matter being urgent, the clerk takes the first he can get.

1443. What is the remedy which you propose to cure that particular evil?—I think it would tend very much to facilitate business if the substitute were obliged to be in his chambers a certain number of hours every day when he is not in court.

1444. The supernumerary substitute you speak of could not assist in that matter?—No; he could only be asked to do work when the Sheriff-substitute was absent, or perhaps engaged in other business, so that he could not undertake the examination of the prisoner. But I don't know that even that might be necessary.

1445. You don't mean that the supernumerary Sheriff should be sent for to Edinburgh unless for a period of time?—No; I thought you referred to those holding the honorary appointments.

1446. You would only call his services into requisition during vacation, when the Sheriff-substitute was away?—I suppose the Sheriff-substitute is like other people; he may sometimes be oppressed with work for the time, and it must just stand over till he is at leisure.

1447. Is there any time in either division of the county of Ayr that it would be necessary to send to Edinburgh for a supernumerary Sheriff-substitute, except when the resident Sheriff-substitute was away?—I should say that, generally speaking, there is nothing to hinder the resident Sheriff-substitute from undertaking the work of his division of the county.

1448. Do you mean that a supernumerary Sheriff should be kept, to go to all the different counties in Scotland during those periods of vacation when the Sheriff-substitutes were out of their counties?—I think that would be necessary if you abolish the double Sheriffship; but if you keep it up, there might be an arrangement made by which the principal Sheriff might come and relieve his substitute.

1449. How many such supernumerary Sheriff-substitutes do you think it would be necessary to appoint in order to undertake the work in summer?—I cannot give an opinion on that. It is matter of detail, which could easily be managed, I think.

1450. The period of vacation is the same in all the courts throughout Scotland?—I believe so.

1451. And that is the time at which all the substitutes, as a rule, take their holidays?—I am not aware what the other substitutes do, and I am not aware that our own substitute takes his vacation at that time.

1452. Would that not require a considerable number of supernumeraries to be sent from Edinburgh?—There would be no necessity for a supernumerary if the principal Sheriff were continued; but if that office were abolished, I think some arrangement should be made by which the duty should be done for the time.

1453. What kind of arrangement other than you have pointed at do you refer to?—You would require perhaps to have a number employed, paying them for the time they are engaged, and not merely one or two to supply the whole of Scotland. But there might be a difficulty in the working of it.

1454. Do you mean a number of persons resident in Edinburgh or resident in the district?—I would not confine it to Edinburgh. I think you might get gentlemen in practice as lawyers who might undertake the duties.

1455. Residing in Ayr or Kilmarnock?—Quite so.

1456. Then you think that a writer of standing resident either in Ayr or Kilmarnock ought to have an appointment of that kind, with payment for it, if the office of Sheriff should be abolished?—I would have either an advocate or a writer.

1458. Have you considered what payment would be adequate for the performance of such duties?—I have not. I think the Sheriff-substitutes are ill paid as it is.

1459. What do you think should be allowed in such a county as Ayr for the payment of such gentlemen as you speak of?—I should not like to put a figure on it; but it has always occurred to me as an anomaly, that County Court judges in England should be better paid than Sheriff-substitutes in Scotland.

1460. But what do you think ought to be paid to those legal gentlemen who should hold such offices as you have mentioned?—I suppose they are entitled meanwhile to £3, 3s. a day. I don't think that would be out of place.

1461. You would pay them by the day's work?—If it did not extend over a long period, or a sum might be paid for the discharge of the whole duty.

1462. But you have not considered that?—No, I have not. I never thought on the subject till the question was put to me.

1463. Are you aware of any other instance of an appeal from one judge to another judge in the United Kingdom?—There is the appeal from the Sheriff to the Lord Ordinary.

1464. Are you aware that there is such an appeal from the Vice-Chancellors and the Master of the Rolls to the Lord Chancellor?—I believe there is.

1465. Do you know how that works?—I do not. I suppose there is also a general appeal to the Home Secretary in almost every case.

1466. You mean in matters of administration?—Yes.

1467. Do you think that if the Sheriff, on appeal, should adhere to the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, it does not add weight to that judgment?—I think it does; but without appearing to be invidious, I may say that cases have occurred where there has been an appeal from what we would consider a superior to an inferior man, and hence there is not the same confidence in the judgment.

1468. If, on the other hand, the judge on appeal differs from the Sheriff-substitute, does not that give the party the means of judging with advantage whether the case is one in which he should incur the expense of an appeal to a superior court?—I should say generally, that where the Sheriff-principal adheres to the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, there is very little risk of its going further.

1469. Why?—Because you have got the opinion of two judges; whereas, when the judgment of the substitute is altered by the principal, it excites doubt and encourages litigation.

1470. Does it not rightly excite doubt?—Yes.

1471. And it gives a party better means of judging whether he should incur the expense of going further?—It encourages him to go further.

1472. Don't you think it is an advantage to a litigant that he should have that means of judging whether the case is worthy of being carried further, if the advantage is gained without great expense?—So long as you keep up the Sheriff-substitute that will be the case, but I don't think it is indispensable.

1473. Is it not an advantage?—It may be an advantage. He has a twofold decision there.

1474. Mr. Gordon.—How far is the Sheriff-substitute's residence from the town of Kilmarnock?—The Sheriff-substitute at Ayr resides in the vicinity of the County Buildings; the Kilmarnock substitute lives at Fairlie House, several miles from Kilmarnock.

1475. That is only three miles distant?—Three or four miles.

1476. Can you refer to any special case where inconvenience has resulted from the honorary substitute acting?—There is this inconvenience, that he has not been able perhaps to take up a particular case brought before him, and it has had to lie over. In most cases it is administrative, and he is not allowed to exercise much judgment except in summary trials.

1477. Do you refer to police offences, such as a Justice of the Peace could take up?—Yes.

1478. Or a bailie in a burgh?—In the burgh the Sheriff has no jurisdiction.

1479. But they are the same class of cases?—They are cases that may have been before Crown counsel, and are returned for trial; and the Sheriff-substitute may not be at hand.

1480. Are there many advocations from the judgments of the Sheriff-substitute in your courts?—I believe not recently.

1481. How many?—I could not say; but there are very few, I think.

1482. Then the parties almost invariably rest satisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff?—At present they do. There are exceptions, of course.

1483. Was it not so formerly—I mean within the last twenty years?—Old Mr. Bell was a very excellent judge, but he was pretty old before he retired, and he was succeeded by another very old gentleman; but since our present Sheriff was appointed, there have not been so many.

1484. Are you aware that the former Sheriff, Mr. Christison, was very highly esteemed as a lawyer?—There was not a gentleman who was more highly esteemed, and his judgments were almost invariably acquiesced in, I think,—at least generally speaking. I have no fault to find with either the one Sheriff or the other.

1486. Mr. Baxter.—When you say that the appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff is not satisfactory, do you take into account that the Sheriff-substitute had the making up of the record, and that he took the proof and saw the witnesses?—There is no question that that is a very great advantage to a judge in disposing of a case, and especially in disposing of evidence; but as regards law, it does not affect the question.

1487. You stated that the honorary Sheriff-substitutes take prisoners' declarations?—They do.

1489. Who conducts the declarations?—I am sorry to say that it is generally the Fiscal who puts the questions, and dictates the answers in presence of the Sheriff.

1490. Does the Fiscal dictate the answers under the supervision of the Sheriff?—He does. My nephew is Sheriff-clerk at the present moment; and I asked him before coming here if there was any change, and he tells me there is not.

1491. Do the honorary Sheriff-substitutes ever dispose of meditatione fugæ warrant cases?—I can't say, for my attention has not been called to that. I have no doubt that such a thing may have been done.

1492. Are you aware that it is an exceptional case to appoint as honorary Sheriff-substitutes gentlemen who are not lawyers, and that in most cases they are legal gentlemen, who are taken from the top of the profession?—I am aware of that, but I merely speak as regards my own county, and it is not so with us. None of them are connected with the profession.

1493. The Chairman.—You said that one of them was an advocate?—One of the honorary substitutes is an advocate, and he has frequently supplied the place of the Sheriff-substitute at Ayr when he was from home. I refer to Mr. Pettigrew Wilson. But there is not a single procurator that I am aware of in Ayrshire who holds a substitution.

1494. When you spoke of the Fiscal dictating the answers in taking prisoners' declarations, did you confine that to the case where the honorary substitutes were acting?—Not at all; and I have a remark upon that to make afterwards. It applies to both the regular and the honorary substitutes.

1495. Mr. Webster.—In both districts of the county?—I cannot speak as regards Kilmarnock. I can only speak to what has come under my own personal notice.

1496. Mr. Harrison.—Has it come under your own notice, that appeals are frequently taken from Sheriff-substitutes of large experience to Sheriffs-principal with little practical experience?—I think I answered that question already, when I stated that appeals were taken from superior to inferior judges.

1497. Have such cases come under your own notice?—I entertain an opinion myself, which is shared in by others, that we have had a substitute superior to the principal Sheriff. We had Mr. Sheriff Jamieson for a long time.

1499. How far does that carry you back? When was Mr. Bell appointed?—Before I was born, I suspect,—about 1816 or thereabouts. I believe he was a Sheriff for about fifty years.

1500. Is your experience confined to the sheriffdom of Ayrshire?—I can only speak from what I have seen in Ayrshire.

1501. Did the appeals to Mr. Bell come from a superior lawyer to an inferior lawyer?—I should not like to answer that question. I don't think I should pass an opinion as to whether the one was superior or inferior.

1502. But you hold that Mr. Bell was a lawyer of eminence?—As long as he was actively employed, there was no gentleman who stood more high as a lawyer throughout Ayrshire than Mr. Bell,—or throughout Scotland, I should say.

1503. Do you say the same of Mr. Christison?—I do.

1504. Mr. Christison was succeeded by the present Sheriff?—He was; and our Sheriff-substitute, Mr. Robison, is generally admitted to be a first-rate lawyer, and a very superior man.

1506. The Chairman.—What is the next matter to which you have to refer?—The next point in the notes is the jurisdiction with reference to limits. The jurisdiction might, I think, with propriety be extended, so as to embrace questions of heritage, questions of separation and protection of the wife's earnings on the husband's desertion, and provisions to be made to her under the Conjugal Rights Act; also questions of declarator, provings of the tenor, appointments of factors loco tutoris, of curators bonis, and factors or tutors to insane persons, trustees in lapsed trusts, etc. The proceedings in many of these are unopposed; but as matters stand at present, the heavy fees to counsel and agents in the Supreme Court is a great grievance.

1507. Would you make that extension in questions of heritage, without limit as to the value of the matter at issue?—No; I think, as regards actions of declarator, they ought to be limited to subjects involving, say £100, —subjects which it would be very expensive for parties to go to the Court of Session with.

1508. Would you have any limitation as to the other subjects which you think should be brought within the Sheriff's jurisdiction?—I should think that the same remark would apply to provings of the tenor.

1509. How do you apply the remark to them?—If a proving of the tenor of any particular deed referred to a subject of very considerable value, I would still confine it to the Court of Session. I would transfer it to the Sheriff only if it was a subject under £100.

1510. Mr. Baxter.—Would you allow the Sheriff to appoint curators bonis and factors?—Yes; and also factors and tutors to insane persons.

1511. The Chairman.—Would you apply any limit to that?—I don't know that it would be necessary in these cases. If they found caution in the usual way, to the satisfaction of the court, that is all that would be necessary.

1512. Would you apply that to all parties within the territory of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—Yes.

1513. Whatever might be the value of the estate involved?—Yes. The higher the value, the greater would be the amount of the caution.

1514. Would you enable the Sheriff to nominate persons resident beyond his jurisdiction to hold these offices?—I don't know that it would be of very great importance whether he was beyond his jurisdiction or not. He would be amenable to his jurisdiction, I presume; and at the present moment it frequently happens that parties are cautioners in advocations who are not within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff. The subject would be within the Sheriff's jurisdiction.

1515. Mr. Webster.—Suppose it was money?—I presume that the party for whom he was appointed curator being resident within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, that would be a sufficient ground for bringing the petition before the Sheriff.

1516. The Chairman.—How would the Sheriff exercise his jurisdiction over a party who was not resident within his jurisdiction?—I presume he would get the power as Sheriff to exercise jurisdiction over any one appointed by him, just as he has at present in other matters where he exercises his jurisdiction. The Sheriff should have as much power over him as if he were resident, in so far as obtempering his orders were concerned.

1517. Then you would extend the power of the Sheriff to persons beyond his jurisdiction?—Certainly I would, if he was appointed by the Sheriff.

1518. Mr. Webster.—Suppose a party had property in more counties than one?—In that case I think it would not be prudent to bring the matter before the Sheriff. It ought in that case to go to the Court of Session.

1519. Would you give the Sheriff the kind of power exercised at present by the Court of Session in regard to giving special powers to guardians to sell or burden property?—If it were a subject of small amount. I have known hardship to occur sometimes, from the inability of the parties to obtain these powers; but if the subject was very large, I question if it would be right.

1520. Mr. Baxter.—In small estates, do you think there would be any difficulty in the Sheriff obtaining a suitable person within his own jurisdiction?—None whatever. I don't see there should.

1521. Have you formed any opinion as to giving the Sheriff jurisdiction in heritage?—I cannot say that I have.

1522. Mr. Shand.—Have you known cases of hardship in your district, in reference to small heritable subjects—cottages and the like—where parties have been obliged to submit to great injustice from not being able to come to the Court of Session?—I cannot say that I can put my finger on a case, but I can fancy that the expense would perhaps eat up the whole subject.

1523. Have you not heard that made the subject of complaint?—I cannot at present recall any particular instance, but I know that it is the generally entertained opinion that hardship is suffered in such cases from the necessity for going to the Court of Session.

1524. The Chairman.—Have you formed any opinion as to jurisdiction in questions of legitimacy and divorce, and declarators of marriage?—These are rather serious matters, and I am not prepared to recommend the transfer of these cases to the Sheriff.

1525. Have you any observation to make on the Sheriff's jurisdiction in criminal matters?—I would be disposed to recommend that all cases in which imprisonment merely follows should be tried before the Sheriff. I would not give him the power of sentencing to penal servitude. I would leave cases involving that punishment to the Circuit Court judges or to the High Court of Justiciary.

1526. What do you mean by cases in which imprisonment merely follows?—Cases where imprisonment is the usual punishment. There are certain higher offences where imprisonment cannot be inflicted, such as murder and rape. I consider also that certain cases of forgery might come under that character, which I would leave to Crown counsel, as at present, to decide to what court they should be sent for trial when he examines the precognitions.

1527. You mean that if the Crown counsel who considers these precognitions is of opinion, from the aspect of the case, that it is one where the punishment should not exceed imprisonment, it ought in these circumstances to go to the Sheriff?—Decidedly so.

1528. And that neither the High Court of Justiciary nor the Circuit Court should deal with cases which are expected to result in imprisonment?—If the case is considered beforehand of a trifling nature, I presume it would not be brought before the Circuit Court, but still the Circuit Court might inflict punishment by imprisonment merely. It might turn out that the case was not so serious as Crown counsel was led to think it. But I think that all other cases in which imprisonment would be the natural punishment might safely be left to the Sheriff.

1529. Do you think that there is not a sufficient number of those cases which result in imprisonment sent to trial by the Sheriff?—I have seen cases brought before the Circuit Court which I considered much more trifling than some that were tried by the Sheriff.

1530. The public prosecutor has at present the power of sending cases to be tried by the Sheriff which he thinks ought to result in imprisonment?—He has.

1531. And he has the power of bringing them before the Circuit Court if he prefers it?—He has.

1532. And you think the Crown counsel should send to the Sheriff such cases as he thinks ought to result in imprisonment?—Yes.

1533. You say that you have seen more trifling cases tried before the Circuit than were sent to the Sheriff?—I entertain an opinion, from long observation, that there are many cases tried before the Circuit Court that might be as well sent to the Sheriff.

1534. I understood you to say cases of less gravity were tried at Circuit than some of those that were tried before the Sheriff?—I don't say that altogether, but I say that I have seen cases of more gravity tried before the Sheriff; or, I should rather say, I have seen cases brought before the Circuit that would not bear comparison in point of gravity with many that were brought before the Sheriff.

1535. Then you think that in these cases there was not a sound discretion exercised?—I have no opinion to offer about that. I don't at all blame the discretion of the Lord Advocate. I merely state my opinion that, without any harm to the administration of justice, many cases which are tried before the Circuit Court, might very safely be tried by the Sheriff.

1536. You think that cases ought to be more freely sent to the Sheriff?—I am not prepared to say that. I think they are pretty freely sent to the Sheriff.

1537. Then what is your view of the matter?—It is just what I have stated, that there are cases brought before the Circuit Court which might very safely be left to the Sheriff. I don't impugn the discretion of the Crown counsel in sending them to the Circuit Court, but such is a general observation that many people make,—that there might have been no Circuit at all, considering the cases tried there.

1538. And you think they would have been more properly sent to the Sheriff?—I think so.

1539. You measure that by the amount of punishment which was supposed by the public prosecutor to be adequate to the offence as it appeared on precognition?—I should not be disposed to put it generally, because I can fancy that a party might be accused of a crime, and that it was of the utmost importance that he should have the discretion to be tried in the superior court if he likes. Therefore I would not say that every case in which imprisonment might be the appropriate punishment should be sent to the Sheriff. I would still leave it discretionary with the Crown to order certain cases which might be punished by imprisonment to be tried before the Circuit Court or the High Court.

1540. Is that not the state of the law and the practice at present?—I am not aware.

1541. Is it not the practice to send to the Sheriff such cases as in the discretion of the Crown it is thought ought to go there?—It is; but I have repeatedly seen cases tried, and it is not my own observation only, which I believe would not have been tried at the Circuit, except for the fact that the Circuit happened to occur immediately after the cases were reported.

1542. Mr. Webster.—Did one of your former answers imply that you thought the prisoner should be consulted as to the tribunal that he should be tried before?—I think that in certain cases a prisoner ought to make a representation on that subject, and that the Crown should have it in its power to pass judgment on that representation.

1543. The Chairman.—Is there anything in the nature of the cases which you think ought to guide the Crown counsel in trying them before the High Court or the Circuit Court, rather than sending them to the Sheriff?—I should leave it to the Crown advisers to form their own opinion as to which would be the proper court to send them to in the circumstances.

1544. Has it frequently occurred in your experience, that cases are tried before the Circuit Court which you think ought not to have been tried there?—I don't say that there is anything wrong in so trying them. It is a question of the necessity of trying them before the Circuit Court. I think there would be no harm, but otherwise, in trying them before the Sheriff.

1545. What would be the advantage gained?—There would be a more expeditious trial if the case occurred immediately after the Circuit, because they could then be tried before the Sheriff at once, without lying in prison till the next Circuit.

1546. Is that not a matter which is taken into consideration now by Crown counsel?—I should think so.

1547. Have you any further remarks to make about criminal jurisdiction?—No.

1548. Mr. Baxter.—What is your objection to giving the Sheriff power to sentence to penal servitude?—It is rather a serious punishment to inflict, and I don't know that the public mind is altogether prepared to transfer that power to the Sheriff.

1549. Do you know that in England the Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, whether barristers or not, have that power?—I am aware of that.

1550. Suppose a man convicted of theft, and sentenced to a long period of imprisonment, would there be any difficulty in trying that man again for a similar offence?—No; but where it was a question of degree of punishment implying penal servitude, I should not like to give the Sheriff that discretionary power.

1551. Do you think that is the public mind?—I think that it is a pretty general opinion among those I have met with in my district, but I am not aware what the public mind is on the matter. There is, however, a very general opinion that the powers of the Sheriff might be very safely enlarged.

1552. Mr. Webster.—In criminal matters?—In criminal matters as well as in civil matters.

1553. Mr. Baxter.—What is your opinion as to trying before the Sheriff robberies where there is no great violence?—That would be almost like a case of common theft; but I have said already, that if penal servitude was implied as a punishment, I am not prepared to go the length of transferring such cases to the Sheriff.

1554. The Chairman.—What is your opinion as to writs, pleadings, and procedure in the Sheriff Court?—I am much pleased with the Sheriff Court Act of 1853, but I complain much of the way in which its provisions are enforced. Frequent delay takes place in the minuting of a defence; orders for the lodgment of papers are postponed indefinitely, and these papers received of consent; orders pronounced, and again and again continued, without any reason assigned but the consent of parties; cases about to sleep, frequently revived for the same reason; proofs also postponed to suit the convenience of parties. The Act should be more stringent in making what is discretionary imperative, and mulcting the delinquent in the unnecessary expense incurred by his own act. I have always thought it a hardship to impose upon the Sheriff the writing of proofs. Great expense would be saved by having a shorthand writer. I have frequently seen a proof adjourned when only half of the witnesses had been examined, and the same witnesses have attended three different diets.

1555. Your observations apply not to the law, but to the manner in which it is administered in the court at Ayr?—I think that the Act is a good Act, if it were more rigidly enforced, and parties failing to obtemper orders had a fine imposed upon them in the shape of expenses, and another order issued peremptorie; but that not being done, cases are kept on the roll for years.

1557. Do you think that delay brings a sort of scandal on the administration of justice?—I do. I know of cases that have been revived I don't know how often, and the only reason given is consent of parties. As I understand the Act, the judge ought to be satisfied that there is reasonable ground for the delay; but nothing appears in the interlocutor except 'Of consent of parties, revives the action;' and the consequence is, that clients complain, and the court is frequently blamed, where the fault is truly that of the agents.

1558. Mr. Shand.—Are proofs in your district taken up continuously, day after day, as in jury trials?—Not at all. That is done in some cases, but not generally.

1559. Are you aware that the Act of Parliament expressly requires that that should be done?—I cannot say that I am aware of that.

1560. Is it a common practice to adjourn proofs in Ayrshire?—It is a very common practice.

1561. And to adjourn them not till next day?—No, but to a day suitable to the parties. A proof lasts for a day; the Sheriff is engaged to-morrow, and cannot take it up; and in that case it is necessary to adjourn it.

1562. For how long is it adjourned?—It may be for eight days or a fortnight.

1563. How many such adjournments may take place as a common thing?—That depends altogether on the nature of the case. In some cases the proof is very short, and there is no adjournment; but where it is a heavy case, as we have had repeatedly, there have been three, or four, or five adjournments.

1564. Do you think that a number of these adjournments are unnecessary?—I don't say they are unnecessary. It is impossible that the Sheriff can undertake the manual labour; but if a shorthand writer were employed, all the witnesses could be examined at one sitting, instead of being obliged to go home, and return two or three times.

1565. Do you think the adjournments were unavoidable under the system which the Act of Parliament contemplates?—I think they arise in a great measure from the fact that the duty of taking the proofs is imposed upon the Sheriff.

1566. Do you know whether there are shorthand writers in Ayrshire capable of taking the proofs?—In Ayr there are; and there might be a shorthand writer appointed for the court.

1567. Mr. Baxter.—Could they read their notes to the witness after he has been examined?—Yes, they could read what they have taken down, and extend it afterwards.

1568. Do you mean that the Sheriff is to dictate the evidence to them?—The Sheriff ought to be satisfied that the evidence is taken down as it was given.

1569. Don't you think it a right thing that the agents should know what is taken down while it is being taken?—I think so.

1570. Then do you think it would be right that the Sheriff should dictate the evidence to the shorthand writer?—I don't know that that is of much consequence, but he might dictate it.

1571. Would that not abbreviate it?—Yes, a great deal of irrelevant matter might be put down unless the Sheriff dictated it.

1572. Mr. Webster.—How would the agents know what was taken down unless it was dictated by the Sheriff?—Well, it might be advisable to let the agents know.

1573. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think it an important thing that they should know?—I do.

1574. Mr. Webster.—Suppose that parties wished delay in a case, with the view or in the hope of a settlement, do you think that they should be deprived of the power of getting delay?—I do not, if it is with a view of settling the case; but I certainly object to the frequent revivals which take place at present.

1575. Suppose that an action is raised, well calculated to try the question between the parties, and proceedings have been taken, what is the advantage to the parties of having that action turned out of court, by statute or otherwise, and forcing them to bring a new action, and to go through a new set of proceedings?—I consider that an exceptional case. What I refer to is cases where delay by the parties takes place for delay's sake, without any object of settlement.

1577. Without the consent of their clients?—Yes.

1578. Mr. Baxter.—How do you know that they have not got the consent of their clients?—I cannot say what I am not privy to.

1579. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Is it not the interest of the parties to have a decision as rapidly and economically as possible?—No doubt of it; but I know that many cases are delayed simply for the convenience of the agents, without the knowledge of their clients, and that the court frequently gets the blame when it is the agents who deserve it.

1580. And the parties have no power themselves to force the case on?—They have no power.

1581. The Chairman.—Have you anything further to say upon that branch?—Nothing.

1582. Have you any observations to make in regard to criminal matters?—The recent change of having a double diet for jury trials has been a great improvement. I have no suggestion to make except as to the preliminary investigation by the Fiscal. A prisoner when under examination has no protection. He is, no doubt, cautioned that what he says will be used in evidence against him; but he is also told, that should he decline to answer, that will also tell against him.

1583. Mr. Baxter.—Is that so?—Invariably with us. The judge, in cautioning the prisoner, says: You are accused of such and such an offence, you are now at liberty to make any statement that you may think proper: what you do state will be taken down; and should you decline to answer, that also will be taken down.

1584. But not used against him?—His declaration will be used against him. If he refuses to answer, there is a certain inference drawn from that, and it does tell. Now, according to our mode of examination, the Fiscal proceeds at once to put questions seriatim to him, and dictates the answers. The questions are so put as more to entrap the prisoner, than to have a fair open statement of what he has to say; and all this is done without the accused being allowed the opportunity of consulting an agent. Generally speaking, a prisoner under examination is very excited, and far from collected; and he has, therefore, all the greater need of the assistance of an agent. When new facts have come out, I have seen a second declaration taken by the Fiscal, for no other object that I could see than to get the prisoner to contradict himself. There is certainly more protection for the accused when the regular Sheriff presides, but very frequently these declarations are taken by the honorary Sheriff-substitutes.

1586. The Chairman.—Do you state that with reference to the existing practice?—I was told before I came here by my nephew, who is Sheriff-clerk, that that practice still continues, and it was the practice when I myself was Sheriff-clerk.

1587. When did you cease to be Sheriff-clerk?—About eleven years ago. I hold a temporary appointment as Sheriff-clerk, but I don't act.

1588. The accused has the protection of the presence of the Sheriff?—Yes, the Sheriff is present, but he just allows the Fiscal to put the questions and to dictate the answers. Of course, if there was anything improper, the Sheriff would interfere; but I think it very objectionable in any case that the Fiscal should dictate. I think that should be done by the judge examinator.

1589. You say that the questions are frequently put with a view to entrap the prisoner?—Yes.

1590. But you say that if there is anything improper the Sheriff will interfere?—I mean that when the prisoner is brought up, he is told his offence, and that, if he has anything to say by way of explanation, that will be taken down; but the Fiscal, having a full knowledge of the facts, puts his questions in such a way that the party, being off his guard, gives an answer to inculpate himself.

1591. Mr. Orr Ewing.—The Fiscal puts the case as he knows the facts to be, and the prisoner admits the facts?—He may.

1592. That is not dictating an answer?—The Fiscal takes the answer as the prisoner gives it, but the question has been framed with a view of getting that answer.

1593. To elicit the truth?—I presume it is. I don't say otherwise; but when the answer is given, it is dictated by the Fiscal to the clerk.

1594. He interprets the language which the prisoner has used?—Well, we don't expect the language of the prisoner to be put down in his own words; but the answer, as put down, is the import of what the prisoner has stated.

1595. Mr. Webster.—Fairly?—Fairly.

1596. Mr. Morton.—Did you ever observe a prisoner object to the answer as dictated?—I have, and declining to open his mouth.

1597. But did you ever hear him object to the answer as dictated by the Fiscal? No. I thought you meant declining to answer the questions.

1598. The Chairman.—You think the answers are fairly put down?—Quite so. I don't profess for one moment to insinuate that there is any answer put down that is not in accordance with what the prisoner has admitted. It is putting the questions to the prisoner that I think an objectionable thing.

1599. Do you think it objectionable to put any questions to him?—I have always understood that no man should be called on to inculpate himself, and that, when he is brought before a judge, it is with the view of affording him an opportunity of giving an explanation as regards the particular offence with which he is charged, but that he is not to be questioned, as you would question a witness.

1600. Is he to be questioned at all?—Certainly.

1601. What kind of questions should be put to him?—I don't undertake to say. I am merely speaking generally.

Henry Cowan Gray.

1602. Do you object to putting any questions to him?—Certainly not.

1603. Mr. Baxter.—Do you object to the Fiscal putting any question to him?—No, I do not; but I think the judge examinator should attend to the answer that is given by the prisoner, and that he should dictate it, and not the Fiscal. That is all I mean to say.

1604. Mr. Webster.—Perhaps you would explain what you meant by saying that questions were put for the purpose of entrapping the prisoner?—I have already explained that the Fiscal, having a full knowledge of the case when the party is brought up, frames his question with the view, if possible, of getting a certain answer.

1605. The Chairman.—Your objection is, that the Fiscal dictates the answer, and not the Sheriff?—Quite so.

1606. But you say that if there is anything improper, the Sheriff protects the prisoner?—No doubt he would protect him.

1607. You said also that the answers are fairly dictated?—They are fairly dictated, inasmuch as they embody the statement of the party; but the Sheriff might put it in different words.

1608. Could he put it in better words than words which fairly embody the statement of the party?—If he embodied the statement of the party, it could not be put in better words; but there might be a slight variance.

1609. Would you take the words of the party?—I don't object to the words, provided they could be put down; but an illiterate man may not be able to use the words that should be put down. The judge examinator should exercise his judgment in that respect.

1610. What is the practical evil? You don't think it should be recorded in the very words of the party; you don't think that the Fiscal does anything else than dictate the substance of what the party says, and under the control of the Sheriff, who would check it if it was not so. Your objection, as I understand it, is that the dictation comes from the mouth of the Fiscal, and not from the mouth of the Sheriff?—Quite so. That is all I have to say on the matter,—that I think it is the Sheriff that should dictate, and not the Fiscal.

1611. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think that there is a danger that the prosecutor or Fiscal, dictating the answer, may in some slight degree colour the answer so as to suit his own purpose as prosecutor?—I have always thought that there is a tendency on the part of the prosecutor to make it almost a personal matter to obtain a conviction, and that there might be a gloss given to the statement; and it is to prevent that, that I think the Sheriff ought to dictate.

1612. The Chairman.—With regard to review in civil matters, have you anything additional to state?—I should prefer a direct appeal from the Sheriff to the Court of Session; or, if the double Sheriffship is not abolished, I think there should be circuit courts consisting of three Sheriffs.

1613. Do you think there should be an appeal from them?—I am not prepared to say that I am favourable to an appeal from them.

1614. Would you give a party his choice of going to the three Sheriffs, or of going to the Court of Session?—I had not thought of a court of appeal of three Sheriffs. My view was that there should be an appeal from the Sheriff direct to the Court of Session; but if the Sheriffs are to be continued, I think parties ought to have the power of going to the Court of Session if they prefer it.

1615. Do you think that a party should have the power to take his case from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session before it is finally disposed of by the Sheriff; as, for instance, under the 40th section of the statute, which enables a party, before proof is taken, to have his case removed to the Court of Session?—I am not familiar with that section of the statute; but if the double Sheriffship is to be continued, I think it is right that the party should take the opinion of the Sheriff before going to the Court of Session.

1616. Have there been no cases in your time brought from the Sheriff Court under the 40th section of the Judicature Act?—I am not prepared to say. I am not familiar with it.

1617. But your opinion is, that if there is a Court of Sheriffs, the party should have his choice of going to the Court of Session?—I think so.

1618. Mr. Webster.—Would you give that power to the party who had lost before the resident Sheriff, or would you require that both parties should fix on the future tribunal?—It is the losing party that takes the appeal.

1619. The Chairman.—Then he makes his choice of courts?—Yes.

1620. Do you think the other party has no interest in that?—He has an interest; but the practice hitherto has been for the losing party to advocate the cause; and at the present moment he chooses whether he is to go into the First or Second Division.

1621. But he may be sent to the other Division?—Yes. The question put to me is one which I have not thought about.

1622. What is your opinion as to review in criminal matters?—Where a party can show that he has not had a fair trial, he ought to have some redress; but I am not prepared to say what that should be. A review seems almost impracticable, unless full notes of the evidence are preserved, which in summary cases is now rendered necessary. I don't see how there can very well be a review in cases in which notes of evidence are not taken.

1623. Mr. Webster.—What would be your test of a case having been fairly tried?—If a party was brought up without previous warning, and had not been allowed to get an agent, I think there would not be a fair trial there; or if there was certain evidence which he wished to adduce, which had not been received. I know that among the profession there seems to be an opinion that there should be review; but I think there is a difficulty as to that, in consequence of notes of evidence not being preserved.

1625. Mr. Baxter.—Is there no appeal to the Circuit in jury trial?—I am not aware that I ever knew of any appeal in a jury trial.

1626. Do you know whether it is competent?—I cannot answer that question.

1627. The Chairman.—What have you to say upon the matter of costs?—The costs in Sheriff Court procedure are sometimes very excessive, and, but for the different steps which require to be taken, might be considerably lessened. A judge has a great deal in his power in this respect. I have known processes dragged along for upwards of two years, when one-fourth of the time would have been more than sufficient for exhausting the whole points at issue.

1628. What do you suggest?—I have already spoken about enforcing the Act of 1853, and that if orders were obtempered within a short time, instead of being frequent continuations or revivals, the expense would be considerably less than it is; and it would be considerably less if some mode were devised by which all the witnesses could be examined at one diet, which could be done if a shorthand writer were employed.

1629. Mr. Webster.—In many cases, would shorthand writers not add materially to the expense of a proof?—I don't know that it would. It would expedite business very much.

1630. Are there not many cases in which there are only two witnesses or so?—In affiliation cases there are sometimes only two or three witnesses, but sometimes there are long proofs. I don't say that in every case I would have a shorthand writer. I would only have it where the proof was to be pretty long.

1631. Mr. Orr Ewing.—And where the parties themselves wished it?—Yes. There would be no great hardship in the Sheriff taking the evidence of two or three witnesses; but when he has to write, day after day, a long proof extending to eighty or a hundred pages, it is very exhausting.

1632. And all Sheriffs have not the same facility of taking proofs?—No.

1633. Mr. Shand.—Can you state what is the average expense of a litigated case upon a proof in the Sheriff Court of Ayr, up to the point of the final decision by the Sheriff-principal?—That depends in a great measure on circumstances. There may be frequent debates, and every debate implies a fee of 30s. or £2; but in an ordinary case, where there is nothing out of the way, I should say the expense would be from £20 to £25.

1634. That includes the proof?—Yes. I recollect a case about the sale of a piano, where the expense came to £70.

1635. Laying aside exceptional cases?—Well, I think from £20 to £25 is the average expense which the party who gains the case would obtain from his opponent. Of course the expenses are double that. I speak, however, at random, as I have not turned my attention to that subject.

1636. The Chairman.—Do you think that costs are at all increased by the examination of an unnecessary number of witnesses?—I cannot say that that is my experience.

1637. Have you anything to say as to the privileges of agents?—I think it would be a great improvement if, instead of separate faculties, the whole legal practitioners in Scotland were admitted under the same regulations, with equal powers and privileges. The separate faculties might be retained so far as affects property belonging to them.

1638. Would you extend these privileges to practising before the Court of Session?—To act as agents I would, but not as pleaders.

1639. Mr. Webster.—You are aware that the custom is, that the agent borrows papers from the clerk to the process. How would you manage the custody of the proceedings where the agent was not resident in Edinburgh?—We have a regulation in the Sheriff Court, that no agent resident in the country shall be allowed to obtain possession of the process. It must be borrowed by a party resident in Ayr. I suppose the same would be the case in Edinburgh. An agent resident in Edinburgh must borrow it; and if he parts with it to a person in the country, he is responsible.

1640. Mr. Harrison.—Why would you propose not to permit agents to act as counsel if their clients were satisfied to employ them?—I don't see any great objection to their acting in course of time, but I question if you have a class of men qualified to take that position at present.

1641. Would there be any harm in leaving it to the client to judge?—None at all, if it was permitted.

1642. Mr. Shand.—Do you think that the bar would maintain its present standard in regard to legal learning and skill in pleading, or that the bench would have the same assistance as they presently have in the decision of causes, if country agents were to plead their cases in the Supreme Court?—Well, we have been always accustomed to look to the bar as possessing very superior talent, but we in the provinces sometimes think that we have got men who could plead fully as well.

1643. You have scarcely answered my question?—It is matter of opinion. I would not like to lower the standard. I would rather be in favour of keeping it up, and having a higher class of men in the Supreme Court.

1644. Do you think that what you have suggested would have a tendency to lower the standard?—I rather think it would.

1645. Mr. Harrison.—Even if clients were permitted to employ procurators from any part of the country, would they not in important cases choose men who have had large experience, and who were in practice before the Supreme Court?—Even if permission was granted, I don't suppose that many of the country practitioners would ever think of coming to plead before the Court of Session, because the remuneration would not cover their time and trouble. If they had the power simply to act as agents, it is all I would care for.

1646. The Chairman.—Are you of opinion that any great advantage would be gained by allowing them to come with their cases to the Court of Session?—There would be no great advantage so far as pleading is concerned; but I think it would be an advantage that a country agent should be allowed to put himself in communication with an advocate, instead of being forced to employ a second party as a medium.

1647. Do you think it is an advantage in the Supreme Court to have a separation between the duties of agents and counsel?—I do.

1648. You are aware that those very clever pleaders whom you have talked of as being in the local court might pass advocate and come to the bar of the Supreme Court if they chose?—I am aware that it is open to any man who thinks he has the qualifications to apply for admission.

1649. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that agents in any inferior court should have exclusive privileges, and that they should prohibit agents from practising in their courts who have not served a special apprenticeship to members of their body, and paid them large sums of money?—There should be equal rights and privileges to all the faculties.

1650. You think there should be no exclusive privileges?—I think so.

1651. Mr. Webster.—Do you know whether the training requisite to enable an agent to practise in the Court of Session is exactly the same, or is higher than the training requisite for qualifying to practise in the inferior courts?—I am not aware what the training is. A certain apprenticeship must now be served by every one in a solicitor's office before he can pass as a procurator. I may be wrong, but I should fancy that the same training is sufficient to enable him to pass as a Writer to the Signet.

1652. If there be a difference, would you diminish what is requisite for a practitioner in the Court of Session to what is required in the country; or would you raise what is required in the country to what is requisite in the Court of Session, before enabling procurators to practise there?—I am not aware of the difference, but I think that the qualifications which a country practitioner now requires are quite sufficient to enable him to do anything that might be looked for from him in the superior court.

1654. Can a solicitor or Writer to the Signet not appear before the Sheriff?—An agent in a superior court can appear in any inferior court—in sequestrations, for instance.

1655. Mr. Webster.—Is that not solely under the Bankrupt statute?—But at the present moment every faculty has certain peculiar privileges of its own.

1656. Mr. Harrison.—But in any special court there is no distinction between agents and counsel?—A procurator before a Sheriff Court of another county has no right to appear before the Sheriff Court of our county.

1657. Nor has a Writer to the Signet or a Solicitor before the Supreme Courts any right to appear as a procurator in the Sheriff Court of Ayrshire?—I believe not. We have two Writers to the Signet in our faculty, and they required to be admitted, but the production of their certificate was sufficient to obtain admission.

1658. With a payment?—We had no fees then.

1659. That was according to the rule of your faculty?—Yes, at that time.

1660. The Chairman.—Are there any other points on which you have any remarks to make?—The Debts Recovery Act is comparatively inoperative, only 40 cases or so having been raised in the southern division of Ayrshire since the Act came into operation in October 1857. It should be extended to embrace all debts, arising from whatever source, under £50. The cause of its being inoperative is that the faculty at Ayr have agreed not to take employment under it, in consequence of the fees not being remunerative. Only the party himself, or one of his family or tenants, or a procurator, can take out a summons; and as no procurator will act, the consequence is that the procurator still brings his action into the ordinary court. Merchants from a distance are practically shut out from availing themselves of its provisions.

1661. What would put the Act into operation in Ayrshire?—Well, I suppose there would be nothing wrong in compelling the faculty to take employment under an Act, without leaving it to their discretion whether they would do so.

1662. How would you enforce that?—I should think the Sheriff has the power of issuing an Act of Sederunt, or the Court of Session might do so. The Sheriff may issue rules for the regulation of his own court; and if a party will not take employment, the Sheriff has the power of suspension.

1663. Mr. Baxter.—What is the reason why the procurators will not take employment under the Act?—Because the fees are not remunerative.

1664. Do you think it right to compel a man to work for unremunerative fees?—I think there ought to be a table of fees sanctioned by the Court of Session, instead of embodying the fees in an Act of Parliament. I think the agents ought to get remunerative fees.

1665. The Chairman.—You think they are not remunerative at present?—I don't know that they are in some instances. I think the work imposed is much greater than the fees remunerate for.

1666. Do you think there is anything wrong in the principle on which the remuneration is regulated by that Act?—I don't know on what calculation the fee was fixed.

1667. But I speak of the principle?—I see nothing wrong in putting a sum into an Act of Parliament, provided it has been fairly calculated beforehand that the fee is remunerative; but if it is not remunerative, there ought to be a remedy.

1668. The principle of the fee under the Debts Recovery Act is not to remunerate according to each piece of work, but to give a slump fee?—Yes, a slump sum to cover the whole case.

1669. Do you think that is a wrong principle?—I do. No judge can tell beforehand the ramifications of a case. There may be a great deal of extra trouble, and there is no provision in the Act to pay for that extra trouble.

1670. Then you think the principle of that is wrong?—I do.

1671. Is there any power in the Act to enable the Court of Session to revise the fees?—I don't know that there is.

1672. You were not aware of this clause, 'The Court of Session shall be, and is hereby authorized and empowered, after due inquiry, by Act or by Acts of Sederunt, from time to time to make such alterations, by way of increase or decrease, as to said court shall seem needful, in the fees or dues hereby authorized to be taken, or to frame a new table or tables of fees,' and so on?—I was not aware of that clause.

1673. But you think that not only the scale, but the principle of the charge, ought to be altered?—I think so.

1674. Mr. Harrison.—Are the procurators a numerous body in Ayr?—They are; I think there are about twenty-four of them.

1675. Have they united to refuse to work the Debts Recovery Act?—I understand the resolution was adopted, with two or three dissenting; but, generally speaking, they all decline to take employment under that Act.

1676. Do those who dissented take employment under it?—I believe there is no employment by any of them under it. I have made inquiry, and I find that the cases brought have been almost all cases of decrees in absence. I believe that the practice differs very much, and that in Glasgow summonses are issued to all and sundry. I believe that is also done in Kilmarnock; but at Ayr they don't issue them except to the party himself, his clerk, a member of his family, or to a procurator.

1677. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Does the faculty prevent individual members from taking up these cases?—I believe that, speaking generally, every case which might be brought under that Act is brought in the ordinary court in the usual way, and conducted by pleadings.

1678. In fact, there is a trades' union that prevents individual members from acting independently?—I merely state the fact, that they refuse to take employment under the Act.

1679. Mr. Campbell.—Are you aware that the Sheriff has power under the Act to check that, by refusing to award more expenses in any case which might competently be brought under the Debts Recovery Act, than would have been incurred had that course been followed?—I am not aware. I merely mention that the faculty refuse to take employment under it, as the fees are not remunerative.

1680. Mr. Orr Ewing.—And they have prevented individual members from taking them up?—I don't say they can prevent them, but I suspect that those who dissented would incur their disapprobation if they took employment.

1681. The Chairman.—Have you anything further to state?—The Small Debt Act, if extended to sums under £50, would be more beneficial, with a proviso that when agents were admitted they shall be allowed remunerative charges according to a table of fees to be sanctioned by the court. As at present, I know of merchants who would rather lose their debt than go to the Small Debt Court. Adjournments will sometimes extend over six months. The delay is thus vexatious and expensive; and the expenses, even when the pursuer has been successful, have sometimes exceeded the amount decerned for. The Sheriff at Ayr takes notes of all the evidence, and in trifling cases this will sometimes occupy the most of a day. Should such an exclusion as I have referred to be adopted, I would not recommend an appeal where matters of fact only are concerned; but it should be allowed on questions of law in a special case to be stated by the judge, if asked for at the time.

1682. I don't quite understand your statement as to extending the Small Debt Court jurisdiction to £50, which is the limits of the Debts Recovery Act?—It is in lieu of the Debts Recovery Act.

1683. Would you abolish the Debts Recovery Act?—I think we could do without it if there was an extension of the small debt jurisdiction to the sum allowed by the Debts Recovery Act. Under the Small Debt Act, though agents are allowed, there is no scale of fees; and I think that where agents are allowed, and they ought to be allowed at the discretion of the Sheriff, they should be remunerated by a scale of fees to be fixed by the Court of Session.

1684. Then you would just have one Act applicable to all cases up to £50, instead of two Acts?—Yes.

1685. You would amalgamate these two Acts, you would allow agents to practise in the Small Debt Court, and you would fix a scale of fees?—Yes.

1686. Mr. Webster.—Would you have any record of the defence and of the reply?—At present there is a book kept containing a record of the cases, and the judgment of the Sheriff. There would be no record otherwise.

1687. Where the pursuer's case in the summons is that I owe £20 for clothes furnished, and the defence is, 'There is a receipt for the money,' would you have any record of the matter in issue?—That perhaps might be necessary in the pleadings afterwards. There would be a debate at a future stage, and it would be necessary perhaps to have a short record.

1688. The Chairman.—Then you would have a statement of the case by the Sheriff?—I don't know that that is necessary in the Small Debt Court.

1689. But in a claim of £50?—I don't anticipate any appeal except on the law, so that I don't see much necessity for any record. It is to be presumed that the procedure is very summary.

1690. You propose to investigate the fact?—Quite so.

1691. Would you have no record of what the fact was that you were going to investigate?—Under the Debts Recovery Act there is some such provision as that; and I see no objection to such a clause as there is there being extended to small debt cases, extending it to all kinds of cases up to £50.

1692. Does that not come more to extending the principle of the Debts Recovery Act to sums below £12?—It is more extending it to sums up to £50, arising from whatever cause.

1693. Your proposal would make a considerable innovation on the Small Debts Act?—It would.

1694. Perhaps even more than it would do on the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes.

1695. But the substance of what you wish to get at is, that all debts under £50 should be recovered in a certain summary manner, and without distinction as to the amount of them?—Quite so.

1696. Mr. Webster.—And without any appeal except on a point of law on a case stated?—Quite so.

1697. The Chairman.—And without any record of the evidence?—If the Sheriff was called on to state a case, he would require to keep a note to enable him to make it up. I suppose he would state the law as applicable to the case before him.

1698. Would you have any record of the evidence?—I think not. I would anticipate a summary procedure altogether.

1700. Would you give the parties power to require a note of the evidence to be taken?—I don't see that there would be any necessity for that, if there was to be no appeal. I would allow no appeal in sums under £50, except on questions of law, and in a case to be stated by the Sheriff at the time.

1701. You would allow no appeal as to the admission or rejection of evidence?—I would anticipate that it would be such a case as the Sheriff at present requires to prepare for the Court of Session under the Registration Act.

1702. Would you give the Sheriff any power, in cases of difficulty, to transfer them from that roll to the ordinary roll?—I should not like to deprive the Sheriff of that discretion.

1703. It is not for the benefit of the Sheriff, but for the benefit of the parties?—If the parties required, and made a joint request to the Sheriff, I don't see that there would be any hardship at all in granting that request. But unless it were a general point of law that might affect cases of much larger amount, I don't see any necessity for remitting to the ordinary court.

1704. Do you think it would be a satisfactory thing to determine questions of the value of £50 in that summary way?—Compared with the evils which presently exist, I think it would be preferable, and give more satisfaction.

1706. And the evils that you allude to are the evils existing in Ayr, where the Debts Recovery Act is not put in force?—The evils I refer to are the evils connected with litigation in the ordinary court for sums up to £50. I would get rid of these, and have a more summary procedure by which a pursuer would obtain a decree much more quickly.

1707. Can these be got rid of more speedily under the Debts Recovery Act than in the ordinary court proceedings?—I believe so; but I have not seen the Debts Recovery Act in operation.

1708. But the Debts Recovery Act is intended to provide for a speedy decision of certain cases up to that amount, though in Ayr you don't avail yourselves of it?—Not generally. There have been forty cases since the Act came into operation, but these were almost all decrees in absence.

1709. The reason of its not being resorted to is, that the practitioners don't consider the table of fees remunerative, and that they have resolved not to act under that statute?—Yes.

1710. Have you considered the statute yourself?—I have looked at the clauses with reference to the cases intended to be brought under it. I think it ought to be extended to cases of every kind under £50.

1711. Mr. Webster.—What proportion of the industrial community in Ayrshire would have cases involving so large a sum as £50?—Do you mean the working classes?

1712. Yes?—Very few, I should say.

1713. Then the remedy of going to other courts would be limited to a very few?—Comparatively speaking; but there is a most important section that are deprived of it,—merchants, for instance, dealing with traders.

1714. The Chairman.—Have you any further observations to make?—I have been a magistrate for two years, Dean of Guild for five, and I have had experience in the Justice of Peace, Bailie, and Police Courts. I would be disposed to abolish all Justice of Peace and Bailie Courts, and in room of them have stipendiary magistrates. The assessor in these courts is virtually the judge. Justices of the Peace, by allowing themselves to be canvassed beforehand, subject themselves to influences which destroy their impartiality. I would still retain the Justices of the Peace to take affidavits, or even to commit a party to prison until examined. A stipendiary magistrate having the fear of dismissal before him, would act more uprightly. It is notorious that Justices of the Peace are frequently canvassed to go and support a case before they know its merits or have heard the evidence; and certainly, when the avenues of justice are interfered with in that way, we cannot expect that these parties will act very impartially.

1715. Do you allude to cases of debt or to cases of crime?—I have seen various cases where there has been a complete canvass beforehand with reference to the Quarter Sessions, and the court has been crowded by gentlemen who have been got, through personal influence, to support a particular party.

1716. What class of cases do you refer to?—To road cases especially. I remember one road case which was litigated very keenly not long since in the Petty Sessions. It was brought before the Quarter Sessions, and a canvass went on there.

1717. Mr. Gordon.—Was it as to shutting up a road?—It was as to how wide the road should be.

1718. Mr. Shand.—Is it so in licensing cases?—In poaching cases and licensing cases in particular.

1719. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would you transfer the power of licensing public-houses to a stipendiary magistrate?—I certainly think so. I don't think gentlemen in business should be entrusted with that.

1720. Do you think a stipendiary magistrate would have the feelings of the community so much at heart in granting licences as the Justices?—I expect he would ascertain the feelings of parties, and give them an opportunity of being heard before him, and then form an impartial judgment.

1721. Do you think the public are dissatisfied now with the action of the Justice of Peace Court in licensing public-houses?—I think the public generally are dissatisfied with the mode in which licences are granted.

1722. You would have a stipendiary magistrate to grant licences?—Either a stipendiary magistrate, or, if the Sheriff is not overwrought, I would transfer it to him.

1723. Would you not think it preferable to allow the Excise to do it, as in England?—I would not consider it preferable, but I would take any person but the Justices of the Peace, as the thing is at present administered.

1724. Are you aware that it is objected that the system in England is far inferior to the system in Scotland?—That may be; but I know that, according to the way in which it is wrought in Scotland, after a licence is refused, there is a mode of application by which the Excise will give a permit for a certain time, so that the Justices' decision is virtually disregarded.

1725. Do you allude to Ayrshire?—No; I find that it prevails generally. I have studied the subject, and corresponded with parties, and I find that we are no worse than our neighbours.

1726. Then you think that exists all over Scotland?—I believe so.

1727. The Chairman.—Do you think the Justices are too lax in granting licences, or too rigid?—I think they are wrought upon by personal influence too much. In the majority of cases they are too lax, but in some cases they are disposed to be rigid.

1728. Are there some who are against licensing at all?—No, but they are perhaps much more stringent in granting a licence, and others again are more easily influenced to grant the licence. Very frequently it is a personal matter in a great measure.

1729. Mr. Baxter.—And there is a canvass beforehand?—Yes; and parties brought up specially to vote in a particular direction before they have heard the merits of the case.

1730. The Chairman.—Do you think there is any risk, if there was a stipendiary magistrate, that the wants of the community would not be so well known or understood as when the Justices from different parts of the county deal with the matter?—I don't think so. I have a very decided opinion that a gentleman appointed by the Crown, whether a stipendiary magistrate or the Sheriff-substitute, would do the work much more satisfactorily to the public.

1731. There are persons who are opposed to granting any licences, and there are associations for the purpose of promoting that state of matters. Do you think there is any risk that a stipendiary magistrate might take up one view or take up the other, and be guided by his own notions of general public utility more than by the immediate wants of the district or the desire of the community?—I don't think so. I may state for myself that I am not a teetotaller, neither am I opposed to licensing. At one time I entertained the opinion that almost every one should get a licence, but I think that has proved elsewhere to be productive of bad consequences. I think that a sound discrimination should be used in granting licences; and should a stipendiary magistrate, in the case which your Lordship has supposed, attempt to refuse licences where the general public wished to have them, the remedy would be, upon a complaint being lodged, he should be dismissed or reprimanded.

1732. Mr. Orr Ewing.—In the event of his being desirous to grant too many licences, what would you do?—A complaint would be made in the same way.

1733. Would you still give the public power to remonstrate against the granting of too few or too many licences?—In every case I would allow the public to make a representation, and it would take place in open court.

1734. And you would bind the stipendiary magistrate to take into consideration the wants of the district?—Quite so.

1735. Would you tie him down to a certain number of licences to a certain population?—That would not work in every case. Ayr is a county town, and requires more public-houses than for the same population elsewhere. If you measure the public-houses according to the population, you would say that we are a drunken town; but on market and fair-days the public require accommodation, and hence there are more public-houses than the population of the town requires. But in country places, where there is no great demand, I think the population and the character of the population ought to be taken into consideration.

1736. Supposing the stipendiary magistrate was a teetotaller, and took a very stringent view in granting licences, would it not be a dangerous thing to give him the full power of refusing to grant them?—I would not give him power to act on his own individual whims in that matter. There should be a law stating that there ought to be public-houses within reasonable distances from each other, for the accommodation of the public, and the stipendiary magistrate should not have power to refuse licences altogether.

1737. You would put him under statutory obligation as to the number of public-houses?—He should be obliged to administer the law.

1738. But what would you make the law?—I would make it that he should not have the power to deny licences right and left, but that the public ought to have certain accommodation. But if you take population exclusively, you would go wrong; sometimes it is a particular kind of population, and it would be wrong to give them too many public-houses.

1739. Mr. Shand.—Have you anything to say as to Dean of Guild Courts?—Dean of Guild Courts are unknown to us. I had not one during the five years I was Dean. The Guildry meet once a year and elect a Dean, with the view of giving the Chairman of Works in the Council the qualification for acting as a Justice of Peace or Commissioner of Supply. The powers formerly exercised by the Guild Court are now exercised by the Police Commissioners under the Police Act for Scotland.

1740. The Chairman.—What is done as to buildings?—We have the power under the Police Act, as regards buildings, to see that the street is kept in a line. If a house is taken down, we have the power to put any new building back to the line of the street. All these powers, formerly exercised by the Dean of Guild Court, are embodied in the Police Act.

1741. Mr. Gordon.—Do you refer to the General Police Act of 1862?—It is the General Police Act for Scotland—not Mr. Lindsay's Act, but the prior one.

1742. You have adopted it?—In Ayr, but not in the suburbs.

1743. The Chairman.—Have you Burgh Courts?—We have not such a thing as a Bailie Court; it used to be held by the magistrates appointed by the Town Council, but the powers are now transferred to police magistrates, and it is in our character as police magistrates that we sit as bailies.

1744. Do you try offences?—Yes; all offences under the Police Act to which I have referred.

1745. Is that satisfactory?—I have included police magistrates or bailies under the category of Justices of the Peace. I would have a stipendiary magistrate or Sheriff-substitute to try all these cases. At present the assessor is virtually the judge.

1746. Mr. Baxter.—You have no Burgh Court for civil cases?—No, not now. The only other matter is as regards cases of aliment,—parties imprisoned for debt, and applying for aliment under the Act.

1747.—The Sheriff has a cumulative jurisdiction with you in regard to that?—Quite so.

1748. The Chairman.—Have you anything more to say?—I am not conversant with, and therefore not particularly qualified to speak as to the Court of Session; but generally we complain much of the hardships arising from cases of small amount being brought in the Court of Session instead of the Sheriff Court; and it would perhaps be advisable that some remedy should be applied, to the effect that the parties bringing cases, say under £100, into the Court of Session, should only get such expenses as they would have received had their action been brought in the Sheriff Court.

1749. Mr. Gordon.—Is that not the rule at present, under the Act of 1853, limiting the sum to £25?—Yes; but beyond £25, and up to £50, you can bring them into the Court of Session.

1750. But, by the Debts Recovery Act, is it not provided that you shall not recover more expenses than you would under that Act?—I cannot speak to that. That Act, as I have said, is a dead letter with us.

JOHN DOVE WILSON, Esq., examined.

1751. The Chairman.—You are a member of the bar?—Yes.

1752. How long have you been so?—Eleven years.

1753. You are Sheriff-substitute of Kincardineshire?—Yes; I have been so for the last seven years.

1754. There is only one locality of a court in that county, I believe?—Yes; at Stonehaven.

1755. You are the only Sheriff-substitute in Kincardineshire?—Yes.

1756. Have you any observations to make, or opinion to give, as to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitutes?—I don't understand that question as referring to the matter of appeal. But it seems to me that the constitution of the court, by which there are two persons with the powers of judge ordinary, one of them employed to do the duty regularly, and the other with the power of interfering in it at any stage, is not good, and that there ought to be but one person with the powers and duties of doing the work of judge ordinary.

1757. What are the evils that you think arise from the interference that you talk of?—I think that it lowers the position of the person who is regularly charged with doing the duty of judge ordinary. I think that our position suffers materially from the uncertainty attaching to it. I consider that it is a bad thing that the resident judge ordinary should be liable to be superseded in his duties at any moment. And, when you look to the occasions on which the resident judge is actually superseded, the thing is even worse. The practical result at present is, that the resident judge ordinary gets all the work of judge ordinary, while the non-resident judge gets all the honours of the office. I think the present system is bad in this further respect, that a person is put at the head of it, with the duty of judge ordinary, who never in practice discharges any of the duties. In so far as these duties are concerned (and frequently in so far as any kind of duty is concerned), he is almost a pure sinecurist; and it has a bad effect upon the whole system, to put at the head of it a person, having nominally duties to perform, but who does not perform them. There is a tendency in the whole Sheriff Court system for one person to throw the duty upon the other. The Sheriff throws all the work of judge ordinary upon the Sheriff-substitute; the Sheriff-clerk often throws as much of his work as possible upon the Depute-clerk; and the Fiscal often throws as much as he can upon the assistant-fiscal. That, of course, does not happen as a rule, but there is a tendency to do it; and it is done to a far greater extent than the public interest justifies. It seems to me, further, that as long as there are two persons with the power of interfering with the duties of judge ordinary, you never can hope to have a permanent settlement of this Sheriffs' question. So long as you have a system under which you give the work to one man, and all the honours to another, I don't think you can reasonably hope to have a permanent settlement of the question. I don't think the elements are there for it. Now it appears to me that you might very well make the resident Sheriff the sole judge ordinary of the county, without the smallest inconvenience. The duties which the non-resident Sheriff at present does as judge ordinary are of the very smallest amount. In the ordinary civil processes I may say that he does nothing. In the Small Debt Court he takes the circuits once a year; but I think it is a public inconvenience for him to take that circuit, because the result is, that when cases are continued from one court to another, as must sometimes happen, the Sheriff hears the beginning, and it comes to be finished very possibly by the Sheriff-substitute, who does not understand what has gone before, and vice versa. I think his interference in that rather tends to the public disadvantage than otherwise. The only other matter which the non-resident Sheriff does in civil business, is the duty of revising barrister in the Registration Courts. Now, it appears to me that if a man is qualified to do all the other work that falls to the duty of resident Sheriff, it may fairly be assumed that he is fit for the work of a revising barrister also, and that, without disadvantage to the public, that might be transferred to us. Then, in regard to criminal work, the interference of the non-resident Sheriff is very small. With the preliminary investigation he never interferes at all. With the giving of instructions as to the conduct of criminal investigation he rarely interferes; that is all done by the Lord Advocate. With the summary trials he never interferes. The only criminal matter he does anything in, is trial by jury; and there what he does is so very small, that it might, without any disadvantage whatever, be all entrusted to us. From the statistics which we have got with reference to the Sheriff Courts, it appears that in 1863 the non-resident Sheriffs tried only some 10 per cent. of the whole criminal trials; and if these cases are analyzed, it will appear that there would have been no difficulty in that 10 per cent. being done by the resident Sheriff. There were about 400 cases altogether for 1863. Of these, 39 were tried by non-resident Sheriffs, and they were tried in this proportion: 2 were tried by the non-resident Sheriff of Clackmannan, 3 by the non-resident Sheriff of Kincardine, 1 Kirkcudbright, 3 Peebles, 22 at Cupar, 2 Dunfermline, 5 Linlithgow, and 1 Dunblane.

1758. Mr. Baxter.—Is that for all Scotland?—Yes, exclusive of Edinburgh and Glasgow, where the principal Sheriffs are resident.

1759. For what year is the return?—For the year 1863. I am speaking from the returns got by Sir Wm. Dunbar.

1760. These returns show the number of jury trials?—Yes. Now, if it is meant to be said that these cases were so important that the resident Sheriff could not have tried them, this result must be come to,—that in 1863 there were no important cases except in counties such as Clackmannan and Peebles, and the others I have mentioned; for the principal Sheriffs of such counties as Stirling, Forfar, Dumfries, and Aberdeen, did not try a single case by jury in 1863. Out of the 50 districts into which Scotland is divided for the purposes of the Sheriff Courts, there were, in 1863, cases tried by jury, by the non-resident Sheriffs, only in 8.

1761. Mr. Orr Ewing.—And Glasgow and Edinburgh?—Yes. In Glasgow there were tried by jury by the Sheriff-substitutes, 78 cases, and by the principal Sheriff 3. For Edinburgh the returns are not very clear, the number of persons tried being given, instead of the number of cases; but I have tried to reduce it to cases from information given in another part of the return, and I think there were 40 cases tried in Edinburgh by the principal Sheriff, and 42 by the Sheriff-substitutes. Now I think that, for the sake of the very small quantity of work (taking both the civil and the criminal departments) which is done by the non-resident Sheriffs as judges ordinary, it is not worth while to keep up their power of acting in that capacity.

1762. Mr. Campbell.—Can you state the number of jury cases tried in Renfrewshire, in its two wards, that year?—In the Lower Ward there were 28 trials by jury in 1863, and in the Upper Ward 5; all tried by the resident Sheriffs. I am speaking throughout of trials at the second diet—not merely the taking of pleas at the first diet. I would suggest that the duty of judge ordinary should be left to the resident Sheriff, and entirely separated from the duty of judge of appeal. I would further suggest that the districts of the resident Sheriffs might be increased in size and diminished in number. There are a great many districts just now where the work cannot be sufficient for a resident Sheriff, and where, I think, a resident Sheriff might, without public inconvenience, be very well dispensed with. It is impossible to go into the details of that; but I think that from the 55 resident Sheriffs which there are at present, we might cut off 15, so as to bring them down to 40. A further suggestion which I would make with regard to the constitution of the court is, that there is no proper provision just now for a resident Sheriff being absent from his county.

John Dove Wilson.

We get the assistance of honorary Sheriff-substitutes, and very valuable it is at times; but we cannot throw upon these gentlemen the duty of taking trials. If the resident Sheriff should happen to take unwell on the eve of a trial, there might be nothing else for it at present but to postpone it. It is out of the question to send to Edinburgh for the principal Sheriff, who very likely could not come; but if one resident Sheriff had power on an emergency to act for another, we would be able to get over such difficulties, and should also be able to arrange with one another so as to have a suitable vacation in the course of each year. At present we can hardly get out of our counties; but if one resident Sheriff could act for another, we could arrange that with each other, and at the same time be of great additional use to the public. These are all the suggestions I have to make on the first point.

1763. Mr. Gordon.—Have you yourself experienced any interference on the part of the principal Sheriff with the ordinary roll of your court?—No. He does not interfere with the ordinary roll of the court. He has occasionally taken jury trials. But it is not of any interference as being disagreeable to my feelings that I am complaining; it is more this, that the present system unnecessarily takes away from the position of the resident magistrate.

1764. I thought you were talking of the experience of your own case?—Not in particular.

1765. Have you ever heard any of the public state that such an occasional acting by the Sheriff-principal in the ordinary court affected the position of the Sheriff-substitute?—I think there is a very general opinion that the resident county judge ought not to be the substitute of a non-resident. There is a use of that word substitute,—trifling enough in itself,—which shows, however, how the public regard it. Whenever it is wanted to depreciate us, that word comes to the surface; and sometimes almost a kind of sneer is implied in its use. I recollect a good instance of the kind of use made of it in a newspaper I happened to pick up. A gentleman had given a considerable donation to a society, and he was entered as Mr. Sheriff A. B., and was referred to as the learned Sheriff. A few columns on he was represented as Sheriff-substitute A. B., and the cause of the change apparently was, that he had given an unpopular decision.

1766. The Chairman.—Was there any sneer there? I suppose it was the fact that he was the Sheriff-substitute in giving the decision?—Yes; but what I point out is, that the substituteship was mentioned in connection with the unpopular decision, and was not mentioned in connection with the popular act.

1767. But the one thing would be done by the person who made up the list of donations, I suppose?—Quite so. And what I wish to say is, that this name of substitute, when unnecessarily brought forward, is seldom used except in some kind of case where it was not wished to speak favourably of him.

1768. But the instance you gave is an instance where there was a decision, and there was a distinction taken that it was the decision of the Sheriff-substitute. Perhaps the grievance was that he was designated as Sheriff in the other list, because it might make people think that it was not he, but his principal, who gave the donation; but I suppose you are usually addressed in society in Kincardineshire as Mr. Sheriff Wilson?—Usually; but I have always a little feeling, when I am so addressed, that I am indebted to courtesy only for the title, and I think that the resident judge ought to have it by law.

1769. Mr Gordon.—I suppose no difficulty is experienced in finding gentlemen to take the office of Sheriff-substitute?—I have heard that there was often considerable difficulty.

1770. Are there not a great many candidates for vacancies that occur?—There are; but I have often heard that persons who were thought suitable would not accept the office.

1771. When you yourself were appointed, were there not many candidates for the office?—I cannot tell, as I was not a candidate. I was offered the office without any application. In fact, the first I heard of there being a vacancy in it, was on its being offered to me.

1772. Don't you know that there are really a great many applicants for the office when there is a vacancy?—Yes, there are; but that is hardly a good test, I submit; and besides, I don't mean to say that ours is a bad office. What I mean to say is, that if a certain thing, which serves no useful purpose at present, was altered, you would make it a much better office, and that it would stand much better with the public.

1773. Mr. Orr Ewing.—There is no advantage at present in the Sheriff-depute superseding you in your court?—I don't think there is.

1774. It is not generally taken advantage of?—No.

1775. And it would be more agreeable to the feelings of the Sheriff-substitute if the Sheriff-depute should not have such a power?—I think so.

1776. Mr. Webster.—Do cases not occur in practice where a Sheriff takes a trial at the request of the Sheriff-substitute?—Such cases have occurred where the resident Sheriff was connected or intimate with a party, but very rarely; and I propose to provide for such emergencies much more effectually by putting it in his power to ask a neighbouring Sheriff to take the case.

1777. Mr. Campbell.—It follows from what you have said, that the resident Sheriff should sit under a commission from the Crown, and be appointed by the Crown?—Quite so.

1778. Do you think that would be an advantage?—I think it would be a great advantage. I think we would stand higher in the popular estimation if we held a commission from the Crown.

1779. And that would remove the peculiarity of the position of the Sheriff-substitute, which is, that he, as an ordinary judge, does not sit as an officer of the Crown?—Yes. I think that a judge, with duties attached to his office such as a resident Sheriff has, ought to be appointed by the Crown, and ought to hold his commission directly from the Crown.

1780. The Chairman.—Is it consistent with your observation that the Sheriff-substitute is a person respected in his district and held in estimation?—I think so; but that depends a good deal on the individual character of the Sheriff-substitute.

1781. But as matters stand, is the Sheriff-substitute a person who is generally respected in his locality?—Yes; though I don't think they have the influence which they ought to have.

1782. But he is a person generally respected in his locality?—Oh yes.

1783. Mr. Orr Ewing.—But you think he would be more respected if what you say were done?—I think so.

1784. The Chairman.—You said the Sheriff had all the honour, and the Sheriff-substitute all the work; is not the office of Sheriff-substitute held in respect, and is it not an honourable office?—It is.

1785. What did you mean, then, by saying that the Sheriff had all the honour?—A great many of the duties are of an honourable kind; and so long as the honour is inseparable from the work, it falls to us. But in many cases they are separable; and what I say is, that on such occasions the resident Sheriff gets the work, and the non-resident Sheriff gets the honour. Whenever there is any public occasion on which the Chief Magistrate of the county falls to be recognised, it is not the resident Chief Magistrate who gets the recognition, but the non-resident Chief Magistrate.

1786. What kind of thing do you allude to?—I can give an example. If there is a public work going on in the county, all the duty connected with keeping the peace and taking the requisite precautions for the public safety, while that work is going on, falls to the resident Sheriff; but if there is a formal opening, with Her Majesty present, then the person who is recognised as magistrate is the non-resident Sheriff; and I don't think that is right.

1787. Mr. Webster.—That occurred at the opening of the water-works at Aberdeen; but does it frequently occur?—I don't wish to give particular instances, because I don't want to make the question an individual question; for I quite see that so long as the non-resident Sheriff is in the anomalous position of combining the commission of judge ordinary with that of judge of appeal, he often cannot, without disrespect to others, be absent on many of those occasions.

1788. The Chairman.—What you refer to is occasions of ceremonial?—Yes. If there was any public advantage connected with having these things given to a non-resident man, I should at once say they were not worth talking about; but for the sake of no public advantage, you put the resident officer to a certain degree in a false position.

1789. That is what you meant by saying that all the honour goes to the Sheriff?—The example I gave shows my meaning very well, but there are various other occasions on which the same kind of thing happens. There are county meetings and the Circuit Courts of Justiciary, for instance. Every public appearance, indeed, of an honorary kind falls to the non-resident Sheriff; while every public appearance where there is any work to do, falls to the resident Sheriff; although with this last I am not finding fault.

1790. Mr. Baxter.—Elections?—I don't think there is much work in the elections taken by the non-resident Sheriff.

1791. But there is the public appearance?—Yes.

1792. You spoke of honorary substitutes; are they gentlemen of the legal profession?—Not very often. They are bankers, or else legal gentlemen of good standing, who do not practise much in the court.

1793. What do they do?—Their duties consist mainly in taking any summary trial that occurs in the course of a necessary absence, or signing warrants which are required.

1794. Formal warrants?—Formal warrants generally.

1795. The Chairman.—What is the next suggestion you have to make?—The next matter is jurisdiction with reference to limits: 1*st*, as to civil matters; and in the first place, with reference to the form of action. At present, out of the four forms of action, only two are competent in the Sheriff Court—petitory and possessory actions; and it sometimes happens that we are obliged to sist such actions till an action of declarator or reduction has been settled in the higher court. Now, I don't mean to say that we should have complete jurisdiction in declarators and reductions; but I say that when an action comes before us of a kind that we are competent to deal with, we should be allowed to deal with declaratory and rescissory matters arising in its course, and should not be obliged to sist the action, and put the parties to the expense and trouble of bringing an action in another court, before we can give them a remedy.

1796. Would you put it in the power of the party to go to the other court if he thought proper, as under the 40th section of the statute?—Does your Lordship mean if the parties chose to go?

1797. Or if one party chose to go?—If a proper jury question arose in this way, and it was considered expedient that parties should have the power given by the 40th section at all, it might be used in that case. In suspensions in the Sheriff Court we have jurisdiction just now to the extent of £25; but I cannot see why the jurisdiction should be so limited. If action were brought on a bill in our court, we could entertain it, whatever the amount; and because the pursuer chooses to begin by way of summary diligence, I don't see why the defender should be obliged, before he states his defence, to go to the Court of Session if the amount is over £25. I don't propose to alter any of the rules as to finding caution. Let it be found in the Sheriff Court as it is found in the Court of Session.

1798. Mr. Webster.—Would that not be giving the defender, in place of the pursuer, the choice of the court?—No; because the pursuer, if he wishes to go to the Court of Session with it, can take out his summary diligence in the Books of Council and Session; and in that case the suspension would go there too. I would refer next to the subject-matter of actions in our court; and taking, 1*st*, heritable title, I confess I have never been able to see the grounds for the distinction made between the power of deciding an heritable title, and the power of deciding upon any other kind of title to property. But I am afraid it would be too extensive a change to propose to give full jurisdiction in heritable matters at present; and I would not propose to ask it to the full extent. But there are many cases where the Sheriff's want of power to deal with heritable title operates to the public disadvantage. Where the value at stake is small, there is virtually a denial of justice. If the property is small, it will not bear the expense of going to the Court of Session, and we can't try disputes about it. In cases of small properties in country villages, disputes go on chronically about the title; the possessor gets the best of it; nobody dreams of bringing it to the Court of Session, because the whole property would be eaten up; and we cannot interfere. In that respect the exclusion of the Sheriff's jurisdiction to deal with heritage operates to public disadvantage; and I would propose, in all cases where the annual value does not exceed say £50, that we should have jurisdiction in matters of heritable title.

1799. The Chairman.—That involves the construction of rights?—Yes, clearly.

1800. Mr. Murray.—Suppose the subject was a house attached to an estate, but that the value of it was under £50, would you give the Sheriff jurisdiction in that case?—If the pursuer claimed only the part worth £50, I don't see why the action should not be brought before the Sheriff.

1801. But it might be of great value to the larger estate, the amenity of which might be affected by it?—In that case the defender would be able to appeal if the Sheriff did not do him justice.

1802. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think that if a party was suing for a large estate, he would naturally go to the Court of Session?—Quite so.

1803. Mr. Murray.—You are not asking it in the case of a large estate?—No. I think we should also have jurisdiction in cases such as those which come under the Pupils Protection Act—for the protection of the property of pupils, minors, absent and insane persons, where the value of the property is not of a large amount. At present, if the property is small in value, it might be entirely thrown away before a factor loco tutoris or loco absentis was appointed in the Court of Session. It is anomalous that while we can commit an insane person to an asylum, if he has a little property, we cannot take care of it for him. I think if the property did not exceed £500 in extent, we might very fairly have that power; and we might have similar powers in dealing with trusts, where the trust estate was not larger than £500, appointing trustees in lapsed trusts, and so on. I also think that there is often public inconvenience from the want of a power in the Sheriff to protect the persons of pupils. In my own experience it has happened two or three times that disputes have got up in country districts as to who was entitled to the custody of a poor child. The parties were in such circumstances that it was utterly out of the question for them to go to the Court of Session to have it settled; and I had so limited a power that I could only give interim orders, and those only for such time as the party might require to go to the Court of Session. Now that is virtually an exclusion of the power of protecting the persons of these pupils altogether; and I think that, without disadvantage to any one, we might have power given us to protect the persons of pupils. It is not possible to put a pecuniary limit to that, but the right of appeal would always exist. I think further jurisdiction might also be given to Sheriffs in actions of aliment. Where a husband or wife is suing for aliment, and a consistorial question is stated in defence, it is at present held that we must sist the action of aliment till that question is settled. I would propose that we should not be obliged to sist actions of aliment of any kind, but should (for the purposes of the action) be held competent to settle such questions. With regard to criminal matters, I think that the distinction between the pleas of the Crown and other cases is often more a nominal than a real distinction. There may be cases not among the pleas of the Crown much more important than those which are pleas of the Crown. Wherever the public prosecutor thinks that the amount of punishment which can be awarded in the Sheriff Court is adequate to the offence, we should have jurisdiction whether it falls within the pleas of the Crown or not; such as the case of robbery or of fire-raising, where two years' imprisonment would be considered sufficient punishment. With reference to offenders who have been tried repeatedly for an offence which, had it been committed for the first time, we could have tried, I think we should have jurisdiction to sentence to penal servitude. If a person commits theft, say three times, we can try him each time, because we can award an adequate punishment; but if the same person commits a fourth theft, though the trial may be a more simple matter, we cannot try him, because we cannot award an adequate punishment. I would propose that, as regards all those cases which would have been competent to be tried before the Sheriff had they been a first offence, our jurisdiction should not be excluded because it happens to be a third or fourth offence, and we should have power to sentence to penal servitude in such cases.

1804. Mr. Adam.—There is no distinction between a third or fourth offence. I suppose you mean just more or less numerous previous convictions?—Yes.

1805. Mr. Baxter.—Or where there are aggravations?—No; only that the number of previous convictions should not be an obstacle. I have looked at Sir Robert Anstruther's return, to see the effect these two proposals would have in lightening the labours of the Justiciary Court; and I find that at the Glasgow Spring Circuit of 1866, if effect had been given to such a view as I have now stated, out of 68 persons who were tried, 45 might have been competently tried before the Sheriff, which would have left only 23 cases to be tried before the Circuit Court, and would have left time for the disposal of civil business. In those 45 cases the length of the imprisonment before trial would also have been greatly shortened.

1806. The Chairman.—Don't you think that would be burdensome on the jurors of the district?—Not more so than at present.

1807. At present, if they are tried before the Circuit Court, Kincardineshire does not send all the jurymen?—Kincardine might have to provide more jurymen for its own cases, but then it would be benefited by having fewer to provide to take a share when Aberdeen cases were being tried.

1808. Mr. Baxter.—Do you find that at the first diets the prisoners probably all plead guilty except one, who is afterwards tried by a jury, and the same jury might try three or four cases?—Yes. I find the proportion of those who plead guilty at the first diet is very large.

1809. And therefore you would not require more jurymen though there were more cases to try?—No.

1810. Have you formed any opinion as to declarators of marriage or of divorce?—I rather think that is a matter for the public.

1811. I shall read to you an excerpt taken from a report of a committee of the United Presbyterian Synod, which the Commissioners on the Marriage Law embodied in their report: 'That, in cases of disputed marriages, the present law, which renders actions of declarator of marriage competent only before the Supreme Court, involves a process so expensive as in many cases to render its benefits beyond the reach of the humbler classes, to the deepest injury of the wife and children; and that to remedy this great evil, jurisdiction should be extended to the Sheriffs to dispose of such cases, subject to appeal to the Supreme Court.' Do you agree with that?—That is a matter involving a great many considerations besides matters of law. If it is thought for the public interest that the remedy of divorce or declarator of marriage should be made more accessible, I don't see why the actions might not be tried fairly enough in the Sheriff Courts. I don't know that the questions involved are much more difficult to try than questions that occur in other contracts. If the public wish it, I think we might be able to try those cases; but that is a matter more for the public than for the Sheriffs.

1812. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would it not conduce to the public advantage that these cases should be competent in the Sheriff Court, seeing that there are many poor people who cannot come to the Court of Session?—That is an open point. Some people think that it is not an advantage that the remedy of divorce should be made too easy. It is not a question of law, it is a question of morals and of politics.

1813. And of expediency?—Yes.

1814. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that questions under the Conjugal Rights Act, such as petitions for protection of a wife's earnings, should be competent to the Sheriff Court?—Such questions could be well enough tried in the Sheriff Court.

1815. Don't you think it is a hardship on poor women to be obliged to go to the Court of Session in such cases?—When it is merely a question of protecting her property, I cannot see why the Sheriff should not have jurisdiction.

1816. Don't you think it a hardship?—It is. The property may be so small, that it is not worth going to the Court of Session about. There must be many cases in the country of poor women making small earnings which are carried off by their not being able to have protection at present.

1817. Do you think that extraordinary removings should be competent in the Sheriff Court?—I see no reason why they should not.

1818. The Chairman.—What is your next suggestion?—With reference to civil proceedings, the first thing I would suggest is, that it would be a great advantage if we had all our proceedings brought under one code of regulations. At present we have a great many statutes to consult—not under forty, I should think—and a great many Acts of Sederunt, some of which are not in a very convenient form. If these could all be brought into one code of regulations, it would be a great advantage. That might be easily done if some such plan were taken as was followed in England, where a commission of five County Court judges was appointed to draw up a set of regulations.

1819. Was there not a similar course taken in regard to the earlier code of regulations for the Sheriff Courts?—There was something similar under the Act of 1838.

1820. But at an earlier period there was a Commission, of which I think I was a member?—Yes, I think there was. But I think such a Commission is more needed now than ever it was, and I should propose for it a scheme much more extensive than anything hitherto attempted,—a scheme which should commence with the matter of jurisdiction, and extend over the whole range of practice.

1821. Mr. Baxter.—How many forms of process are there at present?—Three for actions for the payment of money; and for applications for other remedies, I really cannot tell the number. Beginning with ordinary actions, I think our forms of process might be simplified a good deal. The libelled summons stating the grounds of action is a longer document to begin a process with than there is any necessity for; and it would be quite sufficient to begin the action, if we had a writ simply stating the remedy claimed, with enough of specification to enable it to be identified. I think that in place of the condescendence, we might very well have something like the English declaration, containing nothing but the grounds of action, stated in single propositions; and instead of the defence, a minute something analogous to the English plea. But to meet cases of equity and complicated cases when they arise, I would give power to the judge ordinary, on motion, to order a statement of particulars to be given in any case. The present system of allowing an option between the short and the long form of record does not work very well. When gentlemen come up and state on their professional responsibility that they think a long record to be necessary, we have great difficulty in refusing it, and we often in the end find that they have been over anxious, and that it has not been of the least value. I think if it was provided that the record was always to be in a short form first, but with power, in occasional cases, to order details, we should be able to make our records, as a rule, shorter and better than they are.

1822. Mr. Baxter.—You spoke of a declaration and a plea. Would you not require a replication?—Yes, with power to have a replication wherever the pleas raised matter not raised in the declaration. There is a great deal of time lost just now in the technical process of adjusting and closing the record. I scarcely ever saw an alteration made in adjusting that was of the least consequence. I think that might be all done away with, and the record held to close of itself as soon as the pleadings were put in,—but with a power to amend at any stage on payment of expenses.

1823. The Chairman.—Do you think there would not be a great risk of slovenliness in that case?—No. I think we could check that by the provision as to expenses. With regard to the Debts Recovery Act, I have not had much experience of it; but if such a simple form of process as that which I have suggested were given, I think the form contained in that Act might be limited to actions not exceeding £25 in value. If that were done, I think the Act might be made to apply to debts of every description. With reference to the investigation of fact, I think that where both parties consented, power might be given to have certain facts tried by jury in the Sheriff Court. I don't think it would be much used, but it might meet cases which are at present not easily dealt with. It is often unsatisfactory to have the evidence brought before a single judge; and it is equally unsatisfactory to have the result which he arrived at, after seeing all the witnesses, reversed by a judge who has not seen any of them.

1824. Mr. Baxter.—What number would you propose as the jury?—Seven or eight.

1825. Mr. Adam.—Would you require unanimity, or only a majority?—A certain number of votes—say five.

1826. Mr. Webster.—Would you prefer the decision of five out of seven untrained men, not accustomed to judge of evidence, to the decision of a local judge?—It is impossible to leave the matter solely to the decision of such a judge, and there might be cases in which the parties would prefer a jury.

1827. What class of cases?—Cases, for instance, where they thought the judge ordinary had strong views upon particular matters; and, on general grounds, I think actions of damages are often better disposed of by juries.

1828. Mr. Baxter.—You would only have a jury where the parties wished it?—Where both parties wished it.

1829. The Chairman.—Perhaps the strong views of the Sheriff on the subject would be an inducement to one of the parties to refuse his consent?—It might. But I was just going to have stated that I would also give power to the appeal court, where they thought there had been a miscarriage before the resident judge, but still were not certain that the result opposite to that which he had arrived at was correct, to remit the case to be tried before a jury.

1830. Mr. Webster.—Where there had been a jury trial, would you have any power of review?—Yes, by bill of exceptions, in the same way as in the Court of Session.

1831. With or without the details of the evidence?—With the notes of evidence.

1832. Do you know whether jury trial has been found to be a very costly or a moderately expensive thing?—It has been found very costly in the Court of Session, but there are various reasons for that which would not apply in the Sheriff Court: 1*st*, you would have all the witnesses on the spot; 2*d*, you would in general have no counsel; 3*d*, there would be no expense of printing; and 4*th*, there would be no expense of issues, because I would propose that, as in England, we should send the case to the jury at once upon the record. I may state, as to criminal matters, that I think the declarations should be taken in public. I am not fond of the Scotch and foreign system of taking the declarations in private. I think they should be taken in public, and should be limited to telling the prisoner that he is accused of a certain offence, and asking him if he has anything to say.

1833. Mr. Baxter.—Is that not very much the system that is adopted?—Yes; but it is competent to go on and examine him in the details.

1834. But in practice is not that very much the system which is followed?—It is. Then I think that our forms of complaint and indictment might with advantage be shortened a good deal, so as to take more the form of a notice, telling the person that he is to be tried for a particular offence.

1835. Do you mean that you would alter the form of the indictment, which at present contains major and minor propositions?—Yes.

1836. What would you make it?—I would make it a simple writ, telling the accused to take notice that he is to be tried for the crime, say of theft, committed by him at a particular time.

1837. And at such a place?—At such a place.

1838. Would you give any power of amendment of slight errors during the trial?—Yes; of slight errors. I think that might very well be given.

1839. Mr. Adam.—Would you still take the precognitions in private?—Yes: they are the prosecutor's case, and I think he should not be asked to disclose it in an incomplete form.

1840. The Chairman.—You think the syllogistic form of the indictment is not good?—It is very good, but it is more involved than there is any occasion for.

1841. Mr. Baxter.—Have you known miscarriage to arise from it?—I know that it is very troublesome to frame, and that technical objections are often sustained to it, which would not be the case if there was a simpler form.

1842. Mr. Gordon.—What would you omit from the indictment?—I would merely name the crime by its name—theft; then mention the time and the place where it is said to have occurred, and nothing more.

1843. The Chairman.—All you would say would be, You are accused of stealing a certain thing at a certain time and place?—Yes; and from that I think the prisoner would understand quite well what he had to do in the way of defending himself.

1844. Mr. Baxter.—That is very much the English form?—Yes.

1845. The Chairman.—That is very much limiting it to the minor proposition?—Very much.

1846. Mr. Adam.—Would you allow previous convictions or habit and repute to be proved before the jury retired, or after they came back?—I think it would be better to take those matters after they came back. I may add that I think we have very absurd limits as to the kind of previous convictions that may be used. The value of a previous conviction is as showing the character of the man; and I think the prosecutor should be at liberty to bring up every kind of previous conviction which he thinks relevant to affect the amount of punishment.

1847. The Chairman.—Whether of that crime or of another?—Yes. If it was not relevant, the judge would pay no attention to it.

1848. Mr. Baxter.—And that after the verdict was given?—Yes. It would be no disadvantage to the prisoner. If evidence of that kind were to be brought before the jury retired, I can see good reasons for limiting it strictly to the kind of crime charged; but when not brought till after the verdict is given, I think the public prosecutor should be at liberty to mention to the judge all the previous convictions that he thinks relevant.

1849. Mr. Adam.—At present the prisoner, in practice, and as matter of right, leads evidence as to the goodness of his own character?—Yes.

John Dove Wilson.

1850. The prosecutor has no such power of leading evidence of the prisoner's bad character?—No; but I think he ought to have that power. Where the prisoner sets up his character, I think the prosecutor ought to be able to reply; and in that case I would allow the prosecutor to bring every kind of evidence, including previous convictions, before the jury retired.

1851. Mr. Baxter.—That is, where he put his character in issue?—Yes.

1852. Mr. Adam.—Would you require previous notice from the prisoner that he was going to plead his good character?—That might be requisite.

1853. Or would you allow the prosecutor to lead evidence upon that point, without serving a list of witnesses?—I would not allow the prosecutor to lead evidence upon character until the panel had led his.

1854. But would you require that the prosecutor should give a list of witnesses?—No, I think not. If the accused opened the matter of character, he would have to be prepared to hear counter evidence.

1855. Mr. Baxter.—You are aware that the prosecutor is bound to give fifteen days' previous notice of his witnesses?—Yes.

1856. Suppose that within two days the panel says that he is to put his good character in issue, would you require the prosecutor to give notice of the witnesses that he was to call?—These are matters of detail, on which I could not very well give an opinion at once.

1857. The Chairman.—Do you think the prosecutor should be allowed to prove previous conviction, and bad character, after conviction?—Yes.

1858. Should the prisoner not have some notice of that, in order to rebut it?—Yes, I think so, where the prosecutor opens the subject; but I would not put it in the indictment. I would make it a separate writ.

1859. But you would give him such notice?—Yes. I would make a separate writ, which I would serve on him a certain number of days before the trial, telling the accused that in the event of his being found guilty by the jury, the public prosecutor will lead evidence to show that he has been habit and repute a thief, or that he has been previously convicted.

1860. Would you give him then a list of the witnesses that were to prove that?—Yes, indorsed on that writ.

1861. Would you get from him a list of the witnesses to character whom he was to adduce?—Yes, when he gives his other witnesses, I would make him include these.

1862. Mr. Adam.—Did you ever see, in your experience, a case in which an innocent man suffered prejudice by the present form of taking declarations?—No, I cannot say that I have.

1863. Mr. Baxter.—Has that matter been very tenderly dealt with, so far as you have had an opportunity of judging?—My opportunities of judging have chiefly been in cases in which I have been the presiding magistrate, and I have always endeavoured to deal as fairly with the prisoners as I possibly could. But my objections to the system of private examinations of the accused are, that it may be abused; that it is unnecessary; and that it is hardly fair, when publicity is inevitably given to the charge, not to give equal publicity to the answer made to it.

1864. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make?—The number of jurymen that are cited seems to me too large. We have often, in my county, cases where one person is to be tried for not a very grave offence, and we are obliged at present to cite 45 jurymen, while of course 30 of these are not called. I think it would be no disadvantage to the panel if the number were reduced to 25.

1865. Mr. Webster.—Would you still keep up the number of 15 as jurors?—I think that might be reduced to 12.

1866. Mr. Adam.—Then you could not have a majority?—You might have it in this way, that no verdict was to be given unless 8 were agreed.

1867. The Chairman.—How would you deal with challenges?—I would not make any difference in the number of challenges. At present, I think, a man may challenge 2 special and 3 common jurors. The 25 still gives him a good margin.

1868. Mr. Baxter.—Suppose there were two or three prisoners under one libel, and each had a challenge?—You might have to cite more jurymen at times; but if you had to cite 25 where you had only one or two cases to try, you would, in the course of the year, relieve the jurymen of a great deal of trouble.

1870. Mr. Harrison.—Do you suppose that the ends of justice would suffer by reducing the number of the jury to a still greater extent, say 7?—It might. I would not like to go so low as that. I don't think that any country which has adopted jury trial has gone below 12 in criminal cases; but I think it might be reduced to 12 without the smallest disadvantage.

1871. The Chairman.—And a verdict by a certain proportion of these?—Eight votes to acquit or convict, which is the same number as you have at present. You can have no verdict at present till 8 are agreed.

1872. But they are 8 in the 15?—Yes; but I think there are very few cases where 8 jurymen out of 12 would not agree.

1873. Mr. Campbell.—Do you approve of the aggravation of habit and repute without previous conviction being proved in criminal cases?—I think, if it were only proved after the verdict, there would be no harm in it, but on the contrary, advantage, even though there were no previous convictions. There are many characters well known to the police as thieves whom they have never been fortunate enough to catch.

1874. Mr. Baxter.—The only rule as to whether bail is admissible or not, is whether the crime is capital?—Yes, or rather if it was capital at one time.

1875. Do you think that operates well?—No, I don't think it does. I think the distinction between crimes that were capital once and other crimes is often not a very sound one. There are crimes that were capital once, which are really very much smaller crimes than others that never were capital.

1876. When a person is accused of three several acts of theft, you don't admit him to bail?—I think not.

1877. If he be a fraudulent bankrupt to any extent, you do admit him to bail?—Yes.

1878. If the charge is reset of theft, you admit him to bail?—Yes.

1879. Don't you think it would be better to trust that matter to the discretion of the bailing magistrate?—I rather think it would. The present rules for our guidance are not satisfactory, and I doubt if it be possible to frame any kind of satisfactory rules without leaving a good deal to discretion.

1880. Of course it would be under right of appeal?—That would not be very easily arranged, I am afraid.

1881. Mr. Adam.—You think the prisoner should not get it as matter of right?—I think not.

1882. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the public prosecutor should get notice of any application for bail, so that he might attend for the public interest?—I think so; and in my county he always does know of it.

1883. Mr. Adam.—Do you think the privileges in the Act of 1701 as to forcing on a trial should be extended to a person out on bail?—No; I think he should have a certain power of forcing on his trial, but not the same power as a person who is in jail.

1884. The Chairman.—What is your next suggestion?—I come next to review in civil matters, and to inquire what appeals should be allowed, and who should judge on the appeal. On the first of these points, I think that we are at present rather too liberal in allowing appeals. Appeals are allowed at four stages of the case—namely, when the proof is ordered, upon the admission of evidence, upon the merits, and on the question of expenses. A little ingenuity often contrives to get more, though these appeals are very seldom all taken. The average number is perhaps two in each case in place of four. But they are all used just in the kind of cases where they ought not to be used, where the pleas are utterly bad, and where the party is fighting for delay. I think that in all appeals, except those upon the merits, there should be a power to the judge ordinary to refuse to allow the appeal. I think that would diminish the number of appeals nearly by one-half. With reference to the court of appeal, I am not prepared to say that the appeals should go direct to the Court of Session. No doubt it is by far the best and weightiest court, but the practical disadvantages in the way are too great. The unavoidable expense is too great; and even after reducing the number of appeals as I propose, the influx of business would be too great; and there is a certain disadvantage in removing the administration of justice to any extent from the county. I think it requisite, therefore, to retain an intermediate court of appeal. What I said of the propriety of cancelling the honorary commission which the non-resident Sheriffs hold as judges ordinary, does not imply that they might not be retained as judges of appeal, if they were thought to form an efficient tribunal. But, speaking with due deference, I hardly think they do form such a tribunal. To appeal from one person to another, seldom of conspicuously higher standing, does not appear to me to be satisfactory. And I think it is essential that whoever hold the appeal courts should not be practising members of the bar. I think that, in theory, the appeal from one judge should always be to a higher judge; and in practice, if you take the appeal judges from the practising bar, they cannot possibly hold their appeal courts so frequently as the public convenience requires. We have at present three modes of disposing of appeals,—one without any argument, which appears to me a very unsatisfactory way. The second mode is with written pleadings. That also is bad, because it is very expensive, frequently coming up to £7 or £10 on each side. I therefore come to the conclusion that oral pleading is the only way of settling appeals. Under the present practice, when the members of the bar hold the appeal courts, the average time for disposing of a case under oral pleadings, as taken for the returns of 1863, varies from 40 days, which is the least average, up to 237. I think that is far too long an interval; and the returns conclusively show that that is not to be attributed to any fault in the appeal judges, because the cases only lie, after being heard, from 10 to 20 days on an average. There are exceptional cases, but that is the ordinary time. The real loss of time is in the long interval during which the judges are practising in the Court of Session, before they can come to the county to hear appeals. Therefore I think that, if you are to have a satisfactory tribunal of appeal, it must consist of men who are not practising at the bar; and then, I think that each court should consist of two judges. For the purposes of the appeal courts, I propose to divide the country into circuits,—say four circuits. The number of appeals just now, according to the returns, is about 2000 in the course of a year. I think, by limiting the right of appeal as I have suggested, you might reduce them to 1000, and four circuits might easily dispose of that number of appeals in the course of a year. I propose that the courts should sit once a month in the larger towns, and once in two months in the more distant localities. In cases where the court of appeal has adhered to the decision of the judge ordinary, I think there should be no appeal to the Court of Session without caution.

1885. Caution for what?—For expenses.

1886. Only?—Yes; or consignation of a sum to meet expenses.

1887. Mr. Webster.—Supposing the two judges not to agree?—In that case I take it for granted that the system of the Lords Justices of the appeal court would be followed, and the judgment of the judge ordinary adhered to.

1888. Mr. Campbell.—Do you consider that it would be decidedly preferable to have two gentlemen going together on circuit, as appellate judges, than one?—I think so. It could only be reasons of economy, I think, which would limit such a court of appeal to a single judge.

1889. Mr. Webster.—How would you conduct the cases before them. Would you have the papers printed?—No. When in court, the judges could very well have the papers between them; and when they came to consider the case, one might take the process for a time, and then hand it to the other.

1890. Mr. Campbell.—That was the course followed in the appeals in civil cases to the Circuit?—Yes. I think it would not be any more expensive to the litigants to have two judges than to have one, though of course it would be more expensive to the country.

1891. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that the present mode of taking down the evidence by the Sheriff-substitute is satisfactory?—No, not quite; I think it would be better to have the evidence taken by shorthand writers.

1892. Dictated by the judge?—Yes.

1893. At present, I suppose, the agents don't know what is being taken down?—No, they don't hear it till the end of the examination. Besides, it is a very laborious thing to the judge to take down the evidence; and it so engrosses his whole attention, that he has almost no time to think of questions to put to the witnesses, and no proper opportunity of watching the demeanour of the witnesses.

1894. Do you think it is of great importance to see the witnesses?—I think it is. At present the Sheriff is kept writing constantly the whole time; and when he has written for seven or eight hours as constantly as he can, he has not the same power of asking questions and observing the witnesses that he would otherwise have.

1895. You think that the present review by the Sheriff on the notes that the Sheriff-substitute has taken is not satisfactory?—I don't think it is very satisfactory. I think, when you go from one judge who has seen the witnesses to another judge, who is at the disadvantage of not having seen them, you are always open to remark that the judgment of the first judge is really the better of the two.

1896. The Chairman.—You would still allow an appeal to one judge?—Yes, if the country refused the expense of having two judges, I would still allow an appeal to one judge, because I think it is better than no appeal at all.

1897. But you prefer two?—I do much.

1898. If these two judges concur in altering the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, you would allow an appeal to the Court of Session?—Yes.

1899. If they agree in affirming, would you allow any appeal?—I would; but only with caution.

1900. If one of them was for affirming and the other for reversing, would you not allow the appeal without caution?—I would. In the event of any difference of opinion among the three judges, I don't think caution should be required.

1901. Mr. Harrison.—Might not a wealthy man still have it in his power to ruin a poor man by vexatious appeals, even though the check of consigning expenses was applied?—That is a matter inherent in any system; but I think it well worth consideration, whether some means might not be taken of limiting the number of instances, so that, at all events, there should never be more than three in any one cause.

1902. Would not justice be satisfied by permitting only one appeal if the first decision was affirmed?—I think you might very well say, that if the amount at stake were less than £50, there should be no appeal to the Court of Session.

1903. Mr. Murray.—How do you reconcile that with the answer which you gave to me formerly as to heritable subjects?—I spoke of £50 a year as to heritable subjects.

1904. But there might be an heritable subject of the value of £50 which might greatly affect the amenity of a larger estate?—I would allow an appeal in that case.

1905. I thought you stated just now that you would not allow an appeal under £50?—Do you mean where the whole value of the heritage is under £50?

1906. Yes?—Well, if it was only worth £50 in all, I don't see why there should be an appeal.

John Dove Wilson.

1907. But the party might consider it worth more, as affecting the amenity of his large property?—I think a special provision might be made to meet that case, and that if it affected larger interests there should be a right of appeal.

1908. Would you give the judge in such cases power to allow an appeal?—Yes, or allow it in that case whether the judge thought right or not.

1909. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that caution affects a poor man, and prevents him from getting a remedy?—No, I don't think so. You allow juratory caution, which the poorest man may find, if he has a stateable case.

1910. The Chairman.—As to appeals, you think the Sheriff should have power to allow or not to allow appeals at certain stages?—Yes.

1911. And practically you think that would result in there being no more than an average of two appeals in a case?—I think it would reduce it to an average of very little more than one appeal in a case.

1912. Suppose there is a preliminary plea, which if settled in one way would dispose of the whole case, and the party against whom the judgment upon that plea is pronounced desires to appeal, what would be the rule in that case?—I think you might safely trust to the discretion of the judge ordinary to allow the appeal in that case. We have no interest to take unnecessary proofs, but rather the other way.

1913. Then you would be against allowing a party to follow out his own inclination in regard to appealing in such a state of matters?—Yes.

1914. It might turn out advantageous to him in a particular case, but you think it would be a privilege or allowance that might be abused?—Yes; and it actually is abused to a very great extent.

1915. You would keep that in check by a discretionary power in the judge as to the time at which he would allow it?—Yes; and I have no fear of the discretion being abused, because the judge's interest is to allow an appeal on preliminary pleas whenever they are important.

1916. Mr. Adam.—Might there not be danger of the judge allowing them too easily?—Yes; but the court of review could keep him in check. If they gave encouragement to appeals being allowed at every stage, his inclination would be to allow them; but the court of appeal would probably express an opinion on that, and keep him in check in that way.

1918. Mr. Webster.—Would there not be more delay in many appeals under the system of an appeal court than takes place under the present system with a Sheriff-principal?—No. Even with written pleadings just now the delay is very considerable. The written pleadings take a long time in preparation. In cases where written pleadings are lodged for both parties, the average time varies from 15 days, which is the shortest, up to 155 days, which is the longest; and such numbers as 52 days, 58 days, and 60 days, are quite common in the list. Now if there was a court sitting once a month, as I should like it to do, or even once every two months, you would have the appeals disposed of more quickly.

1919. The Chairman.—Would you have that court to sit at every seat of the resident Sheriff?—No. It should hold courts at particular points over the country. Aberdeen, for example, might take all the district round, namely—Aberdeen, Stonehaven, Peterhead, and Banff. It would be no great inconvenience to the practitioners to go to Aberdeen and return home again the same night.

1920. You would hold the courts at convenient points?—Yes, so as never to oblige the practitioners to be a night from home.

1921. Would the Sheriff-clerks attend with the processes?—That would hardly be necessary.

1922. The Depute-clerks?—That would be matter for arrangement; probably the Depute-clerk of the place might be empowered to act. There is a kind of review which I think is required from the Small Debt Court. Just now we have often cases coming one after the other, raising the same point of law, and some Sheriffs decide these points continually one way, and others decide them continually the opposite way. Now I think it might be left to the discretion of the Sheriff to permit an appeal upon a case stated, with the view of getting such points settled. For example, there was the case about the liability of a man to support his mother-in-law, and it was decided in Small Debt Courts in different counties in different ways for a long time. There was no appeal at all; and even when cases were remitted to the ordinary court, the amount being below £25, the review of the principal Sheriff was all that could be got. The case could not be sent to the Court of Session.

1923. Mr. Webster.—Would you send the special case to the Court of Session or to the appeal court?—If there was an appeal court of two judges, I don't see why it should not go to them.

1924. The Chairman.—If the object was to obtain a rule to regulate in all places and secure uniformity, would not that be better attained by going to the Court of Session?—Yes, probably it would.

1925. Mr. Baxter.—You mean an appeal on matters of law on a case stated?—Yes. In regard to criminal matters, there is no review just now, and I think it would be an advantage to allow a review such as is allowed in England, on reserved points,—giving the judge a power at the request of the prosecutor or the panel of reserving a point of law for the decision of the Supreme Court.

1926. Mr. Webster.—A discretionary power?—Yes, the same as in England.

1927. Mr. Gordon.—Can you not at present take an objection, and then suspend the sentence?—You can take an exception to the relevancy of the indictment, and appeal on that; but as to anything occurring in the course of the trial, I think you have no appeal just now.

1928. Is there not a power of appeal upon irregularities in course of trial?—Yes, but that is all, and it does not meet the case of there being difficulty about the law that is applicable to the facts brought out in evidence. There is another right of appeal which I think it would be necessary to have in the event of giving the Sheriffs power to pronounce longer sentences, in order to secure uniformity of practice over the country. A Sheriff might take up a peculiar view as to these sentences, and I think there should be a power of appealing to the Court of Justiciary simply upon the indictment and notes of evidence, the Court of Justiciary to have power to say whether they think the sentence unreasonable or not, and to alter it accordingly.

1929. Mr. Adam.—In that case the Court of Justiciary would not know the facts?—They would have the notes of evidence. The same kind of review is allowed in France and Prussia just now.

1930. Mr. Webster.—Don't you think that, with the publicity which exists as to sentences, the Sheriffs would come to know the practice?—They might; but they might think the practice wrong. Then, as to the privileges of agents, I think that our present system of splitting up the agents into numerous separate corporations is not a good one. I think there is no reason why a person who has been duly admitted as an agent, should not, in the same way as a person who has been duly admitted as a counsel, be able to practise before any court. But I see difficulties in the way of allowing one set of agents to have power to act both in the Court of Session and in the inferior courts, and I don't think it necessary to carry out the principle so far as that, but I think that agents admitted before any of the inferior courts should have power to practise before all of them.

1931. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware that procurators are now examined in a different way from what they used to be, by examiners appointed by the General Council under the Procurators Act?—Yes; but the admission is still local, although the qualification is nearly the same everywhere. The Procurators Act made things worse in some respects; and if the present system goes on, the smaller counties will soon be left with almost no procurators at all. A lad of 15 will hardly bind himself down to a county for the rest of his life; and since the Procurators Act passed, in April 1865, only one apprentice has enrolled himself in our county. I think that agents in the inferior courts should be admitted by some central body, and should have power to practise in all the inferior courts, and I think they might also with advantage get power to conduct appeals in the Court of Session. I don't think that power would be much used; but I think it is a privilege which they ought to have, to carry on, to their legitimate conclusion, causes which they have begun.

1932. The Chairman.—Do you think there would be any propriety or impropriety in altering the law as it is understood to stand, against the legality of participation in profits between country agents and agents in the Court of Session?—I think there would be advantage in altering that law.

1933. Would that accomplish the object which you contemplate, of the country agent being able to follow his cause to its conclusion?—I am not quite sure that it would. If you gave the country agent the power of saying to the Edinburgh agent, 'If you will not agree to my terms, I will come and conduct the case myself,' he would have the power to contract as to a participation in the profits; but unless the county agent got the power to act himself, the Edinburgh agent would be contracting with an agent whose hands were tied.

1934. Would you have the country agent to come to Edinburgh and be responsible for the custody of the process?—I don't anticipate that it would be much done in practice; but I think the mere power of doing it would put him in a position to contract with the Edinburgh agent on reasonable terms.

1935. Don't you think there would be a sufficient opening for him to contract, seeing the number of agents in Edinburgh?—But they could come to an understanding with each other on such a matter.

1936. How would you get over the difficulty as to the custody of the writs?—The custody would be with the clerk of court.

1937. But the country agent would borrow the process?—He would only require to come up and borrow it, and take it to his counsel.

1938. But what becomes of it?—He remains responsible for it.

1939. But where is he?—He is still in Scotland.

1940. He goes to Kincardine with the process?—He is still within reach there.

1941. Mr. Baxter.—Supposing he had the privilege, do you think it would be often used?—No, I don't think so. The Commission has invited observations on other points, and I intend to make a suggestion with reference to the Sheriff-clerks. At present we have a system which I might almost call a contract system with the Sheriff-clerks. When a Sheriff-clerk is appointed, an estimate is made out of what he is likely to require for the expenses of his office; and he is paid in each year a sum calculated to meet these expenses, and at the same time to remunerate himself.

1942. Mr. Murray.—That was done when the salaries were fixed. It is not done on each occasion?—No, not on each occasion.

1943. The Chairman.—It is not a recurring thing; it was done when the salaries were adjusted?—Yes. That is so. But it is a contract system. The Sheriff-clerk contracts for a slump sum, to do the whole work of all the courts in his county, however numerous, and to supply certain record books and stationery. Now I think that is fundamentally a bad system. It gives the Sheriff-clerk an inducement to conduct the establishment of the courts on the smallest possible scale; and although these gentlemen, as a whole, do their duty well, we know that there are cases where too much of the work is thrown on the Sheriff-clerk-deputes, who are often ill paid, and who have no sufficient staff of other assistants at their disposal. This has a bad effect also upon the Sheriff-clerk-deputes. The only official whom the Crown recognises is the principal clerk; but we are more dependent on having good depute-clerks, for we see more of them than of the principal clerks; and yet they have no sort of position. They are ill paid, and liable to be dismissed at a moment's notice; they have no retiring allowance if they are dismissed; and, in the way in which things are at present managed, they have little or no prospect of promotion to the office of Sheriff-clerk. I would suggest that the system of contracting with the Sheriff-clerks should be abolished, and that the Sheriff-clerk and his staff should be put upon the public service, keeping each court entirely separate; and also that the clerks should give their whole time to their duties, and not engage in other business. I think that in the end it would be a more economical system for the country, and would be very much better for the administration of the office.

1944. You would fix the extent of his staff?—Yes.

1945. Would you give him the appointment of these persons?—I don't see any reason why the Sheriff-clerk should have the appointment of the subordinates. I think their appointment would probably be better in the hands of the Crown. I would not object, however, to leaving the nomination of them to the Sheriff-clerk, provided the Sheriff had a veto on their selection or dismissal.

1946. Mr. Baxter.—Does he not attend and do his own duty?—Some of them don't attend.

1947. Should they not?—Yes; I think every Sheriff-clerk should attend and do his duty. But that is impossible under the present system, for the same clerk is commissioned to act for different courts,—in one case, for as many as seven courts.

1948. The Chairman.—Those appointed after a certain date require to be resident?—Yes.

1949. Mr. Harrison.—If the jurisdiction of the resident Sheriffs were extended as you have proposed, do you think that competent persons could be obtained for the office at the present salaries?—I think that our salaries, considering the duties that are imposed upon us, and the position that we are required to hold in our counties, are not adequate. When an English County Court judge is paid £1500 a year, and an Irish assistant barrister about £1000 a year, it is unreasonable to pay a man who has higher duties, more power entrusted to him, and whose time is in general more fully occupied, a salary not much more than one-half.

1950. Mr. Baxter.—If the number were to be reduced as you propose, the burden of increasing their salaries would not fall so heavily on the country?—No.

1951. Mr. Harrison.—Some proceedings were taken a few years ago on the part of the Sheriff-substitutes; was any pledge of an increase given to them on the part of any one in authority?—Both the late Government and the Government before it sanctioned the general principle that we were entitled to more salary, and the only thing which prevented that being carried out was a financial difficulty connected with the state of the Treasury at the time.

1952. The Chairman.—What sort of remuneration do you think the resident Sheriffs, according to your plan, ought to receive? Ought it to be varied according to the extent of territory; or what would be the average?—I think the aim should be, as much as possible, to make the districts equal, and therefore to make the salaries equal. But as it is not possible to make the districts entirely equal, I think you must allow some effect to difference of amount of work. Looking to how other professional men are paid, I think we might very fairly expect an average salary of £1000 a year.

1953. As to the appeal Sheriffs, who on your plan would go once a month and review the resident Sheriff's judgments, I think you have stated you would require them to relinquish their practice at the bar?—Yes.

1954. What emoluments would you give to them?—I think their salary should be upon the same scale as that of the Sheriffs of Edinburgh and Glasgow—£1700 to £2000 a year. I don't think you could expect well-qualified men to relinquish their practice for any smaller amount than that.

1955. Mr. Webster.—Preferring as you do two judges in the appeal court to one, what would be the cost of the staff of appeal judges according to your proposal?—If there were to be two appeal judges for each court, the circuits would require to be limited to four. That would be eight judges at £2000 a year—£16,000.

1956. Mr. Baxter.—How many Sheriffs are there just now?—Twenty-three.

1957. You would reduce the 23 to 8?—Yes. I think their total salaries just now amount to upwards of £18,000 a year, so that the new system would not in that respect be more expensive than the present.

1958. Mr. Murray.—Would it not be so if you give the resident Sheriffs £1000 a year?—That is a separate point, but even taking the whole into view, I think the cost of the two systems would be nearly the same. At present I think over £18,000 a year is paid to the principal Sheriffs.

1959. Mr. Gordon.—Does that not include the salaries of the Sheriffs of Edinburgh and Glasgow?—Yes; but I propose to ask them to take circuits also. I propose to reduce the number of resident Sheriffs to 40, so that each appeal court might very well review the decisions of 10 resident Sheriffs. The staff would then be: 8 principal Sheriffs at £2000 a year—£16,000; and 40 resident Sheriffs at an average salary of £1000 a year—£40,000; making a total of £56,000,—the present amount being, I think, about £54,000. If the appeal Sheriffs' salaries were fixed at £1800, the cost of each system would be very nearly equal.

1960. The Chairman.—How would you deal with the case of Glasgow?—The Sheriff of Lanarkshire at present reviews the decisions of seven Sheriff-substitutes, and he reviews them upon a system which allows double the number of appeals that I would propose to allow under the new system. I think that under the new system there would be no difficulty whatever in his taking a share of a circuit which would include ten resident Sheriffs.

1961. Would you have him to be a non-resident Sheriff?—I don't see any reason why he should not continue to reside in Glasgow. I think he ought to continue to reside there.

1962. Do you say the same as to the Sheriff of Edinburgh?—Yes. Allowing him to take a share of a circuit of about the same extent.

1963. Mr. Gordon.—Would you allow the Sheriff or the Sheriff-substitute to elect to take the salary of £1000 as resident Sheriff?—It would be less of a change to say that the men who reside in the county, and do the work, should continue to reside and do the work, than that the men who reside in Edinburgh, and never do the work of judge ordinaries, should go to the counties; and I think you should take the course that involves the least change.

1964. Mr. Webster.—Would the same class of men accept the office of appeal judge who at present accept and hold the office of Sheriff-principal, with the advantage that they have of practising at the bar?—We know that the privilege which they have of practising is not exercised to any great extent by a large number of them; and I think that, upon the whole, if you hold out a prospect of a salary of £1800 or £2000 a year, you would probably get better men than you get on an average salary of £600 a year.

1965. The Chairman.—You would limit their duties entirely to appeal?—Yes; and make them devote all their time to their duties. I have two more suggestions to make. One of them is for a system of annual inspection of the records of the Sheriff Courts. I believe there is such a system in the County Courts in England; and I believe it would be useful here if we had an officer to go round and see that the records were in a proper state.

1966. What records do you mean?—The various records of our courts.

1967. Do you mean the register of deeds?—The register of deeds for preservation and execution; of probative writs; the Commissary Court books. We keep the processes, and the warrants for extracts. The criminal records are also kept. It is not an easy matter to have all these properly kept and indexed; and a newly-appointed Sheriff-clerk may, with the best intentions, not keep them on the best system.

1969. Would you propose that the books should be sent from the Register House?—A number of them are so sent just now; and I think every book required should be sent. I would also propose that all printed forms of every kind should be sent from a central office. At present each Sheriff-clerk prints for himself all the different prints that he requires. He does that at a considerable waste of money, and they have all slight variations in form. I believe that if we had a central office for making such prints, as they have in England, I believe, for the County Courts, we should have them much better arranged.

1970. What kind of prints do you allude to?—At present we print the summons in the Small Debt and Debts Recovery Courts, and the complaints in the Summary Criminal Court, and a large number of other forms,—capable with great advantage of being still more increased.

1971. If there was a form prescribed for these summonses and complaints, they would be printed the same?—Yes; and it would be a great advantage to have more authoritative forms, but still it is a great waste of money to set up the type for each county. With reference to the other local courts, I cannot see the advantage of keeping up the Commissary Courts as separate courts. We do the duties of the Commissary Courts just now, but under a separate commission; and we have separate clerks. I think the Sheriff Courts and the Commissary Courts might well be consolidated, and the duties of the Commissary-clerk done in the Sheriff-clerk's office. I think that would be more convenient, and less expensive.

1972. Would you make an addition to the salary of the Sheriff-clerk for that, or how would you defray the expense?—There are fees at present drawn in the Commissary Court which go to remunerate the Commissary clerks. These fees would go, under the new system, to the Crown, and out of the fees the Sheriff-clerk should be paid a suitable remuneration for his trouble.

1973. Mr. Baxter.—These fees are very high?—Yes.

1974. The Chairman.—Would you keep up these fees?—Yes.

1975. At such an amount as would give a reasonable remuneration to the Sheriff-clerk?—Yes.

1976. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think these fees are too high at present?—Yes.

1977. Mr. Murray.—Would it not be a convenience to the public to allow confirmation to be taken out either in the county, or in the Commissary Court at Edinburgh?—Yes, I think it would.

1978. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to the Justice of Peace Court?—I have little or no experience of it. The Justices do little or nothing in my county, and there seems to be great difficulty in getting any one to do the little that there is. They try a small number of statutory offences—public-house cases, game cases, and road cases.

1979. Mr. Baxter.—Do they hold Small Debt Courts?—Not in my county.

1980. The Chairman.—Do they dispose of revenue cases?—Very few of them; but they have had one or two such cases.

1981. Mr. Webster.—Do you approve of their having jurisdiction in game cases and revenue cases?—I cannot say that I do. It is more a matter for the public to say which court they think offences should be tried before; but I think a professional judge is more likely to give a satisfactory decision in cases of that kind than non-professional judges.

1982. Mr. Baxter.—Have you any Burgh Court in Stonehaven?—No; I do the whole police work of the county.

1983. Mr. Murray.—Would you consider it an advantage that the Procurator-fiscal should be debarred from private practice, if the salary could be arranged?—I think it would. There would be a difficulty in carrying that out in the smaller counties, because you could not give him full employment, nor a large enough salary; but in every case where the salary permitted, it would be an advantage. I cannot say, however, that I have seen any bad effects from the present system. John Dove Wilson.

1984. Mr. Baxter.—If you confined the Procurator-fiscal's duties to his public functions, don't you think he should have a retiring allowance?—Yes, probably he should.

GEO. HARRISON, ESQ.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

J. COMRIE THOMSON, ESQ., examined. J. Comrie Thomson.

1985. The Chairman.—You are a member of the Scotch bar?—I am.

1986. How long have you been so?—Since 1861.

1987. You are one of the Sheriff-substitutes of Aberdeenshire?—I am.

1988. At Aberdeen?—Yes.

1989. How long have you been so?—Since January 1866.

1990. There are two substitutes in that county?—Yes.

1991. The other is at Peterhead?—Yes.

1992. Who is the Sheriff-substitute at Peterhead?—Mr. James Skelton, a Writer to the Signet.

1993. Have you any suggestion to make as to the constitution of the Sheriff Court as consisting of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitutes?—I am of opinion that there is room for some change in that matter, considering the great importance that has recently come to be attached to the duties which the Sheriff-substitute has to perform. He is now a final judge in questions up to £12; he is final, except for the appeal to the Court of Session, in bankruptcy cases; and he has to administer a large number of Acts of Parliament which have been passed within the last ten or fifteen years, in which I think it is generally understood there is no appeal from his judgment to that of the Sheriff-depute, such as the Public Health Act, the Nuisances Act, and so on. And I think I may be permitted to say that a different class of men have come to be appointed, at all events within the last twenty-five or thirty years, from those appointed for the half-century preceding that time. I do think that it would be advisable that the Sheriff-substitute should not be any longer the substitute of the principal Sheriff, but that he should be appointed by the Crown. If the Sheriff-principal is retained, I think his duties should be confined as much as possible to those of an appeal judge, and the Sheriff-substitute should be allowed to act as the judge ordinary of the district. I think that the present system has sometimes the effect of discrediting the Sheriff-substitute with his practitioners, and with the public of his county. When the Sheriff-principal visits his county, the Sheriff-substitute is necessarily by the operation of the existing practice set aside; and although that may come very near a mere sentiment, yet I think it is not without some effect on the Sheriff-substitute's position. I ought to say that I have not suffered personally in that way. The Sheriff-principal of Aberdeenshire has been all his life a Sheriff-substitute, and he is almost entirely a judge of appeal. He is careful of his substitute's position; but I know that it is a universally expressed feeling among my brethren, that they should like to hold a more independent position in connection with their Sheriff-principal. I am not aware of any other suggestion that I have to make as to the constitution of the courts as consisting of Sheriffs and their substitutes.

1994. What would you suggest as the system that should be adopted?—That the Sheriff-substitute should be appointed by the Crown, and that the Sheriff-principal, supposing that office remains as it is now, should be solely an appeal judge.

1995. Do you think the office should remain as it is, confining his duty to that of an appeal judge?—I am not prepared to say that. I think it is a little delicate for a Sheriff-substitute to express a strong opinion one way or the other on the subject. I think it is rather for the practitioners and the public to say whether they are content with the mode of review which at present exists. But putting that feeling aside, there is, in the first place, no question that the present system affords a very satisfactory mode of having the Sheriff-substitute's judgments corrected. It is a great relief to the mind of a Sheriff-substitute to know, that for a small expenditure his errors will be put right, or will probably be put right. On the other hand, I do think that to have 25 Sheriffs-depute, as I think there are, is having too many men for the work that they have to do. I believe that theoretically it would be very much better that there should be an appeal direct from the Sheriff-substitute to the Supreme Court. But I cannot conceal from myself that there are great difficulties in the way of that, and that it might operate as a hardship, especially upon the poorer classes; because it certainly would be, according to our present system, a much more expensive mode of appeal than that from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff-principal. There is one thing which I am satisfied is an abuse; and that is that the Sheriff-principal should review the Sheriff-substitute's judgment on questions of fact, upon the Sheriff-substitute's notes of evidence. I think that, however well and carefully these notes may be taken, they do not put the Sheriff-principal in so good a position, though his experience may be greater, and his talent greater for disposing of a question of facts, as his substitute has been in. If one man who has not seen the witnesses has to review the findings of another man upon points of fact, that other man having seen the witnesses, then I think the evidence should be taken down in a much more careful and elaborate way. It should be taken down in the form of depositions in the presence of the Sheriff-substitute, probably by a shorthand writer, and dictated to him by the Sheriff-substitute; but I am convinced that there is a considerable chance of miscarriage of justice when the Sheriff-principal reviews the Sheriff-substitute's judgment on questions of fact, the material on which he proceeds being the Sheriff-substitute's notes of the evidence. I must say for myself that I have never been able to see why we should not have the advantage of juries—small juries, perhaps, not necessarily twelve men—to determine questions of fact in the counties; or if it be found inexpedient to introduce jury trial to any extent in the country, then I think that the Sheriff-substitute's findings in fact should not be reviewed by the Sheriff-principal at all, but that, if they are to be reviewed, they should be reviewed by the Court of Session, and that the ground on which they are to be reversed or altered should be something like the ground on which the verdicts of juries are at present reversed or altered, namely, that the finding is against evidence,—not that the reviewing judges would have been disposed to take a different view, but that the evidence to no extent whatever supports the finding. That is my opinion as to review on questions of fact. As to questions of law, perhaps there is a little more difficulty. I think there also, theoretically, it would be better that we should get as soon as possible to the Supreme Court, and have the judgment of a tribunal of weight on the question of law; but unless that could be done somewhat cheaply, I think it would result in hardship. If the records of our court were made much shorter than they are—if a short form of pleading were made imperative, or were made the usual form of pleading, probably the expense of bringing the whole case under the review of the Court of Session need not be very great. At all events, the expense of printing, which is always a formidable expense, would not be great; and if it were possible to allow one counsel to plead the case on each side, then a review of the Sheriff-substitute's judgment on the whole case might be got for something like ten or twelve guineas in an ordinary case, and I do not think the country would look upon that as a very great hardship. But if taking the case direct from the Sheriff-substitute to the Court of Session is thought impracticable—and there are great difficulties in the way of it—then I would favour a large diminution in the number of the Sheriffs-principal; and I would say that perhaps six or eight men should be appointed, two of them constituting an appeal court from the judgment of the Sheriffs-substitute,—that these two gentlemen should not be attached to any particular district, but that they should be entitled to deal with appeals from any district of Scotland; for instance, that one pair of them should to-day sit in Glasgow, and the same pair on this day month should sit in Aberdeen, and that they should be purely appeal judges. I think it might be a reasonable thing to put it in the option of the appellant in every case either to go to this mid-appeal court or to go to the Court of Session, as he thought right; and in the course of six or seven years the country would be able to decide what probably there has not been material for satisfactorily deciding yet, whether the local practitioners and their clients wanted to go straight to the Court of Session, or still desired to have a mid-tribunal of appeal. We would then have two gentlemen of experience whose duty should be confined solely to that of appeal judges, and who should perambulate the country, sitting to-day in Glasgow, to-morrow in Perth, the third day in Aberdeen, and so on, taking the place of the Sheriff-principal as appeal judge; and I think we could do without a Sheriff-principal in every other part of his functions.

1996. Would you have them dispose of criminal cases too?—No.

1997. Only civil cases?—Yes. I would be disposed to give more facility for appeal in points of law in all cases. I think it is dangerous to extend the small debt jurisdiction, for example—to make any one man final above the present amount upon a question of law; and I think that these judges might very well dispose of questions of law arising about the smallest sum. The mode in which a question of law might reach them with reference to small sums would require to be considered. Probably an adjusted case would be the most convenient way of raising the question in regard to sums up to £25 or so.

1998. Would you apply that to sums below £12?—I would. I can see no objection to that. I know that sometimes very difficult questions of law arise in the Small Debt Court, and one has to do his best with them; but the points are sometimes extremely fine, and it would be a great satisfaction to the Sheriff-substitute, and I believe also to the public, if he had it in his power to take the opinion of a more competent and experienced tribunal.

1999. Mr. Baxter.—You have no time to decide points of law in the Small Debt Court?—I never hesitate to make avizandum in the Small Debt Court if I feel any difficulty about a case; but it cannot be done in many cases.

2000. The Chairman.—Have you the power of sending the case to your ordinary roll?—Only of consent. But my experience is, that when that is suggested, the parties would rather take a judgment and be done with it.

2001. They would rather take a judgment and be done with it, knowing that that judgment is to be final?—Yes.

2002. How often would you have these appeal judges to sit in each place?—Of course that would depend on the amount of business ready for them. I should say that in the larger towns once in the six weeks or two months would be quite sufficient. The Sheriff-principal of Aberdeenshire comes about once in the two months, and does at least one good day's work of appeals on these occasions. That is exclusive of cases in which there are reclaiming petitions.

2003. Would you have the country divided into districts, and each pair of judges on their circuits to go through a district, holding their courts at certain towns in it?—I would propose that the country should be divided into districts, but I do not see that any benefit would arise from allocating a certain pair to that district.

2004. I do not mean permanently allocating them, but that on each occasion you would have a defined circuit through which they would travel?—Yes, I would propose that.

2005. That is to say, you would have four or five districts, and within each district there would be certain towns in which the judges should hold appeal courts?—Yes.

2006. And these appeals courts should be held in each town once in six weeks or thereabouts?—Yes; but it would not be necessary to sit in many towns, because, for example, a very large district might be attached to Glasgow, and a very large district might be attached to Perth. It would be unnecessary to hold any appeal court except in Perth, for some counties round. Such a large mercantile centre as Dundee might require a regular session to be held there; but probably twelve towns in Scotland would be all that they would require to sit in.

2007. Would you have all the districts which now exist as seats of Sheriff-substitutes continued?—Your Lordship means with a Sheriff-substitute resident there?

2008. Yes?—No, I think the Sheriff-substitutes are far too numerous.

2009. How many would you take off?—I cannot specify any particular number; but I know that several of my brethren complain that they have not got work to occupy their time.

2010. Mr. Adam.—What is the case in your own county?—I can speak to my own two nearest neighbours. I do not know whether Mr. Dove Wilson made any statement on the subject when he was examined; but I know from himself that he has sometimes no more than one full day's good work in the week, and I should imagine that Mr. Skelton has not anything more at Peterhead.

2011. The Chairman.—How would you deal with these two places?—That comes to be a very personal matter.

2012. It is a matter of allocation?—It is very easy for one to say that he can take any amount of work and do it; but my attention has been turned to that question, and my belief is that if Kincardineshire were thrown into Aberdeenshire, and if there was only one Sheriff-substitute in Aberdeen, the Sheriff-substitute at Aberdeen would know scarcely any perceptible difference in the amount of his work.

2013. Would that interfere materially with the convenience of the inhabitants?—Of course it would be more inconvenient for a man living in Peterhead to have to come to Aberdeen, than it is for him at present to take his case before the Sheriff-substitute resident there. In the same way, it is more inconvenient for a man living at Stonehaven to come to Aberdeen, than to go before a Sheriff-substitute resident there; but I believe there would be no inconvenience except at these two places. There would be no inconvenience to the district of country immediately adjoining them. For example, a representation was made a few years ago by the people of Fraserburgh, which is a large town on the same coast of the Buchan district of Aberdeenshire as Peterhead is, and ten miles farther from Aberdeen than Peterhead is, and they stated that they would very much rather come to Aberdeen than go to Peterhead. The arrangement of railways is such that they have to go round half a circle to get to Peterhead, and it suits their convenience very much more to go to a large town like Aberdeen, where they can do other business, than to go to Peterhead. Mr. Dove Wilson has to come to Aberdeen very often, in order to get to some parts of his county, to a circuit town, Banchory, and other places; and I am persuaded that if he were in Aberdeen, he would do the business for the inhabitants of Kincardine just as conveniently as he now does residing in Stonehaven. Aberdeen is on the border of the two counties, and there is just the river Dee running between.

2014. You have said that the resident Sheriffs should be appointed by the Crown. What should be their qualification?—Probably if the Sheriff-substitute were made the resident judge, and he was to be the judge ordinary of the bounds, and have the full duties that at present fall to the Sheriff-principal, except that of appeal judge, the Government would see proper somewhat to increase the emoluments of these gentlemen, and a more experienced class of men would seek to be appointed to these offices than seek them at present. The qualification of having been three years a member of the bar, or three years a practitioner, might perhaps be very properly extended; but I believe that whenever a vacancy occurred, men of larger experience in their profession, and who had had greater success in their profession, would apply for these offices than at present, and that if they were well remunerated there would be no difficulty in getting thoroughly competent men to discharge these duties.

2015. What amount of remuneration do you point at?—In a large place with a large population attached to it, where a man's time is fully occupied every day, and where a certain position must be maintained, I think from £1500 to £2000 a year would be a moderate allowance at present.

2016. Then, as to the judges in the ambulatory court, what should be their qualification, and what sort of emoluments would you suggest for them?—I would suggest that they should certainly not have less than £2000 a year, and I think that might secure a very good class of men; and it would be well if it were understood that naturally the Sheriff-substitute who had given satisfaction to the public, and whose judgments were respected, might succeed to an office of the kind, as being one of greater dignity and of less labour than that of a resident Sheriff.

2017. Would you require a resident Sheriff to be a member of the bar?—That is a matter which I have not considered. We have Sheriff-substitutes appointed both from the bar and from faculties of procurators in the country, and I am not prepared to say that those who have been appointed from our own bar have been more satisfactory Sheriffs than the others. As a member of the bar myself, I should prefer certainly that they were appointed from the bar; but I am not prepared to say that it should be made imperative that they should always be taken from the faculty of advocates.

2018. Would you have the ambulatory judges members of the bar?—Certainly, because their duties would be to dispose of questions of pure law to a very great extent.

2019. Is there a large proportion of the cases that come before you as Sheriff-substitute, of the class that have evidence taken in them?—The great majority are questions of fact.

2020. Are there many appeals upon these questions of fact?—Almost every case is appealed to the Sheriff-principal. Of course there are certain cases that are settled after my judgment, but any case that admits of the least doubt is generally taken to the Sheriff.

2021. Probably when a new Sheriff is appointed there is a run of cases to test his decisions?—Very likely.

2022. Mr. Baxter.—Are the appeals from ultimate judgments decreasing?—We have very few appeals except from ultimate judgments. There are rarely appeals on the proof. There is a very good body of procurators in Aberdeen; and when a question arises about evidence, I talk it over with them, and it is an extremely rare thing that they do not acquiesce in my view. Now and then an appeal is taken when a proof is allowed—that is, on the relevancy—but even that is rare.

2023. Are appeals not taken on dilatory defences?—Very rarely.

2024. Mr. Adam.—Then they are not taken for the purpose of delay?—I think the final appeal may sometimes be taken for the purpose of delay; that must be so, because there are some cases that are quite clear. I do not believe that, except for the great cheapness of getting the Sheriff's opinion, there would be nearly so many appeals. There would not be so many if it was a more formidable thing to do; but I have no doubt they say to themselves, 'The Sheriff-substitute may be wrong, and we will take our chance of trying the Sheriff; and it is always a few weeks' delay.'

2025. The Chairman.—Do you think there would be a greater number of appeals if you had the ambulatory judges you spoke of, and the right of appeal in cases below £12?—I don't believe that it would make any difference, always assuming that the expense of appealing to these judges was about the same. I would be disposed to do away with written arguments in the appeal to such a court as I have proposed. I think these judges should have oral hearings, and that need not be a very expensive matter. I do not think it would make much difference in the number of appeals.

2026. Would you limit the right of appeal to the Court of Session to any different amount from what it is now?—The country seems perfectly well satisfied with the present limit. I must confess that I am against finality. I think that in almost every case, however small the amount, there should be an appeal to another court. But it just comes to be a question of a choice of evils, and the present limit seems to give satisfaction.

2027. You think that a judge reviewing the judgment of the judge in the first instance, has an advantage that the parties come to see more where their case is by that time, and put it to him probably on some different footing, which was not properly presented to the judge in the first instance?—Certainly. They have the advantage of a rehearsal before the Sheriff-substitute; they have the advantage of his note stating the grounds of his judgment. They know, when they come before the appeal judge, that it may be their last chance, or, at all events, that the next step involves considerable expense, and I have no doubt they prepare themselves more carefully. I suspect we all know something of that in the Court of Session.

2028. Is not your experience in the Court of Session consistent with this, that after a case has been considered and disposed of by the Lord Ordinary, when it is appealed to the Inner House, it is presented in a different view, and put upon different legs, so to speak, from what it was before the Lord Ordinary?—I think there is no doubt of that; but I think if the parties in the Sheriff Court knew that the Sheriff-substitute's judgment was not to be so easily got rid of or revised as it is now, they might present their argument to him in a more careful and exhaustive way, particularly in regard to authorities, than they do at present.

2029. Would you impose any further restriction on their going to the court of appeal which you suggest?

J. Comrie Thomson.

—If an appeal were to be given on questions of law in small debt cases up to £25, I think it would be only fair that the appellant should deposit a small sum—say five guineas—by way of preventing the abuse of such appeals; but in ordinary actions above that sum I don't see why any obstacle should be put in the way of such appeals. The Legislature has already done away with caution in advocations, and I am not aware that there is any objection to the principle of that enactment.

2030. In small debt cases under £12, you would give a power of appeal which does not now exist?—I would be disposed to do so on questions of law.

2031. The persons who are litigants in such cases are frequently persons of very limited means; would you require them to make a deposit of five guineas, while you would not require that from parties appealing as to larger sums?—I think that might be met by making it competent to the judge to give leave to appeal without consignation.

2032. Do I rightly understand your scheme to be this, that the office of Sheriff-substitute should cease to exist, and that a Sheriff appointed by the Crown should be resident, doing in person the duties both official and executive, without the aid of any substitute; that his judgments in his judicial capacity should be subject to appeal to an ambulatory court such as you have described, consisting of judges travelling to different districts of the country, and holding courts in certain places at stated intervals of about six weeks?—That is my view.

2033. And that the judges of that ambulatory court should be members of the bar; but you have not expressed an opinion as to whether the Sheriff should be a member of the bar or not?—Your Lordship will allow me to add, that although that is the scheme which seems to me to be the practicable scheme at present, I am of opinion that, if it were practicable, an appeal from the resident Sheriff to the Court of Session is theoretically a better plan; and if it were possible to do away with the mid appeal, it would be desirable. But I can't see that the country is demanding that at present, or that it is very easily carried out at present; and I would give the option to the appellant to take his case to these ambulatory judges or to the Court of Session as he thought fit, and a few years would enable the Legislature to judge whether they would abolish or retain these mid appeal judges.

2034. Mr. Baxter.—And one great reason you have is the present expense of an appeal to the Court of Session?—I think so.

2035. The Chairman.—Have the litigants at present an opportunity of appealing to the Sheriff from the judgment of his substitute, or going direct to the Court of Session?—There is, I think, some doubt as to that.

2036. They generally avail themselves of the judgment of the Sheriff?—I believe there is some doubt as to the competency of going straight from the Sheriff-substitute to the Court of Session; but, in point of fact, they avail themselves of the appeal to the Sheriff in preference.

2037. Mr. Baxter.—You never knew an instance to the contrary?—No.

2039. Would you be prepared to allow the expense of counsel as against the opposite party?—Yes; I don't see why you should not, with a limit as to the amount. That is just a case in which the ordinary discretion ought not to be allowed, and there should be some scale of counsel's fees in such a court, or it might come to be an abuse.

2040. Mr. Baxter.—At present, when the Sheriff comes round in his appeal courts, counsel are not employed?—No; not in Aberdeen. It is too far from Edinburgh. They are often employed in Glasgow and Greenock; but it is a very serious matter to take counsel to Aberdeen.

2041. Mr. Adam.—Would you allow an appeal in all cases to the Court of Session from the judge of the perambulatory court?—No; I think there should be a limit of amount.

2042. Mr. Baxter.—Up to what sum?—£50.

2044. But if both concurred with the resident Sheriff, would you still allow an appeal to the Court of Session?—I think it should be in the power of that court to raise questions of law for the consideration of the Court of Session. That would rarely happen.

2045. You would not allow it as matter of right?—No; but as matter of competency to the court itself to go to the Supreme Court for its opinion on a question of pure law.

2046. The Chairman.—You would not allow it as matter of right, however great the amount at stake?—No; I would not be disposed to do so; but I would leave it entirely in the discretion of the court itself to allow a case to go to the Court of Session for this reason, that it is just possible that these pairs of perambulatory judges might in pairs take different views of the law, and there would be no means of settling it unless there was a power of taking it to the Court of Session, which would settle it for the whole country. I think it is dangerous to shut parties out of an appeal in a question of law.

2048. Mr. Baxter.—Up to £50 I understand you to say, that if the two judges adhered to the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, you would give no right of appeal?—No.

2050. Even below £50?—Yes.

2052. Mr. Adam.—Have you ever seen in your own experience cases where, from local prejudice or otherwise, it was desirable that the Sheriff-depute should try them, and not the local judge?—I never have. Of course it is the duty of the Sheriff-substitute, if he is to prevent an awkwardness of that sort arising, not to mix himself up with public matters, or to become a shareholder of local companies, for example (if he ever has money to do so), and to keep himself apart from the people of the place, except in a social capacity. I have never seen any case in which local prejudice embarrassed a Sheriff-substitute.

2055. The next matter is the jurisdiction with reference to limits?—The first point is as to civil matters. Here also I feel a little delicacy in speaking, because it is rather for the practitioners and the public to say whether we Sheriffs should have more important duties than we have at present. But I do think that some hardship arises to the public from the present limitation of our jurisdiction. For example, in regard to questions of heritable right, there is a great deal of heartburning in country districts from disputed questions of heritable right of small value. Persons of small means fight about some small patch, and that goes on for generations, from father to son. They are debarred from having it settled, because they cannot afford to come to the Court of Session; and I don't see why they should not be allowed to go to the Sheriff Court.

2056. Mr. Baxter.—Don't they often raise the question in a possessory action?—They do; but that is not a satisfactory mode of disposing of it.

2057. The question often comes to be, whether it is a possessory action?—Yes; and very often one sists procedure till declarator be brought. But I must say that, when my attention was first directed to this matter, I felt a little timid in going further than that the Sheriff Court might have jurisdiction up to say £50 in value in heritable questions; but I have come to think that there is truly no good reason why, provided you have competent men to fill the office, the Sheriff Court should not have jurisdiction in heritable matters to any extent, with an easy appeal to the Supreme Court. The difficulty about limiting it in any way that occurs to my mind is this: Suppose the Sheriff is to have heritable jurisdiction up to £50 in value, or £50 of yearly rental, there will be a dispute as to what is the value, that may occupy months in settling; and, on the other hand, if you were to have a hard and fast line, such as the valuation roll, to fix the value, there would then be this hardship, that many bits of property have not their value truly represented in the valuation roll. There is a pretium affectionis which makes a piece of land very valuable to its possessor, which cannot be reached by figures made up by an assessor. There is that great objection to limiting the heritable jurisdiction, if it is to be given to the Sheriff Courts. It is true that we have not the advantage of great lawyers conducting the pleadings in the Sheriff Court, yet we have the assistance of the men practically engaged in constituting feudal rights every day, drawing deeds and considering progresses of titles, and so on. These are duties of immense importance. But looking to the value of the causes already imposed upon the Sheriff-substitute, I have come, not without hesitation, to be of the opinion I have now expressed, that the Sheriff Courts might entertain questions of heritable right within their districts, whatever be their value.

2060. Mr. Baxter.—Would you make removings of all kinds competent to the Sheriff?—Yes. In the case of irritancy of a lease,—an extraordinary removing, do you mean?

2061. Yes?—Yes, there can be little doubt of that.

2062. The Chairman.—You were speaking of cases of status?—I think there is very great difficulty indeed as to such cases. On the one hand there is the hardship that a poor person who has been irregularly married, and who has children, cannot have her marriage declared, or her children legitimated, without coming to the Court of Session. I believe there are many cases of great hardship of that sort. In divorce cases the present system is very demoralizing. Very many married men and women are living together among the humbler classes, and one or other of them to the knowledge of the other living with a paramour. These are two strong reasons why I would make it competent to come to the Sheriff Court with declarators of marriage and actions of divorce. But, on the other hand, I have no doubt that if you were to make declarators of marriage competent, one half of the actions of affiliation would become actions of declarator of marriage on the ground of promise subsequente copula; and if actions of divorce were competent in the Sheriff Court, there would be great risk of collusion. I think there is very great difficulty about that. It is a choice of evils, and I have not yet made up my mind as to which is the most satisfactory way. I don't see my way out of the difficulty. A good deal depends on the district, whether there is great wrong done by the present system, or whether the wrong done is comparatively trifling. I think in Aberdeen there is very great hardship on both sides. I know that there are cases such as I have referred to, of men and women living as man and wife in presence of their children, and one or other, to the knowledge of both, living in adultery. As to declarators of marriage in the same way, people who have been truly married for perhaps a quarter of a century, cannot get their marriage declared, and after the death of one of the spouses great injustice is done.

2063. Mr. Baxter.—And the children are bastards?—Yes. But whether the danger of such delicate questions being brought in the Sheriff Court is not greater than the effect of these abuses, I don't feel myself competent to say. I don't think I have had enough of experience to say. But these views occur to me on each side of the question.

2064. Mr. Adam.—Why do you think there is more danger of collusion in the Sheriff Court than in the superior court?—The number of cases would be very much increased for one thing; and there is a solemnity about the Supreme Court, and about the whole procedure there, that does not belong to the Sheriff Court, and never will.

2070. Mr. Baxter.—You think it is a hardship to be obliged to come to the Court of Session in these cases?—I think so.

2072. Do you see any reason for not bringing the action against the foreigner in the Sheriff Court, when you have founded jurisdiction, instead of going to the Court of Session?—I do not.

2073. Suppose you have a small claim against a foreigner, is it not a hardship to have to go to the Court of Session?—I have heard complaints such as you suggest.

2074. Do you see any objection to going to the

J. Comrie Thomson.

Sheriff Court in such a case?—I cannot say I do. It is a remnant of the old system, when the Sheriff Courts were very different from what they are now. I cannot understand that there should be objection to it. I have already stated that I would be disposed to retain appeals in matters of law in cases that deal with small sums. With an appeal on the law I would be disposed to extend the small debt jurisdiction to £25; that is to say, to make the judgment of the Sheriff who tries the case final, except on a stated case in law, up to £25; and I would also make it competent to bring suspensions of charges on extract registered protests above £25, where the line is already drawn.

2075. Mr. Baxter.—Charges on bills?—Yes.

2077. Do you think it a hardship that ministers should be obliged to come to the Court of Session for power to feu their glebes?—I do. I think the Sheriffs might well be entrusted with that class of cases. That always resolves itself into a remit to the best men of skill you can find.

2080. Do you agree with that?—I agree in the statement of fact that there is great hardship, and I see that there would be great advantage in allowing the Sheriffs to deal with these cases; but there is a danger on the other side, as I have already explained. I am not aware of any other extension of jurisdiction in civil matters to which I wish to refer.

2082. The Chairman.—Was it not recognised in the Small Debt Statute?—Yes, it was. There is another suggestion which I would be disposed to borrow from the County Courts Act. I think it might be competent for the Sheriffs to try cases in a county not their own, or in a district not their own, in the necessary absence of the resident judge of that district. The want of a power to do that at present operates very inconveniently. For example, I find that it would be a very easy thing for a Sheriff-substitute to do the work of his neighbour in his temporary absence; but at present he has no competency to do so. That is a small matter of reform, but it might lead to very good consequences.

2084. Might not your Sheriff give the power to the Sheriff-substitute at Peterhead to try cases in Aberdeen, and a power to you to try cases at Peterhead?—The commissions both of the Sheriff-substitute at Peterhead and of myself extend over the whole county. I am not speaking of my own personal experience of inconvenience, but I know that in other places it is found to be inconvenient, where there are not two Sheriffs within the county.

2085. Mr. Baxter.—Many of the Dundee merchants live in Fife; they have large transactions in Dundee; but as they have only their counting-houses there, and live in Fife, that is not thought a ground of jurisdiction in the Dundee Sheriff Court?—It so happens that no part of the town of Aberdeen is on the other side of the river at present. There is a part of the county of Kincardine, however, which runs into Aberdeenshire, and of that part Banchory is the principal village. Many Aberdeen people live in Banchory, and Kincardineshire people have transactions with them. Now it is a great inconvenience to have to sue people living in that part of Kincardine in Stonehaven.

2086. Don't you think that if the transactions took place in counting-houses in Dundee, that should be sufficient to found jurisdiction?—It certainly would be more convenient, but I don't know that the law ought to be amended in that respect. Generally with merchants the difficulty is got over by us by a prorogation of the jurisdiction on the part of the defender.

2089. Mr. Baxter.—You think they would have time for all the increased duties?—That is a matter of which one cannot judge speculatively. Time would show.

2096. Would there be any inconvenience as to civil matters, such as interdicts, removings, etc., in these outlying districts, if the Sheriff-substitute were taken away?—There certainly would be inconvenience, but it would be a small amount of inconvenience; and it would be compensated by the better use of the time of the gentleman who holds the appointment, and of the money with which he is remunerated. It would be a very convenient thing to have a Sheriff-substitute in every small place for the people of that place.

2098. Mr. Campbell.—You are aware that in Ross-shire there are two Sheriff Courts held, the business of each being very trifling, and the two towns are not more than an hour's distance by railway from each other; but in each there is a Sheriff-substitute. Might not one of these be dispensed with?—I think so. Elgin and Nairn are in the same position. In Ross-shire you have Dingwall, Tain, and Lewis. Of course Lewis is in the position of Tobermory, and probably worse; and you could not very well dispense with a local judge there for police purposes. I may add that I think no alteration has been made upon the distribution or the number of the Sheriff-substitutes since the increased facilities for transit in the country came into operation; and now that we know what these are, I think it would be proper to have some change made in regard to the local judges, both as to their number and their distribution.

2099. The Chairman.—Would you have the Sheriff-substitutes to go into their districts to hold Small Debt Courts?—In some cases, I believe that the necessity for having Circuit Small Debt Courts has been very much diminished within recent years. In Aberdeenshire I take three Circuit Small Debt Courts; and at all events with reference to one of these, which is within fifteen miles by railway from Aberdeen, there is no necessity whatever for it. The people can perfectly well come to Aberdeen, and would just as soon come there. With reference to those farther off—at Huntly, at Tarland, at Turriff, and at Fraserburgh—I think it is very important to continue them. They are very beneficial, and I would have the Sheriff continue to hold these. I think the Small Debt Circuits might, on the whole, be diminished in number. One was abolished in Aberdeenshire last year. It died a natural death. Only two or three cases came to it in the course of a year, and the Home Secretary put an end to it.

2100. Mr. Baxter.—Where was that?—At Old Deer.

2101. The Chairman.—Take such a case as Campbelton, in Argyleshire, which is sixty or seventy miles distant from Inverary; what would you do in such a case as that?—That is a case where there would be considerable inconvenience from not having a Sheriff-substitute, and it would, I suppose, be looked on as a very bold innovation not to have a Sheriff-substitute at Inverary; but if there was to be any change at all, it would probably be in that direction; for I take it that the business at Inverary is less than at Campbelton, and they are nearer another Sheriff at Inverary.

2102. What other Sheriff are they nearer?—Well, I suppose Dumbarton or Greenock is the nearest. That is a case in which there would be great difficulty; but these exceptional cases will be found all over the Highlands.

2104. Mr. Campbell.—There has been no increase in the facilities of communication there within the last thirty years?—No; they remain with steamboat and coach travelling.

2105. In the case of the populous parts of Scotland, circumstances have entirely altered?—Yes, and it is there that a new distribution of Sheriffs is wanted.

2106. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say about the jurisdiction in criminal matters?—Well, I must say I have been struck with what I cannot help calling the waste of the valuable time of the judges of the Supreme Court in their Justiciary Circuits. We have this very day a judge of the Supreme Court trying in the second court in Glasgow what are for the most part police cases, and they are tried there merely because they are cases of accused persons who have been previously convicted; and now that the amount of penal servitude is regulated so carefully by Act of Parliament, I venture to think that there might be a power entrusted to the Sheriffs to sentence to penal servitude up to seven or eight years. I would be disposed to extend the jurisdiction in that direction.

2107. Mr. Adam.—Would you give them power in the class of cases you have mentioned, or in all cases?—I think that clearly two of the pleas of the Crown should not be given them, viz. murder and rape. I think these cases should be tried in Edinburgh. The more solemnity that can be made to attach to the trial of these cases the better. But I don't see why they should not try robbery; and if the Sheriff may, with the assistance of a jury, send a man to prison for two years for his first offence, I cannot see why he should not be entitled to give him seven or eight years' penal servitude for his sixth offence, with the assistance of a jury.

2111. Mr. Campbell.—Do you proceed in your summary court in Aberdeen under the Summary Procedure Act?—No; because I begged that the fiscal would not use it. I don't like it.

2112. You are aware that in several counties that Act is not proceeded under?—It was used in Edinburgh while I acted for a short time as Sheriff-substitute, and it was there I learned my dislike to it. The trouble of keeping the notes is infinitesimal, and the satisfaction to the judges arising from doing so is very considerable.

2113. Mr. Baxter.—Would you have any objection that at a trial by jury there should be a power to amend the libel in comparatively trifling matters, where the amendment would not prejudice the pursuer?—Well, I would leave the law pretty much as it is. I don't see any use of meddling with things unless there are very decided grounds for it.

2114. There was a case in Fife where the prisoner's house was described as being in the wrong parish, and thereby the prosecution failed?—I am against giving more liberty to prosecutors in such matters. I don't see why it should have been described as in the wrong parish.

2115. In another case, where a witness described the property as belonging to himself, and where it was libelled as belonging, say to John Robertson, it turned out that it belonged to John Robertson & Co., and the prosecution failed?—Of course that is a miscarriage, but I think the evil of allowing anything of that sort to be amended would be greater than the evils of the present system.

2116. Mr. Adam.—Would you allow an amendment of the libel with the consent of the prisoner?—Of course in summary complaints it is very different: if you are under the Summary Procedure Act, you may amend. It is in the discretion of the judge, unless it involves a change in the nature of the charge. I don't see why that power should not be extended to all summary complaints; but in a formal libel or indictment I see no reason why it should not be incumbent on the public prosecutor to be precise. The prosecutor has plenty of time to prepare his case. Very often a prisoner is not advised to take an objection to relevancy, because it would be worse for him if it were sustained.

2118. The Chairman.—Have you any other observations to make?—In regard to the form of record, I think we have got a very good form of record for the trial of the great majority of cases in the form that has been introduced by the Debts Recovery Act. It seems to me that the great mass of the cases that come to the Sheriff Court can be very well tried by a short summons, and by the parties at the first hearing, stating to the Sheriff-substitute what are their pleas. Thereupon he records the pleas of the defender, and, if need be, the reply of the pursuer. I find that this works very well under the Debts Recovery Act, and I find that the short form of record under the Sheriff Court Act of 1853 works very well, except that there is no power to record the pursuer's reply under it. I think the discretion should be given to the Sheriff of settling whether that is to be the form of record or not, because there are undoubtedly some cases which, in my opinion, won't try with a short record, and which must have a long record. The best classification that I can give of the cases that require a long record, and those for which a short record is sufficient, is this: cases that naturally would be tried in the Common Law Courts, if we had such a distinction here, might very well be tried with a short record; but equity cases require to have full pleadings —condescendence and defences. In an immense number of cases the short record of summons and minute of defence is used, and found to do very well; and I believe that in almost every case, excepting equity cases, the summons, with a short note of the pleas of both parties, would suffice.

2119. Mr. Baxter.—Has not the Sheriff power at present to determine the kind of record?—Not as I read that clause of the statute; at least what happens practically is this: You have two experienced agents before you, who state to the Sheriff that this is a case in which it is absolutely necessary to have a record. They explain the nature of the case to you, and you feel there is a little doubt about it; and that it would not be easy to reduce the defence to a minute, and that the summons wants amplification in the way of a condescendence. They are at that stage the best judges whether the record should be full or short. I think that, unless the discretion were left in the hands of the Sheriff by Act of Parliament, it would be improper to allow a right to a full record in every case. At present I can rarely have a short record unless both parties agree to have it. In actions of filiation I almost never have a record—I find that they are tried perfectly well without it; and the great class of cases in which the defence is, Never indebted, or prescription, we never think of having a record.

2120. Where agents come and state that there should be a long record, do you often find that there is really no use for it?—I have found cases in which I came to be of that opinion, and in which I gave effect to the opinion by not allowing the expense of the long record, but very few.

2121. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think that the summons in all causes in the Sheriff Court should be in the form of a summons under the Debts Recovery Act?—I think the form of the summons is not a very important matter. Our old form, beginning with the name of the Sheriff-principal, is probably not a bit better than the ordinary English writ, beginning 'Take notice.' I think that is a matter of little importance. Anything that discloses the ground of the claim is sufficient.

2122. Mr. Webster.—And which specifies the demand?—Yes, and the diet of compearance.

2123. The Chairman.—Do you think that much could be done to produce a similarity of procedure in the different classes of cases before the Sheriff?—I think so. I think it is unnecessary that we should have three forms of process, as we have at present—the Sheriff Court form, the Debts Recovery form, and the Small Debt form. As I have said, it matters very little what is the form of the summons, so long as it contains the demand and the diet of compearance; and I see no objection to introducing the Debts Recovery Act form into the whole of the courts of the Sheriff. Whether there is any necessity for recording the defender's pleas up to cases under £12, I am not prepared to say. People are well enough satisfied with cases being tried as they are. In point of fact, particularly when agents appear in the Small Debt Court, the Sheriff hears the defence, and for his own guidance notes it, and he regulates the evidence by the defence he has noted. I don't see why he should not note it as matter of necessary form, and make it part of the process. But I think we might have similarity of process in all the three courts.

2124. The Chairman.—And blank forms of summonses printed?—Yes.

2125. Mr. Baxter.—To serve the whole three?—Yes.

2126. The Chairman.—Would you give the party notice which court he was to attend?—Yes, by the heading of the summons.

2127. That might be in writing?—Yes, or printed. At present we have printed forms for the Small Debt, and for the Debts Recovery Act.

2128. And that system might be extended to ordinary cases?—Yes.

2129. Mr. Webster.—Have you anything to say as to summary procedure—petition, and interdict?—I think the answers I have given as to proceedings begun by summons apply there too,—a short note of the pleas in answer, and where absolutely necessary a record.

2130. But commencing, as at present, with a petition?—Yes. It may be called a bill, and made shorter, but I don't think that makes much difference.

2135. He has the summons, the note of defence, and the evidence?—Yes, that is all.

2136. Mr. Adam.—He has not the advantage of hearing parties?—No; the only additional assistance he has is a note of authorities.

2137. Do you think that is satisfactory?—No. I have mentioned that the form of record in the Debts Recovery Act is working very well; but there is scarcely any other part of the Act of which I can speak in the same way.

2140. The Chairman.—You say you approve of the form of record, but that you cannot speak with the same approval of other parts of the Act. What, in your opinion, are the prominent objections to it?—In the first place, I think that there is a very artificial limitation of the cases to which it applies. There is no reason why it should apply to certain debts only. But it is more in matters of detail that I object to it, and on account of its unworkableness. For example, one of the Lords Ordinary has held, with reference to appeals, that as both parties are not before the Sheriff-principal, his judgment must be dealt with as a decree in absence requiring a charge before diligence is done.

2141. Mr. Webster.—When a case has come to appeal to the Court of Session under the Debts Recovery Act, is it not held that the case must go back to the Sheriff to give a workable decree for the expenses, and that the Court of Session cannot give decree even in that court for the costs incurred?—I believe that has been held. So far as I have been able to gather from my own experience, the Act is found to be unworkable more from oversight than anything else. It might very easily be re-written without changing any of its general principles, except that I think it is desirable to extend it far beyond the debts to which it applies. If it were recast, I think it might easily be made a most workable statute; but there are so many small omissions in it, that it is found very difficult to work it securely. For example, it says you may plead as a counter claim another debt of the same nature and amount as those which may be sued for under itself. Now, this case has happened: a man sues for a book debt amounting to £13, being £1 above the Small Debt limit: the person he sues has a counter claim against him amounting to £11: it has been doubted seriously whether he can plead the counter claim of £11 as against the principal claim of £13, because the Act says it must not only be of the nature, but of the amount which may be sued for under the Act. That is one of the difficulties which need not be found in the Act, for it was not intended; but it bristles with little points of that sort.

2142. Mr. Campbell.—Is there not an obvious omission in regard to sequestrations currente termino?—Yes. There is an endless variety of questions as to the interpretation of the class of cases to which it applies; and I have felt, when parties agreed that a particular case was a proper one to try under it, that it was a pity for the judge to refine too much as to whether it fell under the old triennial prescription statute or not; and I suspect many judgments have been pronounced throughout the country which might be reducible, as not referring to claims which fell within the Act. I am quite sure that a little revision would put it right; but at present it is not easily worked.

2144. Mr. Harrison.—You have not found that many parties have attempted to reduce the judgments?—I am not aware of any such case in Aberdeenshire.

2145. So that the public have appreciated the benefits conferred by the Act, and have overlooked its imperfections?—It is very much used in Aberdeen. I have a roll of cases under it every Friday. Generally, half of them are decrees in absence; but that is a great advantage to the public, because they get their decrees in absence for 3s. 1d.

2146. The Chairman.—Have you found any objection among the practitioners in your court to the remuneration to which they are entitled under the Act, or to the principle by which it is regulated?—Yes, they object to the amount of the remuneration in contested cases, and to the principle by which it is regulated. I think they feel themselves insulted by the principle, and they complain of it as not the way in which professional gentlemen should be dealt with. They have felt it very much. In many cases it is a great hardship; and if a man is to do the work which he must do to carry his client's case through, he ought, in many cases, to get a great deal more than the £3, 3s. or £5, 5s. which he is allowed. He does far more than £3, 3s. worth of work. That is a matter on which I am certainly prepared to express my unqualified disapproval of the Act, and I know that the Aberdeen advocates would join with me in doing so. Some of them look on it in this light, that if a man has a great deal of business of that kind, it will pay very well on the whole, and that argument has been used to me in reference to modifying expenses. They say, 'You must not modify here, because, though we get £3, 3s. here for little work, we have done £9, 9s. worth of work in another case, for which we only got £3, 3s.' There is a great deal in that. But I don't think it is a fair position to put members of the profession in.

2147. Do you think you have the power to modify?—I did not, till I saw an opinion of the Supreme Court, which made me doubt.

2148. Do you think there ought to be a more particular table of fees and an account rendered?—I think it should be regulated by the ordinary table of fees. The cases are between £12 and £50. I would reduce the court dues to a minimum, but I don't see why the practitioners should not be properly remunerated for their work. There is an option to the parties to appear without agents, so that no man is debarred from coming there; and if the practitioners are not properly remunerated, that class of cases will fall into the hands of men into whose hands it is better that they should not fall.

2150. Mr. Baxter.—Do you find cases brought into your ordinary court below £50, which might be brought under the Debts Recovery Act?—No; I am not aware of any. The plea would be sure to be stated that only debts recovery expenses could be given.

2151. Mr. Campbell.—Is it the practice in your court, where the proof is taken, for the parties to request that the Sheriff-substitute should make a note of the evidence?—In about one-half of the cases I am asked to take notes, and in about one-half they say they don't wish it. I always rather encourage the taking of the notes almost as a matter of course. I rarely put the question, but set the clerk to take them.

2152. You generally employ the clerk?—Always; and unless they say they don't want the notes taken, I let it be done, because I am not disposed to have finality in questions, unless it be very clearly expedient; and if the case is to go to the Sheriff, it is a pity that it should go to him without the merits being before him.

2154. The Chairman.—Have you anything to state in regard to the investigation of facts in civil cases?—I think there is room for some change in that matter. There is a considerable number of cases in which it is a great pity that in the Sheriff Court we should not have the advantage of a jury, particularly cases of damages. I don't know any class of cases which puzzle me more than cases where I have to assess damages. Take a case of slander, for example. It requires a knowledge of the circumstances of the parties, of the tone of the district, of a hundred little things that a judge is not likely to pick up very quickly, and which perhaps a judge is not entitled to use in coming to a decision, which would be perfectly well known to five or seven jurymen; and I am certain that their judgment on a matter of that kind would give a great deal more satisfaction than that of a single judge. I think I have already said that it appears to me to be very unsatisfactory, that one man who has not seen the witnesses should review the decision of another man who has seen them, upon the facts, particularly when the materials for that review are the notes of evidence which have been taken. If the facts are to be left to the determination of the Sheriff-substitute in the first instance, with a review by the Sheriff-principal, then I am of opinion that the facts should be more carefully recorded; and, putting aside that, it is very hard work indeed to be taking constant proofs. I believe it would be more for the interest of the parties, with the view of the appeal Sheriff dealing with the case, if a shorthand writer took the notes to the dictation, but only to the dictation, of the Sheriff.

2155. That is, where you have no jury?—Yes.

2156. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think it a matter of consequence that the agents should see what is going on, and that the Sheriff-substitute should not write continuously, without their knowing what is being put down?—To have the agent superintending your writing, according to the common system, is simply intolerable. That is a thing that I think no Sheriff in Scotland is likely to stand, because it puts him out altogether. My practice—and I find it to work pretty well—is to take all my proofs in court. The witness is put into the witness-box; the agents stand and examine the witnesses; and the case is conducted as much as possible like a jury trial, but no one knows what I have written till I read it to the witness.

2157. Is that satisfactory?—It is quite satisfactory so long as my judgment is to be final, because my notes will always contain what is sufficient for my own judgment; but I don't think it is satisfactory for the judge of review.

2158. The Chairman.—You read over the notes to the witness?—Yes, in presence of the agents, and any suggestion is attended to at once; but it is impossible to be constantly stopped by the questions, 'Have you got down so and so?' or, 'What have you got down?' That would prevent any one from taking notes with intelligence.

2164. By whom reviewable?—That would raise the question we have already been speaking of. I should say by the Court of Session, or if not, by the two judges of appeal.

2165. Mr. Webster.—Suppose the present system of the double Sheriffship to be continued, would you allow the judge who presided at the trial to set aside the verdict?—Sitting alone?

2166. Yes?—No, I don't think so, because that would virtually be the judge setting up his own opinion against that of the jury. But I think it would make a very satisfactory tribunal to review the verdicts of juries if the two perambulatory judges were to deal with evidence on a motion for a new trial, with the assistance of the judge who presided at the trial.

2170. Mr. Webster.—From your experience and observation as to the amount of damages awarded by juries and the amount awarded by Sheriffs, which would you say was the fairest tribunal in the assessment of damages?—You find juries sometimes making outrageous blunders. I don't think you will find Sheriffs making such outrageous blunders, but it is always a very difficult thing for a Sheriff to say in an action of slander whether he is to give, for example, £5 or £50. That depends on a hundred considerations that he has not before him. To call a man in one rank of life a liar or a thief is a very serious thing; but if he is in another rank of life, it is not thought much about. I think that should be taken into account in fixing the damage, and I think the man's neighbour can tell that much better than I can.

2171. The Chairman.—Has your observation the same weight when the parties are in a different rank of life from the jury?—Yes; it has this importance, that the persons cited as jurymen, though not of the same rank, would have a knowledge of the failings, habits, and modes of thought of the persons whose case they were trying.

2172. Such as the Sheriff has not?—Such as the Sheriff has not; because, in a jury of seven men, the chances are that three of them may be of the same rank.

2173. Mr. Webster.—Would you wish the jury to decide on their local knowledge and impressions, or on the evidence brought before them?—Upon the evidence, in the question of whether it is to be a verdict for the pursuer or for the defender; but they are to bring their local knowledge to bear on the question whether £10 or £100 is the proper sum to award as damages.

2177. Have you any further observation to make on the writs, pleadings, and the investigation of facts in civil matters?—In regard to pleadings, I may say, that although there is no great outcry, so far as I know, about delay in the Sheriff Courts, yet the procedure would be very much facilitated, and made much more rapid, if there were an enactment making it peremptory to lodge papers within a certain time, and if the system of consents were abolished in the Sheriff Courts, as it has been in the Court of Session. I find that out of fifty cases which I caused the Sheriff-clerk to look at—the cases which came first to his hand—upwards of one-fourth of the papers were lodged with consents not within the specified time, or upon cause shown.

2178. Did it appear to you that in any of these cases repeated orders had been disregarded?—Yes; in the majority of them it was so. In fact, what generally happens is this: there is an order pronounced for condescendence and defence in ten days and six days, and no more is heard about it for perhaps two months; one of the parties then comes up with his condescendence, and asks leave to lodge it. The other party consents; that is inscribed on the back of it, and it is received. The same process is gone through with the defence, though perhaps to an exaggerated extent, and it happens also with the revised papers.

2179. The Chairman.—Have you any reason to suppose that that is done without communication with the client, or without his concurrence?—That is a question which I have no opportunity of judging of; but I know that agents in the largest practice have said to me, that they wished there were peremptory diets fixed for lodging their papers, because they would then not be in the position of constantly granting favours or asking favours; but so long as the present system existed of lodging papers at any time was competent, so long would it continue to be done.

2180. They could always avoid asking favours, I suppose?—Well, they are tempted to ask favours, by the facility of getting them.

2181. If an agent followed the practice of not asking, he would have less delicacy in refusing; but if he asks, he cannot very well refuse?—No.

2186. What interest has the Sheriff in driving on parties faster than it is their interest to go?—He has the interest of the litigants and the public to attend to. No sensible litigant interferes with his agent in a matter of that kind; he leaves it to his agent's discretion. But there is certainly a grievous abuse in the way papers are admitted, and that is the main source of delay, as the interlocutor sheets show. The provision for reviving a cause of consent is also abused. I believe there are counties in which the Sheriff declines to revive more than once of consent. I think there is ground for holding that that is not quite a correct construction of the statute; and in many counties, Aberdeenshire among others, we have pages of interlocutor sheets covered with 'revives of consent' before the six months expire. So long as there is no check to that, I must say I think it is an abuse.

2187. Mr. Campbell.—In those cases where for years a case has been kept alive by consents, that can scarcely occur owing to any consideration of convenience of the agents, but must arise from the disposition of the litigants themselves?—Not always. If you put it for years, that may be so.

2188. The Chairman.—The remedy you suggest is, that before the period expires, cause should be stated to the Sheriff for extending the period?—Quite so; that it should not be a matter of course that if an agent secures his opponent's consent, he shall get in his paper whenever he chooses.

2189. If he asks for delay, and his opponent says he has no objection to the delay, would the Sheriff insist on knowing the reason, and decide whether it was a sufficient reason?—Probably the Sheriff in such a case would very rarely refuse to receive the paper; but at all events, the mere statement of reasons in court would be a better system than the present.

2191. Is there any reason why that should exist?—I think our forms of process have been very much decried, from cases being allowed to go on for such a length of time. They point to the first and last interlocutor in the cause, and that arises very much from the way in which it is worked by the agents.

2193. What is your opinion as to reclaiming petitions and answers on appeal?—In stating my reasons for preferring a perambulatory court of two judges who should hear appeals, I said that I think it would be better to abolish written pleadings altogether, and to have all the appeals conducted by oral hearings. I have had no opportunity of judging whether reclaiming petitions and answers are good things or not. I don't require to read them, and they are not tempting to read otherwise. Then, in regard to the power of amending the record, I think it is not at present in a very satisfactory position. The Sheriff-substitute cannot amend the record; the Sheriff-principal, as I read the statute, can, upon the Sheriff-substitute pronouncing a judgment which brings the record before him. I don't know why the Sheriff-substitute should not be allowed to amend the record before he pronounces his judgment. There is a clumsy way of doing it, which is resorted to without objection—and I don't know that it is clearly competent—of making avizandum to the Sheriff with a view of his doing so. That is plainly not a good thing. I believe it is for the interest of all concerned that the Sheriff-substitute should have the power of amending a closed record.

2198. Have you ever seen, in your experience, cases in which it would have been desirable to have had a public investigation?—No; I think a public investigation is not nearly so good as the present form of private investigation, provided it has proper solemnity given it by the Sheriff superintending it, letting the people of the district where it happens feel that it is being looked after, and that there is something more than the mere perfunctory sending of two policemen to gather what information they can get. If the Sheriff and the Procurator-fiscal go down and attend the inquiry, and that is known in the district, and the result of their inquiry is reported to the Crown office, it is much more likely to produce good effect.

2199. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think that it would injure the feelings of relatives to have a public examination?—Yes; and it often leads to miscarriage of justice when the trial comes.

2200. Mr. Campbell.—Are you yourself invariably present when the declaration of a prisoner is being taken?—Certainly.

2201. Do you, in the ordinary case, interrogate the prisoner on the charge, or is that done by the Procurator-fiscal?—Generally I begin with the first few questions, and then the Procurator-fiscal, who is at my side, puts the questions; but I would always be ready to check the form of the question, though I have never occasion to do it. I make suggestions, and sometimes I wind up the examination with a few questions. It is virtually my conducting the examination, though the Procurator-fiscal puts the questions.

2202. Do you dictate the answers to be taken down?—Not always. I cannot say that I do it right through an examination. Generally the Procurator-fiscal does it.

2203. Mr. Adam.—If it came to be a matter of delicacy, you would do it?—Yes; and in charges of a capital sort I take it very much into my own hands, with the Fiscal's assistance.

2204. Mr. Baxter.—You see that it is fairly put down?—Yes; but I never have to check an attempt at unfairness on the part of the Fiscal.

2205. Mr. Adam.—You never saw him endeavouring to entrap a prisoner?—Never the least approach to it. As to the precognition of witnesses, I have always understood that, theoretically at all events, it is the duty of the Sheriff to be present and conduct these precognitions. It is simply impossible that he can be present during the precognition of witnesses; and the practice is, that in cases of murder the Sheriff is present at the precognition, but in no other cases; and I don't see how it is possible for him to be present but in these exceptional cases. I always have the feeling, I must say—and I know it is shared by others—that I am not doing all that the law expects me to do. It is better that it should be declared to be the Sheriff's duty, and he should do it, or that it should be declared to be unnecessary.

2207. And assist with your advice?—Quite so.

2208. It is part of your duty to have the offence investigated?—Yes; and now and then, in the case of a very unwilling witness, if the Procurator-fiscal suggest to me that he would like me to be present, I always go; but these are exceptions.

2209. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose that would take up your whole time?—It would be quite impossible to do it.

2211. Mr. Webster.—And with perfect fairness?—With perfect fairness.

2212. The Chairman.—The case is transmitted to Crown counsel; and if they consider any further investigation necessary, they order it?—They do.

2214. And if upon the trial it turns out that the evidence is very different from the precognition which the Fiscal has taken, then the Fiscal is made responsible for that, or has to explain how it has come about?—Yes.

2215. So that all these are checks?—Yes.

2216. Mr. Webster.—Would you allow the prisoner, as matter of right, to demand that his declaration should be read to the jury?—I would be disposed to print the declaration at the end of every indictment.

2217. Whatever it contained?—Whatever it contained. I don't see why it should not be used as a matter of necessity in every case.

2219. Mr Adam.—Would you print it before it had been proved?—That might raise some difficulty, but I think it should be furnished to the jury in every case, after it has been proved. It is undoubtedly the most powerful weapon for conviction that is generally in the hands of the public prosecutor; but if it is fairly taken, the object of the trial being to punish the guilty person, I don't see why it should not be laid before the jury.

2220. The Chairman.—Would you put it with the indictment into the hands of the jury?—Yes; upon its being proved.

2221. But not till then?—Not till it was proved.

2222. Mr. Baxter.—But you would give the power to the prisoner in all cases to require it to be used if he thought it for his advantage?—Yes.

2223. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say about review beyond what you have stated?—I think I have nothing further to say than I have already said on that subject.

2224. In regard to review by the Court of Session in civil matters, do you think that the form which now exists is that which you would retain?—Your Lordship means the simple appeal under the Act of last session?

2225. Yes?—Yes, I think it is better than the former note of advocation. I see no objection to that.

2226. Do you approve of dispensing with caution?—That is a matter on which I think we have yet to get experience. I confess I was a little doubtful about it; but I have not had sufficient experience to make my opinion of the slightest value.

2227. You have already spoken as to the costs under the Debts Recovery Act; have you anything to say as to the costs of litigation in other procedure?—I have no suggestion to make, unless it be this, that I think if it fell to the court to review the rate of charges, they would be disposed rather to increase the charges which agents are entitled to make, than to diminish them. It seems to me that they are paid at a less rate than other professional men; but as to the mode of awarding costs, I have no suggestion to make.

2228. Mr. Webster.—Would you alter the scale of costs in any respect if you had the perambulatory appeal court, keeping in view where procurators might have to go to plead their case?—But I would propose that they should hold an appeal court in those towns in which for the most part there is a body of procurators, so that their expense would not be greater than at present.

2230. The Chairman.—Supposing there was not to be such a change as you have suggested in regard to the procurators, do you think the procurators in one Sheriffdom should be allowed to practise in any other Sheriffdom?—Certainly, if the arrangements as to practitioners were to be made now for the first time, I should say that they should be entitled to practise all over Scotland; but I think it is a little dangerous to interfere with the rights and interests of old existing corporations and societies of practitioners.

2231. Mr. Baxter.—All other exclusive privileges have been done away with?—True, but I am not prepared to say that this is the time to do it. I don't think it is one of those evils calling for change.

2232. Have not the agents in Aberdeen exclusive privileges?—Yes.

2233. Do you know what they are?—No, I don't know exactly what they are.

2238. But they will all pass under it now?—Then probably I might answer the question in a different way, with reference to other parts of the country, when the qualifications are the same as in Aberdeen.

2239. Keeping that in view, don't you think they should be admitted generally?—I think if all the procurators in the inferior courts were examined by the same board, and had the same qualifications, and somewhat the same fees to pay, there could be no objection to their practising generally.

2240. Do you think they should be admitted in Dundee, and not in Aberdeen?—No; but till within the last few years the qualifications necessary to become a procurator in Glasgow, or a solicitor in Dundee, or an advocate in Aberdeen, were very different; and Aberdeen still requires a higher qualification than any other body.

2241. But speaking now of the present system?—I think that has introduced a very important change.

2242. And you think they should not be debarred now from practising in any town in Scotland?—When you have a sufficient number of procurators passed in each court under the new system, I would be disposed to admit them; but I don't know if there is a score of them.

2243. Why not admit the new members?—That may be done.

2245. Do you think that a person going from Dundee to settle in Aberdeen ought to be required to pay those fees for admission before he is allowed to practise?—He has other privileges. When a man becomes a member of the Society of Advocates of Aberdeen, he has other privileges besides that of practising in the Sheriff Court. He has the right to a very valuable library, to widows' funds, and a great many others. I don't see why, if a man duly qualified chooses to come to Aberdeen to settle, he should be forced to pay those fees, unless he were also to get those privileges. I don't see why he should pay the fees necessary for becoming an Aberdeen advocate, merely for the right to practise in the Sheriff Court.

2246. Mr. Baxter.—Supposing he does not wish to have these privileges?—Then I would allow him to practise, if he had the general qualification to which you have alluded.

2247. The Chairman.—You have very properly used the expression the Society of Advocates. The Solicitors of Aberdeen have, for a particular reason, the privilege of being called advocates?—Yes.

2248. They are not members of the Scotch bar?—No.

2250. In that case do you think he ought to be entitled to a retiring allowance?—I think he should be put on the same footing as other civil servants. I ought to add that when I say it would be better to debar the Procurators-fiscal from private practice, I am speaking only theoretically, because I know of no instance in which it has been suggested that a Procurator-fiscal with even a large amount of private practice has allowed it to interfere in the slightest degree with his duties. I never heard that whispered. But in theory I say that it is better to have a totally independent public officer.

2253. Do you find that any inconvenience to the public service arises from that?—No, I am not aware.

2257. Not at all?—Not at all. They don't sit regularly as a Burgh Court.

2258. Is there a Dean of Guild Court in Aberdeen?—Yes. There is sometimes a court to consider applications to repair and remove ruinous tenements, but not often.

2260. Mr. Baxter.—Do the police do anything with reference to that?—Yes, under the Act.

2262. Is that under a general statute?—They have a local Police Act, and I believe that to be a very satisfactory court. I am not sure whether it is common; but in Aberdeen the Fiscal of that court is a member of the Society of Advocates. He is a partner of the county Fiscal, and the business in the Aberdeen Police Court is, I believe, conducted to the great satisfaction of the public by the magistrates. I cannot but think that that is partly owing to their having a well qualified Fiscal, who exercises his discretion, and does not scruple to stop a case.

2263. Are there any judicial functions exercised in matters of debt by the Justices of the Peace in Aberdeenshire?—There has been one Justice of Peace Small Debt Court held since I went to Aberdeen, but it had not been held for many years before, and has not been held since.

2265. I suppose they exercise jurisdiction in revenue cases under statute?—They sit very often in a quasi criminal capacity, administering Acts of Parliament.

J. Comrie Thomson.

2266. Do they sit in questions of granting licences?—Yes.

2269. The feeling you allude to would exist whatever the tribunal was?—I have no doubt of it, except that the magistrates are attacked on the ground of having personal leanings from their having an interest in public-house property, and so on. Whether these complaints are well founded or not, I have no means of judging; but they are made. And there is, on the other hand, a good deal of public outcry as to taking the jurisdiction from them; but I believe it would be the same whatever tribunal were to exercise it.

2272. Do country gentlemen come in and attend?—Not to any large extent. I may mention that it has occurred to me very often that it would be desirable that Justices of the Peace should try petty offences in their own localities. In such a town as Turriff, or in Huntly, they might very well dispose of petty thefts, petty assaults, and petty breaches of the peace. That would save the public the expense of bringing prisoners and witnesses fifty or sixty miles to Aberdeen, and the case might be very well disposed of by them. In Huntly they have the Lindsay Police Act, and they have Commissioners of Police, who try petty offences within the town; but I think it would be a good thing, and it would certainly relieve me of a great deal of work, and would relieve the county of a great deal of expense, if the country gentlemen residing in that district would try petty offenders.

2273. Do you know any reason why they don't?—I am not aware of any reason.

2274. Is there any Procurator-fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court?—There is.

2275. Where does he reside?—There is a Procurator-fiscal of the Justice of Peace Court of Aberdeenshire in Aberdeen; and, if I mistake not, in Huntly, Peterhead, and Fraserburgh, a writer holds the commission of Procurator-fiscal of Justice of Peace Court for each of these districts respectively; and if the Justices were willing to act, I am certain that it could be done without difficulty.

2276. Mr. Baxter.—In cases of petty breaches of the peace, where the county constable apprehends a prisoner, is he brought all the way to Aberdeen and tried before you?—Yes; or to Peterhead, if he is within the Buchan district.

2277. The Chairman.—That is attended with expense?—Yes; and it seems to me rather to be magnifying the offence to bring a prisoner all that way.

2278. Do you know of any reason why the Justices do not act?—No, I do not.

2279. Mr. Baxter.—Is there no County Police Court?—My summary criminal court is the County Police Court, you may say. There is no other.

2280. The Chairman.—Are there any burghs of regality or barony in your district?—There are the royal burghs of Kintore, which is the smallest in Scotland, and Inverury. In Inverury the magistrates try petty cases. And within the last few years certain populous places adopted the Police Act; and respectable shopkeepers and others, inhabiting these villages, deal with them in their capacity of Police Commissioners.

2281. In both these burghs?—Not in Kintore, I think; but in Inverury and Huntly they do, and at this time I hear they are endeavouring to arrange the same thing for Turriff. Petty cases are also tried at Fraserburgh by the Baron Bailie.

2283. Do they do so in civilibus?—No; to no extent.

2284. You approve of the Police Commissioners exercising jurisdiction in regard to petty offences?—Certainly, for small offences.

2285. Do you think there is no evil in the magistrates not exercising jurisdiction in civil matters?—I do.

2286. You think there would be no advantage in their doing so?—No advantage.

2287. And no evil would result to the community if they were deprived of the right to do so?—I think not.

2288. Mr. Adam.—Does not the expense of trying criminals before Justices of the Peace fall upon the county?—Yes.

2289. And in burghs, when they are tried there before a police magistrate, the burgh pays?—It is upon the assessment.

2290. Mr. Webster.—In the cases that go through the Sheriff to Crown counsel, the public pay?—When they are reported to Crown counsel, I don't think they are fit cases to be tried by lay magistrates.

2292. The Chairman.—Have you any other observations or suggestions to make to the Commissioners?—I think not, unless I may have omitted to state, at the beginning of my examination, that even if the present system of Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff-depute were retained, I would still be of opinion that it would be proper to ameliorate the condition of the Sheriff-substitute as to his status, and to continue the Sheriff-depute as merely an appeal judge in cases from the county.

2293. You would have him no longer an executive officer?—No. I put it in this way, and it is quite right to speak plainly about such things—When a Sheriff-depute comes down to his county, there can be no question that in the eyes of the practitioners in his court, and of the public, the Sheriff-substitute is for the time discredited. He is put on one side: he ceases to exist.

2294. You think he is superseded?—He is superseded, and the superseding of him necessarily involves a certain discrediting of him for the time with the public. I think that is a state of things which is undesirable. I have not experienced anything of the sort myself, because the Sheriff-principal of Aberdeenshire has been all his life a Sheriff-substitute, and knows the feeling. But I know it is not so in other counties. Of course it is not the fault of individual Sheriffs; but it is, I think, the fault of the system. If such important duties are laid on the shoulder of the Sheriff-substitute as now are, he should be recognised, I think, as an independent officer, and not as the mere depute of another judge, who is supposed to be responsible for the judicial affairs of the county.

2295. You think the Sheriff exercising the executive powers ought not to exercise these by a substitute?—Quite so.

2296. In any case?—In any case; in fact, that the theory of substitution should be done away with.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

ROBERT SCONCE, Esq., examined.

Robert Sconce.

2297. The Chairman.—You are one of the Sheriff-substitutes of Stirlingshire?—I am.

2298. You are resident at Stirling?—Yes.

2300. Falkirk is also in the county of Stirling?—It is.

2301. There is a resident Sheriff-substitute there?—There is.

2302. Who is there at present?—Mr. Robert Bell.

2303. Before you became a Sheriff-substitute, you were a practitioner?—Yes; I was a writer in Stirling for thirty years.

2304. I believe you held the office of Procurator-fiscal for some time?—I did. I was joint Procurator-fiscal for eighteen years, and sole Procurator-fiscal for seven years.

2305. Is there a considerable amount of business done in the civil courts at Stirling?—A good deal.

2306. Does anything occur to you as important to be stated to the Commissioners with reference to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of a Sheriff and his substitutes?—I propose to consider together the constitution of the Sheriff Court as consisting of Sheriffs and Sheriff-substitutes, and the review in civil matters within the court itself, and by superior courts, and I would propose to divide the subject into two: 1*st*, the appellate jurisdiction of the Sheriff; and 2*d*, the other duties of the office. My opinion is that the appellate jurisdiction of the Sheriff should not be continued; and that there should only be a direct appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Inner House of the Court of Session. My reasons are these:—The recent abolition of the Court of the Lord Ordinary as an appeal court, seems to me to show that the legal and general opinion of the country is, that there should be no intermediate tribunal between the judge of primary jurisdiction or primary instance and the Supreme Court. I think that if the reason was sufficient for abolishing the Court of the Lord Ordinary, who is a superior judge, it is still more strong for abolishing the Sheriff as an inferior judge.

2307. You mean the abolishing of the right to bring an appeal before the Lord Ordinary?—Yes. The duty of the Sheriff-substitute is not merely roughly to indicate his opinion; he has to digest the case, and arrange and fully prepare his judgment,—not only to show his reasons for it, but keeping in view that the case may be taken for the consideration of a proper and full appeal court, to facilitate its disposal there; and I think that the interposition of another single judge of the Inferior Court, as his opinion cannot be held conclusive, is, at least, unnecessary. I think, further, that the constitution of the English County Courts, where there is no intermediate appeal between the judge and the courts at Westminster, affords a precedent for the view which I have been suggesting. I am of opinion that if the Sheriff Courts were now to be established, it would not likely occur that two officers in the relative position of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute would be appointed. Further, I have the opinion that the conception of the office of Sheriff, as established by statute in 1748, contemplated a resident judge and magistrate, and that there was no idea, as there is no provision, in the statute for the Sheriff being an appeal judge, which, it seems to me, arose from the Sheriff becoming non-resident, and appointing originally as substitutes persons who were not qualified for the judicial office. I further have the opinion that the recent abolition of the process of advocation, and the taking of the case by appeal directly to the Inner House, without caution, as a step in the cause, and the appointment of a special court for hearing certain kinds of cases under appeal from the Sheriffs, the improvements of the form of process, and if there is anything defective, certain to be amended by the report of this Commission,—all these things satisfy me that cases in the Court of Session will be speedily and cheaply determined, and that the object of keeping up the Sheriffs as an intermediate appeal tribunal is thereby removed. My belief is, that the reports of the decisions in the Court of Session do not show that, when the Sheriff and the Sheriff-substitute have differed, the Sheriff-substitute has been found more often wrong, although, from the Sheriff being an appeal judge sitting upon the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, with new and sometimes better argument, a sounder judgment might be expected from him, in the same way as a better judgment is expected from the Inner House than from the Lord Ordinary. My observation further is, that when the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute happen to differ, just because of that difference, small cases which might well have ended in the Sheriff Court, are carried to the Court of Session. I have further to say, that in estimating the relative chance of accuracy of the views of the Sheriff or the Sheriff-substitute, it has to be kept in view that the Sheriff-substitute superintended the preparation of the record, took the proof, and had opportunities, from time to time, of considering the case, not all at once, but the pleas and facts as they were gradually developed. Having taken the proof himself, I think he had a better opportunity of coming to a just conclusion than a single judge sitting by himself upon the case as finally adjusted and completed. I cannot but think also that the delay which arises from the appeals is prejudicial. I have before me a parliamentary return made on the motion of Mr. Baxter, M.P., for the year 1863, giving the average number of days between the last interlocutor appealed from and the last interlocutor deciding the appeal; and I find that one district gives 102 days, another 115, others 60, 118, 31, 50, 97, 111, 76, 103, 106, 38, 26, 39, 104, 22, 31; and there are others, but I have just selected a few at random. Some of these appeals, I have no doubt, were in the same case, though I have no means of checking how many there were in that position.

2308. Mr. Shand.—You use the expression 'from the last interlocutor?'—I quoted from the words of the return.

2309. Mr. Baxter.—Whether these appeals were from the final judgment is not stated?—I can give the numbers of these.

Robert Sconce.

2310. What you read had reference to that and also preliminary appeals?—It was between the date of the interlocutor appealed from, and the date of finally disposing of that appeal; and it included both preliminary and other appeals. That brings me to this point, that if the Sheriffs are retained as appeal judges, at least these preliminary appeals should be abolished.

2311. Mr. Baxter.—And that there should be only one appeal from the final judgment?—No appeal till the final judgment, or at the same stage at which the case may be carried to the Court of Session.

2312. Mr. Webster.—Even though leave were granted?—Except with the leave of the Sheriff-substitute.

2314. Mr. Webster.—You would anticipate that the Sheriff-substitute would give his consent to appeal where the plea disposed of was one that might, if decided otherwise, exhaust the case?—I have no doubt he would. The same parliamentary return shows, that in 1863 there were in one county 21 preliminary appeals, and 25 on the merits; and in others the numbers were 29 preliminary to 31 on the merits, 17 to 26, 23 to 31, 44 to 55, 168 to 202, 36 to 33, 7 to 11, 16 to 13; and in another the number is said to be 38 to 6, though I do not understand how that should be.

2315. Lord Barcaple.—According to the present rule, does a preliminary appeal necessarily stay the progress of the cause?—It does; and not only so, but the statute fixes five different stages of the cause when appeals can be taken. The first is disposing of a dilatory plea; second, allowing proof; third, as to the admissibility of evidence; fourth, on the merits; fifth, as to expenses; and sixth, in many causes there are incidental questions arising as to granting diligence for the recovery of writings before the record is closed, and other matters in which appeals are sometimes taken, perhaps not rightly; but whether rightly taken or not, it is held that the Sheriff is the only judge of the competency, and the case is stayed simply by the appeal.

2316. Mr. Shand.—Are you aware that in these returns, in some instances, single appeals have been enumerated as several, according to the number of points which they happen to involve?—Personally I am not aware of that.

2317. Have you observed that that is stated in the abstract of the returns made up by the Sheriffs-substitute?—Yes.

2318. That if five or six preliminary points are involved in one appeal, they will count as five or six appeals?—It is said to be so in one county. I think it may explain the 38 and 6; but I don't think that would run through many counties. My opinion further is, that supposing it should be determined that there is to be an intermediate tribunal between the Sheriff-substitute and the Court of Session, that tribunal should consist of a court of two Sheriffs, presiding over large districts—districts perhaps equivalent to the divisions of the kingdom for Justiciary purposes. These districts might be four in number,—viz. Edinburgh, and the three circuits; but there would probably be some variation of the districts. I don't say more than two judges for each, because if there were more than two, printing would be necessary; if there were only two, they could hand the process from one to the other, and it would not be necessary to print. I think that two judges sitting together, as is done in the Courts of the Lords Justices in England, might consider and discuss the cases in order to endeavour to arrive at the same conclusion, and perhaps more likely at a satisfactory conclusion than they would do if there were three, in which case a vote might be taken, and the matter carried suddenly.

2319. Mr. Murray.—Where the two differed, would the judgment of the Sheriff stand?—Yes. I would further say, that if such a court is established, the judges should have no other business or duty; their whole time should be devoted to the public service.

2320. Mr. Webster.—And only appeals?—They should have no other duty but that of appeal judges.

2321. Lord Barcaple.—Where would you propose that they should administer their jurisdiction?—I think they ought to go round their districts periodically.

2322. Into each county?—I do not say each county, but to each circuit town at all events; and arrangements might further be made, if it were more suitable for the parties, to have hearings in Edinburgh as well. I would not dispense with sittings in the country; but cases might be heard in Edinburgh or Glasgow.

2323. Mr. Shand.—Where do you propose that they should reside?—I think they should mainly reside in Edinburgh.

2324. For what purpose?—As being the place where they mostly reside now.

2325. Then you think it is an advantage for an appeal judge to reside in Edinburgh. Is that in order that they may come in contact with their brethren of the bar?—I did not say that; but the natural result would be that they should be resident in Edinburgh.

2326. Mr. Murray.—Would you object to their living in the country?—Not in the least, if the two were together. If you got the two to select some other place than Edinburgh, it would be quite satisfactory.

2327. The Chairman.—When you say each circuit town, do you mean each town that would be fixed as the place for their circuit, or do you mean each circuit town as it is now fixed by the Court of Justiciary?—I mean each circuit town as it now stands; but that might be varied.

2328. Then they would never go into Fife?—I don't say it might not be varied. There would be some variation as to the districts. For instance, Lanarkshire would require to be a district by itself.

2329. You mean such places as should be fixed on for their sittings?—Yes.

2330. Mr. Murray.—And you would have these sittings once a month?—I think once in six weeks should be quite sufficient.

2331. Mr. Shand.—Except for the benefit of having the two judges sitting on the appeals, is there any other advantage which that system has over the present?—None.

2332. That is the sole advantage?—Certainly.

2333. Do you think that there is not a great guarantee of attention being given to a case when you leave the responsibility with one man?—No, not more than two. I think that if one man sits with another, he will attend to the case as conscientiously as if the whole responsibility was on himself.

2334. Are you aware that in England one of the most important appeal jurisdictions consists of the Lord Chancellor sitting on appeal from the Vice-Chancellors and the Master of the Rolls?—I am.

2335. Are you aware that that works most satisfactorily?—Yes; but I am aware that the court of the two Lords Justices of Appeal works equally satisfactorily.

2336. But not more satisfactorily?—I cannot give an opinion upon that.

2337. You cannot say it works better?—No, I am bound to suppose that the Court of the Lord Chancellor, as the Supreme Civil Tribunal of the kingdom, is the best tribunal in the kingdom.

2338. How would you propose that summary cases should be disposed of by a court which is only to sit once in six weeks?—If it was necessary to hear them sooner, they might be heard in Edinburgh.

2339. Do you contemplate their sitting oftener than once in six weeks?—Not in the country.

2340. But you contemplate regular sittings in Edinburgh?—They might have hearings in Edinburgh if necessary.

2341. What would be the result, in point of expense, of bringing appeals to Edinburgh to be heard?—It would only be in rare cases that that would be done.

2342. Are there not many summary cases occurring in which it is important to have an immediate appeal?—Not so immediate as that. I don't think they would take much harm from waiting till the end of the six weeks; but it does not follow that every case is to be delayed for six weeks. The decision of the resident

Sheriff might be pronounced only a few days before the sitting of the appeal court. The extreme time is six weeks. But I would permit the appeal Sheriffs to order a hearing in Edinburgh in any summary case requiring great despatch.

2343. Suppose that the appeal judges resided in different counties, you would propose that a communication should be made to them to hear these summary cases in Edinburgh?—I don't propose that they should reside in different counties. I would propose that they should reside near one another.

2344. Would not hearings in Edinburgh add very much to the expense?—I have no doubt it would be expensive coming to Edinburgh; but we are to compare the relative advantages of one Sheriff sitting as an appeal judge, and two Sheriffs sitting as appeal judges; and besides it makes no increase in the expense, because the Sheriffs, as now established, don't require to come to their counties upon every craving for an oral hearing on appeal; for if despatch is wanted, it has to be heard in Edinburgh just in the same way as I propose by the two appeal judges.

2345. The Sheriff at present has the power of ordering argument in writing?—Yes.

2346. That could not be done under the system you propose?—I don't approve of written pleadings before appeal judges. I think it should be done by oral hearings. I don't know that reclaiming petitions should not be permitted by the appeal judges; but I don't approve of them.

2347. In reference to the time it would take to obtain a decision from such a tribunal, I think you contemplate that the papers should not be printed?—Not before two appeal judges.

2348. Do you contemplate that each judge should have the process home, and read the proof before disposing of it?—Yes.

2349. Would the fact that the process had to be laid before two separate judges not be a cause of delay in disposing of a case?—Of course it would. Two men would take longer to consider the case than one.

2350. That is a disadvantage of the system which you propose, as compared with the present?—It requires more time, of course.

2351. That would be productive of greater delay?—I should think there would not be much more delay.

2352. Mr. Baxter.—You think the two judges would come round oftener than the one judge does at present?—Yes.

2353. So that there would be no additional delay or expense?—No.

2354. Mr. Shand.—Is there any reason why the appeal judge now should not go to his county once in six weeks?—None in the world.

2355. If it were provided that the Sheriff should go to his county once in six weeks, or oftener, as business required it, to dispose of his cases, would that not be a more rapid mode of disposing of them than the mode you have suggested, by which two judges have to read the papers?—No, I don't think it would. The mere reading of the papers would not imply much delay.

2356. I thought you said that system would create more delay?—Of course it takes more time for two persons to read papers than one; but that would not create such delay as should in the least be regarded as deciding the relative advantage of one judge or two judges.

2357. Practically, would there not be less delay if you had one judge hearing the cases as often as the two judges whom you suggest?—The delay would be small, and I don't think that delay is the only matter to be considered in the question of appeals.

2358. Mr. Baxter.—Do you contemplate that these appeal judges should give their whole time to their duties?—Yes. The office of Sheriff at present is most anomalous in that respect. It is the only judicial office that I know of in the kingdom where the judges are not bound to give their whole time to the public service, but may practise and discharge other duties. While also other courts have their sittings, the Sheriff at his own discretion may dispose of the cases brought before him. I have already given my opinion that there should only be an appeal direct from the resident Sheriff to the Court of Session, but I have referred to the possibility of establishing another court between the two. With reference to the district courts which have been suggested, there is a question how far their judgment should be final. I am against finality and against excluding the jurisdiction of the ordinary superior courts, and preventing the public from having the benefit of their judgments; but if these district courts are not final, there would, of course, be the just objection of the expense and delay as at present.

2359. Lord Barcaple.—Have you at present many appeals to the Court of Session from your court?—Very few.

2361. That is, appeals to the Court of Session?—Yes. Of my judgments there have been six altogether taken to the Court of Session in the eight years.

2363. The half of the county?—Yes.

2364. Mr. Adam.—Do you know whether the Sheriff differed or agreed with you in these cases?—One was a case under the Poor Law; the Sheriff and I agreed, as did also the Lord Ordinary, but one of the Divisions of the court held that we were wrong. In another the Sheriff reversed my judgment, and the Court of Session adopted his view. Then there was a case of cessio, in which the Sheriff agreed with me, and the Court of Session confirmed our view. The next was a process of sequestration, in which there was an appeal to me from a trustee's deliverance; this case did not go to the Sheriff, but went direct to the Inner House, and the Inner House confirmed my view. Then there were two summary cases, in which the Sheriff agreed with me, and which went together to the Court of Session, and the court confirmed our view in both. Recently appeals have been intimated in two cases, in which the Sheriff agreed with me, but there has not been time to obtain the judgment of the court on them.

2365. Lord Barcaple.—Do you know what proportion of your final judgments during the same period were appealed to the Sheriff?—I am enabled from the parliamentary returns to give the numbers for 1861, 1862, and 1863. In 1861, while I was at Falkirk, there were 11 appeals taken, and the Sheriff adhered in them all. In 1862, I was temporarily acting in Stirling during the absence of the then Sheriff-substitute there, when 29 appeals were taken from my judgments; and of these, 2 were reversed by the Sheriff, and 27 adhered to. In 1863 I was again at Falkirk, and there were 19 appeals taken; in 16 of these my judgment was adhered to, in 1 there was a reversal, and the others are unaccounted for,—perhaps they may have been cross appeals.

2367. Lord Barcaple.—Have you any opinion as to whether the abolition of all intermediate appeal between the Sheriff-substitute's judgment and the Court of Session would lead to a large number of cases being brought to the Court of Session which are now finally disposed of in the Sheriff Court?—I cannot with any accuracy give an opinion upon that.

2368. Mr. Shand.—Is it the fact that in almost every case there is an appeal taken from your final judgment?—No.

2369. Can you give us an idea of the proportion?—I cannot.

2370. Seven-eighths?—I don't think so much.

2371. Thereabouts?—I cannot give an idea of it.

2372. You cannot give any idea of the number of final judgments pronounced by yourself in these years?—No, I cannot.

2373. Do you think that the parties acquiesce in your judgments, without taking the benefit of an appeal, in more than a fourth of the cases?—I should think so,—about that, perhaps, but I cannot exactly say. I am sure that there are more than that of appealable interlocutors, preliminary and others together. I am further of opinion, that if the Sheriffs are retained, either as single appeal judges or two sitting together as district appeal judges, the Sheriff-substitutes or resident Sheriffs should, without control by the others, wholly discharge all the duties pertaining to the office of Sheriff—other, of course, than those of an appeal judge. This leads to the inquiry what these other duties are. There are the Registration Courts; and it must be remembered how much the process of registration has been altered from the provisions of the Reform Bill of 1832. There was first a Registration Court by the Sheriff, and an appeal to another Court of Sheriffs, judging upon claims by the parties. Now a public officer—an assessor—has the duty of collecting the names, and in that he is aided by the valuation roll. The assessor also attends the Sheriff at the Registration Court, and aids him in revising the register. There is not much difficulty upon the facts, therefore. The appeal is now taken not to a court of Sheriffs, but on a stated case on points of law to the Court of Session. The facts are really not difficult, and prior to 1868 the law had been pretty well settled by a series of decisions of the Court of Session. New points unquestionably did arise under the statute of 1868, but these are pretty well settled also. Still, if a mistake in law is made, it can be easily and cheaply put right by the judges. I imagine that the whole business is simple, although responsible, and I think it may well be discharged by a Sheriff-substitute. As to criminal jury trials, the returns of 1861 show that not more than 10 per cent. of these trials were taken by the non-resident Sheriffs, and that in twenty-one jurisdictions in which there were trials of this kind they were all disposed of by the Sheriff-substitute. Then there are the parliamentary elections. This duty, though responsible, is simple, and is frequently performed now by the resident Sheriff, who, besides, necessarily from his constant residence and local knowledge, and regular discharge of duties of the same kind, has to make all necessary arrangements for the preservation of the peace on these occasions. I have heard it said that it was necessary to have Sheriffs resident in Edinburgh, so as to be able personally to communicate with the Lord Advocate on matters connected with the peace of the country. Of course this suggestion is not applicable to the kingdom in its normal or usual condition. But I don't see the advantage of the Sheriff resident in Edinburgh being able personally to communicate with the Lord Advocate. His knowledge can only be derived from the resident Sheriff, who could communicate his information as well to the Lord Advocate direct as through the Sheriff. And in the same way, if the Lord Advocate had any communication to make for purposes in the country, he could as easily do so direct to the resident authorities as through the Sheriff. The Sheriff of the great county of Lanark does not reside in Edinburgh. Moreover, the understanding is, that if troubles arise, the Sheriff should proceed to his county. He must depend very much upon the more generally better local knowledge of the resident Sheriff for information and assistance. Then there does arise against the Sheriff interfering at all in the county the objection of divided responsibility—two persons with the same duties; and with the suggestion of that objection there is the attendant financial remark, Why provide two persons to perform duties which properly fall on one only, and which that one can, and does when requisite, properly discharge? I am of opinion that the districts of some of the Sheriff-substitutes may be enlarged, and their number reduced, providing, so far as geographical position will permit, fair and full occupation for all, even though it should have to be provided that they statedly hold courts at different places for the disposal of all causes, civil and criminal, and all kinds of public business. That is all I have to say on the constitution of the court.

2374. Lord Barcaple.—Do you include your own district in that last observation?—There are several districts round about me.

2375. But do you mean that you could overtake with convenience a larger district than you at present have?—I think I could.

2376. The Chairman.—Have you formed any idea in your own mind of the localities from which you would take away the Sheriffs-substitute?—Not beyond my own neighbourhood.

2377. What are those in your own neighbourhood?—I think that three, at all events, might be taken away. There are Dunblane and Alloa, both of which are small districts. There are also Dunfermline and Kinross.

2378. Would you take them away from these four places?—No. I would combine Dunblane and Alloa.

2379. Mr. Murray.—You would make districts irrespective of counties?—That might be done.

2380. Would you combine Dunfermline and Kinross?—Yes.

2381. Would you combine Falkirk and Stirling?—That could be done.

2382. Would it be an expedient arrangement?—There are a great many summary criminal cases at Falkirk, and that would imply the judge going from Stirling to Falkirk twice a week. That is the difficulty.

2383. The criminal business there makes the difficulty?—Yes; the civil business is no real difficulty There is another division which might be made. I am not sure that Linlithgow and Falkirk might not be thrown together, Stirling and Dunblane, Alloa and Kinross, throwing Dunfermline into the rest of Fife. I think three or four might be saved in my neighbourhood.

2384. In reference to the ambulatory court which you have spoken of, how many days do you think they would require to sit each time they went to Stirling?—I think one day should be quite sufficient. I think they could take both the Stirling and Falkirk cases quite well.

2385. Would you propose that they should have the whole district which is now combined in the Stirling circuit?—Yes.

2386. That is Stirlingshire, Kinross-shire, and Clackmannanshire?—Yes.

2387. Mr. Webster.—And would you add part of Perthshire?—If the Sheriff-substitute's districts are changed, it would make a difference in the circuits.

2388. The Chairman.—Do you think that one day would be sufficient at Stirling even under the enlarged arrangement which you have spoken of?—Yes.

2389. How many days do you think would be required at Perth?—They would have Perth and Fife cases, if Fife is to be thrown in with Perth. I should not imagine that they could have less than three days for Fife and Perth.

2390. How many days do you think they would take for Dundee? Dundee would be taken separately?—I think a couple of days.

2391. That is, holding the courts once in six weeks?—Yes.

2392. Would it be an inconvenience, do you think, for the people in Fife to have their causes considered in Perth?—Necessarily there would. It would not be so convenient as to have them heard in their own court-house; but nowadays there are railways which afford facilities for travelling which did not exist before.

2393. That would add somewhat to the expense of the appeal?—It would.

2394. Would you have that appeal confined to matters of law, or would you give the judges power to go into matter of evidence?—I would let them go into matters of fact as well as of law, with the limits at present existing in reference to the Debts Recovery Act.

2395. These judges would not have the benefit of hearing the witnesses examined if they proceeded to deal with the matter on the proof taken?—No.

2396. They would proceed on the notes of the resident Sheriff?—Yes.

2397. Would you allow the resident Sheriff to have any power of reconsidering his own judgments?—I would, if, as I have suggested, there should be a direct appeal from him to the Court of Session. My view is, that there should be a simple note put in by way of exception to his findings, specifying without argument the points of fact or law which the parties wish him to reconsider. He should have power to call them before him, and hear an argument upon these points if necessary; and if not, then to adhere to his former judgment.

2398. You would give a party the option of going direct to the Court of Session or to the ambulatory court?—I would.

2400. Would you dispose of that by oral argument?—Yes; if the resident Sheriff thought that necessary.

2401. Lord Barcaple.—He might refuse it without argument?—Yes.

2402. The Chairman.—Would you allow an appeal from the ambulatory court to the Court of Session?—I would. I think that the public are entitled to the benefit of the superior courts of the country.

2403. Have you considered whether there should be any further limit than there is at present to the power of appeal from the local court; I mean in point of amount?—I have an idea that the small debt jurisdiction should be extended to £25, but that as part of the arrangement there should be an appeal to the Court of Session in point of law, and that the Sheriff's judgment should only be final, even in small debt cases, as to the matter of fact.

2404. Would you let the power of appeal in point of law descend below the present limit of the Small Debt Court?—I would. There are cases where important principles of law are discussed and decided in the Small Debt Court; and I am opposed to excluding the public from the benefits of the superior courts.

2405. Is there a power at present of sending such questions as involve important principles to be more deliberately discussed than in the small debt roll?—Yes; they may be remitted to the ordinary roll.

2406. Is that not a remedy against hurried decisions?—It is.

2407. Is it not important to have a rapid decision in these small debt cases? Is that not the principle of the jurisdiction?—Yes.

2408. And final decision?—Quite so. I would accompany the power of appeal with a check by insisting on the parties taking it depositing the small sum of four or five guineas to meet the subsequent expenses.

2409. Would you do that in other cases of appeal to the ambulatory court, where larger sums were involved?—No, I would not.

2410. Would it not be a hardship on the persons engaged in the litigation in the Small Debt Court, who are frequently poor people, to be obliged to make such a deposit, while in cases of larger amount you would not require it?—I propose to give them a benefit which at present they have not. They have no power of appeal in point of law; and if they get this benefit, it is perhaps not unfair to impose that condition. It is matter of discretion. At present there is no appeal to the Court of Session in cases not exceeding £25, however tried.

2411. In regard to your view of there being a resident Sheriff, who should exercise, as I understand, all the executive functions which are now exercised by the Sheriff, how would you deal with such a place as Glasgow?—Of course Glasgow and Edinburgh are different from any other part of the kingdom. There you have several substitutes in the same district. You cannot divide Glasgow according to streets, and each Sheriff-substitute must retain his jurisdiction over the whole. In order, therefore, to provide for the proper discharge of the duty, you must have a chief, call him what you may, whether Primus or Sheriff, and the others assistant-Sheriffs. There must be one to regulate the business between himself and the others, and who would be the immediately responsible person, having all correspondence addressed to him, and bound for the discharge of the whole duties with the assistance of the others.

2412. That is the condition now as regards the executive duties?—Yes, and it would be very much the same as it is now in that respect.

2413. Your objection to the present system is, that the Sheriff exercises judicial functions as a judge of appeal?—Yes, and likewise the executive,—that is my objection.

2414. That objection would be removed, as I understand, if a person were sent to act along with him as judge of appeal?—He would then become judge of appeal, but he should cease to have the other functions.

2415. Why should he cease to have executive functions any more than the Sheriff-substitute?—I think his whole time should be given to his appeal duties.

2416. But he disposes of all the appeals now, and of the executive duties too?—Yes.

2417. You think an appeal to a single judge is not a good thing. If there was another judge combined with him, would that not remove your objection?—I would increase his district, so as to occupy his time fully with his appeal duties.

2418. I thought you said Lanarkshire was itself a sufficient district?—Perhaps I was wrong in saying that. If it is not enough, I would add to it so as fully and fairly to occupy his time.

2419. But if his executive duties did not fully occupy his time, how would you dispose of his spare time? At present he does both?—Yes. If the five substitutes, who would then be the executive officers, had spare time, I would take away one of them.

2420. I am not talking of their having spare time; I am talking of his having spare time?—What I mean is, that if the Sheriff of Lanarkshire were made an appeal judge, he should cease to be an executive officer; and then we should look to his substitutes as the executive officers. There should be one of them, I think, made the primus or head, in order to regulate and dispose of the executive and other duties of the resident Sheriff, but leaving the present Sheriff solely and entirely as an appeal judge.

2421. But what is the objection to the resident Sheriff now exercising executive functions and appellate jurisdiction, except that he is a single judge in appeal?—I can quite see that Lanarkshire is in a different position, perhaps, from other counties. The Sheriff of Lanarkshire is resident in his district; in the other counties the Sheriffs are non-resident.

2422. Is Edinburgh an exceptional case?—Yes, it is the same.

2423. You spoke of the anomalous character of the office of Sheriff. Is it not anomalous that a judge exercising functions in civil and criminal matters of a judicial character, should also be the executive officer of the district?—I don't know that it is so.

2424. Does it occur to you that there are instances of that?—The Sheriff, of course, is both the executive officer and the judge.

2425. Is that not a peculiarity in our system?—It is.

2426. Do you think it works well?—I have never seen any difficulty arising from it.

2427. Then the anomalous character of the thing is not an objection to it?—No, not by itself.

2428. Would you give an appeal to the appellate court in regard to criminal matters?—No, I would not.

2430. In the investigation of matters of fact in civil causes in the Sheriff Court, would you desire to try cases by jury?—It is very difficult to say that jury trial could with propriety be extended to the Sheriff Courts yet.

2431. You rather think not?—I rather think not; certainly not without the consent of both parties.

2432. Would you give any right of appeal in criminal matters which does not exist at present on reserved points, or anything of that kind?—I have not found any inconvenience from the present system, or any complaint as to the present system; and I am not for changing it.

Robert Sconce.

2433. Do you take down the evidence in civil causes?—I do. I take it all myself; but I think we ought to have the power to dictate to a shorthand writer. I think that ought to be extended to the Sheriff Court.

2434. And these notes, whether taken by yourself, or dictated to a shorthand writer, would be the materials which would go before the ambulatory appellate court?—Yes.

2435. Lord Barcaple.—You say you think you should have power to dictate to a shorthand writer. What benefit do you anticipate from that?—We would get on more rapidly.

2436. Do you know that in your own experience? Have you tried it?—No; I have dictated to others, but not to a shorthand writer.

2437. Do you think it would be a more rapid proceeding than dictating to a good clerk?—I have no experience of it. I merely theoretically suppose that it would.

2438. Does it occur to you that it would cause considerable additional expense?—No doubt it would.

2439. Does it occur to you that if the services of the non-resident Sheriff be dispensed with in counties which are divided into districts, each having at present a Sheriff-substitute, it would be necessary to make arrangements for one of the resident Sheriffs of the county performing certain duties that are of a more general kind, but are applicable to the whole county; as, for instance, making arrangements for polling?—Yes, the writ would be addressed to the Sheriff at one particular place of the county, as the returning officer.

2440. It would be necessary, if a change of that sort took place, to make some arrangement for one of the resident Sheriffs in the county performing duties that are of a general kind?—Of such a kind as that.

2441. The Chairman.—Who should appoint the resident Sheriff on your plan?—The appointment would fall to the Crown.

2442. If the present system continued, do you think there should be any alteration?—None.

2443. Do you think there should be any difference in the qualification of the person to hold the office?—That is a delicate question for me to answer. My opinion is, that it should remain as it is.

2444. If the present holders of the office who are members of the bar, and are appointed by the Crown, were to be required to go and reside in their counties, and the Sheriff-substitutes were dispensed with, would that accomplish your object?—Perfectly. I by no means say, that if there was an abolition of what is called the double office of Sheriff, it necessarily falls to the resident Sheriff to be the new officer. I think that very likely it might be arranged satisfactorily for the public interest, and agreeably to the parties.

2445. Suppose the office to remain as it is, and that the Sheriffs of Stirlingshire and Linlithgow were to hold a court at Stirling once in six weeks, would that remove your objection as to the constitution of the appellate jurisdiction?—Yes, so far; but I still think it would be better to have the appeal direct from the resident Sheriff to the Court of Session.

2446. But apart from that?—Your Lordship's question proceeds, I suppose, on the assumption that the number of Sheriffs over all Scotland is to be retained as it is now.

2447. Or nearly so?—I did not intend to advert to the subject, but I presume it is my duty to answer the question as it has been put. My opinion, rightly or wrongly—and I give it with diffidence and delicacy—is, that if you exclude the Lord Advocate, the ex-Lord Advocate, the Solicitor-General, and the ex-Solicitor-General, and the Dean of Faculty, it will be difficult to find twenty-three persons from the bar whose opinion would have that weight as appeal Sheriffs which one would expect appeal Sheriffs to have. There are many who are ornaments to the bar, and will be ornaments to the bench some day; but I have the feeling that, excluding those I have spoken of, it would be very difficult to find twenty-three gentlemen at the bar whose opinions as appeal judges would have the confidence of the public.

2448. If the number was considerably reduced, do you think they might be found?—I do.

2449. Have you considered what ought to be the remuneration of the resident Sheriffs, supposing your system were adopted, of leaving the entire responsibility to them?—I think it would not be well to pay any of them less than £900 to £1000 a year. The districts would be enlarged as well.

2450. Mr. Baxter.—And the number diminished?—Yes.

2451. The Chairman.—Have you considered what remuneration should be given to the appeal judges who are to sit in the ambulatory appeal court? I presume you would take them from the bar?—Yes; I should think that they ought to get the same salaries that are now given to the Sheriffs of Lanarkshire and Edinburgh—about £1600 or £1800 a-year.

2452. Lord Barcaple.—How many of them do you propose?—Four districts; that is, eight appeal judges.

2453. Mr. Webster.—With or without retiring allowances?—Certainly with retiring allowances.

2454. The Chairman.—Do you apply that both to the resident and the non-resident Sheriffs?—Yes.

2455. Mr. Shand.—Do you anticipate that men in leading practice at the bar would accept these appeal judgeships, excluding the four law officers whom you have mentioned?—I think you would get gentlemen to take them, in whom the public would have confidence.

2456. Would you expect men in leading practice to accept these offices at £1600 a year?—£1600 or £1800 I said. I should think you would get persons whose judgment would be held as of weight.

2457. You don't think members of the bar in leading practice would accept these offices?—No, not the leaders of the bar, nor those at the head of the bar.

2458. The Chairman.—I think you said you considered that the power of appointment which now rests with the Sheriff has been well exercised?—I do think that it has been well and judiciously exercised.

2459. The Sheriff has an important interest in having an efficient substitute?—He has.

2460. More interest than any other individual?—He has.

2461. And therefore he looks out for the person that he thinks is, on the whole, the best qualified to discharge the duties?—Yes.

2462. Do you think there is the same security for the appointment if the right was transferred to the Crown?—I don't know that the Crown abuses its patronage.

2463. But is there the same security that the most efficient person will be looked out for?—I don't see why the Crown should not exercise its patronage quite as well. The Crown appoints the Sheriffs and the judges.

2464. But you think that two of the present Sheriffs appointed by the Crown would not be a satisfactory court of appeal from the judgment of a Sheriff-substitute who is appointed now by the Sheriff?—No; I presume to say not every two.

2465. Do you think that the appointments of the Sheriffs are as satisfactory as those of the Sheriff-substitutes?—Not quite.

2466. Have you any reason to expect that the appointment of the resident Sheriffs will be better afterwards than the appointment of the Sheriffs?—It is difficult to say.

2467. You have no opinion on that subject?—No.

2468. What is the next point?—I think the civil jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be extended over all parties in every action where the defenders, or one of them, resides or carries on business within the county, or in the county where the cause of action, whether contract or damage, wholly or in part arose. Sometimes it is vexatious to have to go to the Court of Session to pursue defenders for a small matter, because they don't all reside in the same county; and I propose to remedy that by giving to the Sheriff of one county jurisdiction over all the defenders, if any one of them resides in his county. That is the case in England under the County Courts Act.

2469. Do you mean that the action might be brought either where the party resides and carries on business, or where the cause of action arose?—Yes.

2470. Where the cause of action arose, although the party did not reside there?—Yes.

2471. That is, if a man went into a jurisdiction and made a purchase there, and returned to his own place, you would let the action lie in the forum of the pursuer?—Yes; or if he committed an assault. I mean even actions of damages for assault or for any other tort.

2472. Mr. Baxter.—More especially if he had a place of business there?—Yes.

2473. Mr. Webster.—Do you know that it was proposed, in the Bill as to English Common Law Procedure, to give the courts at Westminster Hall jurisdiction over all the world, including Scotland and Ireland, if the cause of action arose within England?—I was not aware of that.

2474. The Chairman.—Would it be satisfactory to you that the courts in Westminster Hall should have that jurisdiction?—No; that would be taking the parties out of the kingdom.

2475. You think it makes a difference that the same law would be administered in the one jurisdiction and in the other?—Yes.

2476. Does that not interfere somewhat with the principle that the forum of the defender is the proper forum for the action?—Yes; but my own experience has shown that it leads to great expense and confusion.

2478. Where the defender may not be able conveniently to attend, where he may not have the materials for his defence, and where he has not his agent; why should the action not be brought where the defender is?—Sometimes it is desirable to have the action decided where the cause of action arose, from the witnesses being there, and from the contract having been made at that place; and if a man makes a bargain or does an act in a certain county, giving rise to an action, I think it not unjust to make him responsible in that county to the party with whom he contracts or whom he has injured.

2479. Mr. Webster.—Does the party with whom he contracts not know that he is not resident within the county?—Generally speaking, he may be so.

2480. And he has it in his option to decline entering into the contract, if he does not like to follow it to his own court?—Yes.

2481. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion?—I propose that the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended in all cases for aliment or maintenance, as between husband and wife, or parent and child, and as to the custody of children, legitimate or illegitimate. The Sheriffs have power to regulate these matters ad interim at present, in the usual case at least; and that gives rise to this anomaly, that there may be a process in the Sheriff Court on that point, and a second process in the Court of Session, to regulate it finally. I propose, therefore, that the Sheriff should have power to judge not merely ad interim, but absolutely in the matter, subject always to the usual appeal. These cases very frequently occur with people who are ill able to bear such expense. I should also imagine that it would not be inexpedient to extend the power of the Sheriff to the appointment of judicial factors or curators bonis in cases where the value of the estate does not exceed £500 in moveables and £50 a year in heritage, and to give them a limited jurisdiction in cases involving the right to heritable property where the value does not exceed £50 a year, and the property is situated in the county. At present the Sheriff has jurisdiction in cases of servitude depending upon use and enjoyment for forty years; but there is frequently a doubt how far the use or enjoyment arises from a servitude or a public right; and I would propose that in rights of way, whether depending on a public right or a servitude right, the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended. In the same way, in questions of marches or boundaries, where there may be only a few feet or inches in dispute, all depends on the question of possession, and I think the Sheriff should have power to decide such questions.

2482. Lord Barcaple.—Do you restrict the last part of your answer to cases in which the judgment will merely settle the possession; or do you include cases which depend upon possession, but where the judgment will determine the right, as in the case of marches?—To determine the right.

2483. You would allow the Sheriff to determine the right in cases which, being cases of marches, or something of that sort, depend upon the possession?—Just so, and where the title is not in dispute.

2485. Mr. Baxter.—In all cases of removing?—Yes. And I should say, that where in any action the validity of any writing is impugned, its validity should be competently tried before the Sheriff, by way of exception, for the purposes of that action. The same powers now exist in Sheriffs, under the Bankrupt Acts, as to deeds thereby made void, and all alienations of property by a party insolvent or notour bankrupt, which are voidable by statute or at common law.

2486. The Chairman.—Have you anything to state as to criminal jurisdiction?—As to that, I have really no suggestions to make. The present practice seems to me to be quite satisfactory. No complaint has been made in my county. It has been suggested that the Sheriff's powers with a jury should be extended to inflicting penal servitude. The Court of Justiciary, apparently without difficulty, overtakes all cases deserving of that punishment, and I do not see any necessity for extending the powers of the Sheriff Court in this respect. There would be no risk, however, in the extension, particularly as Crown counsel, in the exercise of their discretion, would necessarily keep for the higher tribunal the truly serious cases, and send only to the Sheriff Court those which would justify penal servitude because of the number of previous convictions. Perhaps the Sheriff Court might have power to try cases of robbery, from its occasional close approximation to theft, and the prudence, in the less obvious cases, of alternately charging robbery or theft. I do not think it necessary or desirable to extend the summary jurisdiction at present existing in the Sheriff Court. A jury is easily available; and as jurors are not summoned unless the panel pleads not guilty at the first diet, and so many plead guilty—about four-fifths in my county—few juries are summoned.

2487. Dr. Barclay.—Have you formed any opinion as to the propriety of retaining the verdict of not proven in Scotland? Have you found, in practice, that it has given juries an opportunity of coming to a conclusion which is not very satisfactory?—No. I have considered that matter, and I think it a wise thing to leave it as it is. I would not interfere with the verdict of not proven.

2488. Mr. Shand.—Would you still retain the verdict of not guilty?—Yes.

2489. You think matters should remain as they are?—Yes.

2491. The Chairman.—Do you think it would be advisable that, where a verdict by a majority is not proven, it should be stated whether the minority were for a verdict of guilty or not guilty?—Yes; I think that should be stated.

Robert Sconce.

2492. Dr. Barclay.—Have you not sometimes heard the judge ask whether the minority is the one way or the other?—Yes; I have heard that done.

2493. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—With reference to forms of process, I may state that I have found great benefit from the form adopted under the Debts Recovery Act, of closing the record upon a note of parties' pleas, prepared with the Sheriff's aid. Not only do you get a minute of defence containing the defender's statements, but you have the reply, and you bring out very summarily and well the whole case in a very simple and easy way. I would extend the power of closing upon pleas of parties to all causes. I am quite sure that that would stop condescendences and defences, and revisals, to a large extent, and greatly shorten the proceedings.

2494. Mr. Baxter.—Then you would abolish the condescendence and answers?—Not in all cases. In particular cases I would permit that course to be followed.

2495. Mr. Shand.—As a power?—As a power. Then I think the court should have power at any time before final judgment, subject to expenses it may be, to allow amendments, or to add new facts or pleas. I am of opinion that the Debts Recovery Act should be extended to all claims under £50, and should not be confined to book debts as at present. I am not quite sure but that I would make more stringent provision as to closing proofs. Do what Sheriffs may, there is delay. I like very much the term used in the Debts Recovery Act, that a day should be fixed for the 'trial.' I would not preclude the case from being adjourned, if necessary; but I think the word 'trial' makes the parties feel that they are limited as to the length of time that they may carry over their proofs.

2496. Mr. Baxter.—Are there great delays just now by adjournments?—Sometimes there are, fight as we may against it.

2497. Mr. Shand.—Why should not the Sheriff-substitute, as matters now stand, treat all his proofs as trials?—He should, and he has the power; but if you use the word 'trial,' you let it be well understood that there is to be no delay.

2498. Mr. Adam.—You want your hands strengthened?—Yes.

2500. Has not the Court of Session, in one or other of its Divisions, expressed a strong opinion that that should be done?—Yes; and I try it as much as I can, but I want our hands strengthened.

2501. Dr. Barclay.—Don't you find statements made that witnesses cannot attend?—Yes.

2502. Mr. Shand.—Are you aware that in some counties the Act is worked in the way I speak of, and that such cases are treated as a trial?—I am not. I have managed repeatedly, in an ordinary case, to get the pursuer to finish, and I have even managed to get both sides to finish at one diet, but that cannot always be done.

2503. Are you not aware that in some counties it is the rule that both pursuer and defender finish their case at the same diet?—I am not aware of that.

2504. Do you see any reason why fifteen days should elapse between an appeal taken from the Sheriff-substitute and the process being sent to the Sheriff?—I think that might be limited very well to seven days.

2505. Or even less, if there is to be no written pleading?—Yes, if you get the parties to declare within seven days that they wish an oral hearing or written argument, I would force them to declare that within the seven days.

2506. And to send in the written pleading if that was desired?—Yes.

2507. Dr. Barclay.—Is that not too short a time if the petition is drawn by counsel, which it frequently is?—It may be, but I think seven days enough.

2508. To declare whether they wish oral or written pleading?—Yes.

2509. But would you compel them to give in the reclaiming petition within seven days?—I think so.

2510. Mr. Adam.—Do you think it quite fair to a pursuer that the defender's proof should be adjourned to a distant date, thus allowing the defender to consider the pursuer's proof, and to overbear it?—If there are many adjournments, it gives one party or the other, and sometimes both, an opportunity of scouring the country for witnesses to contradict the evidence already taken. That is one of the evils which attend such adjournments.

2511. And it tells against the pursuer, and in favour of the defender?—I don't know. Sometimes a defender has a conjunct probation with the pursuer, and he looks out for witnesses in replication; and sometimes a defender has to prove his separate statement of facts, and then the pursuer follows him.

2512. Mr. Baxter.—That is in cases where the defender is pursuer of the issue?—Yes.

2513. Dr. Barclay.—Is there in your court a practice of asking proofs in replication?—Not much.

2514. You don't encourage them?—Certainly not.

2515. The Chairman.—Is there much evil arising from parties accommodating each other with prorogations of the time for putting in papers?—There is.

2516. Do you think there should be some more peremptory rule about that?—I do think so.

2517. What have you to say as to costs?—I have not much to suggest upon that point. The costs allowed in the Sheriff Court do not seem to be unfair either way. I do not quite approve of the principle of paying agents for precognitions by a certain fee for each witness actually examined, and rather think that they should be paid for the precognition by its length, subject of course to check by the auditor or the court.

2518. Mr. Webster.—Would you pay the agent by the length of the precognition, wherever he might have to go to see the witness?—I think some addition might be made in regard to that.

2520. Is the payment for the witnesses produced or for the witnesses precognosced?—For those produced.

2521. And they get a fee for the witnesses examined?—Yes.

2522. You say it ought to be according to the length of the precognitions, irrespective of the number of witnesses examined?—There ought always to be a check. I believe that the Court of Session do not allow for any witnesses except such as have been examined, except in rare cases. I should like the same rule to be applied to the Sheriff Court—viz., to allow for no precognition except of witnesses examined, unless in particular cases.

2523. Lord Barcaple.—Might such a rule not have the effect of inducing parties to examine too many witnesses?—It might.

2525. Would it not greatly increase it?—I would only have it subject to a check; and there is none now.

2526. Dr. Barclay.—What is your opinion as to the mode of paying agents under the Debts Recovery Act by a fixed sum, and not pro rata, as in the ordinary court?—I think the method of paying agents in cases under the Debts Recovery Act is objectionable, but it could easily be improved.

2527. How?—A certain fee is allowed for the whole trouble in the cause; but I would split it, and allow so much for taking out the summons, so much for stating the note of pleas, and so much for the trial per hour. I would allow nothing except for these three things; but the fee for the trial would be larger or smaller, as the case occupied the agent's time.

2528. Mr. Webster.—Would you allow nothing for precognitions?—No. You might give an additional fee for the first hour to cover that.

2529. Suppose a case requiring half a dozen or a dozen witnesses to be collected from different parts of the country, do you think the agent should do all that for nothing?—That would be generally covered by his larger fee for attendance at the proof. The next point is the privileges of agents. I do not think that country agents, even though they had power to practise in the Court of Session, could satisfactorily conduct their cases there, and that they would require the assistance of an Edinburgh agent. Possibly if they had the power to practise, they might be able to make a better arrangement with the Edinburgh agent as to a division of the fees. I have heard that such arrangements are not uncommon even now, whether enforceable or not. Perhaps, if not enforceable, they might be declared legal by statute, and thus remove any existing feeling of hardship on the part of the country agent. I am informed that in England such arrangements are quite common, and held to be legal.

2530. Can you make any comparison between the scale of fees in the two countries—divisible and indivisible?—No. As to the Commissary Court, I have no suggestion to make. Its business is of a simple kind, and it seems to be satisfactorily performed in my county.

2531. Would you keep it up as a separate court from the Sheriff Court, with a separate staff?—Well, that may or may not be. It would be some saving to the country if it was incorporated with the Sheriff Court.

2532. The Chairman.—Do you see any propriety or any impropriety in agents being entitled to practise in any Sheriff Court, if they choose?—None.

2533. Do you approve of that?—I do.

2534. You would give them a general power to practise?—Yes, in any Sheriff Court.

2535. Would you require that they should be admitted to the Faculty of Procurators in the place where they were going to practise?—No; I would admit them simply to practise in the courts.

2536. The faculty have privileges which may be more or less of a pecuniary or patrimonial character?—Quite so.

2537. Mr. Baxter.—You don't think, considering the manner in which agents are admitted, that they should be excluded from any Sheriff Court?—Certainly not from any local court.

2538. Dr. Barclay.—Would you require them to make a separate application for admission to a court? Or should their general appointment extend over the whole country?—I would admit them.

2539. The Chairman.—You would require them to put themselves on the roll—the court would admit them?—Yes.

2540. Would you confine the privilege to those who have been admitted under the new regulations as to education, and so forth?—I think that would be invidious. I don't think I would. I would allow all who are practitioners in one court to practise in every other.

2541. Mr. Webster.—If you would permit practitioners before the Sheriff to practise in the Court of Session, would you permit agents in the Court of Session to practise in all Sheriff Courts?—I would not admit country agents to practise in the Court of Session.

2542. I understood you to express the view that they would not avail themselves of the right, but that if they had it, they would use it for the purpose of making arrangements with the Edinburgh agent?—That is the only advantage to them.

2543. You have given your opinion on the assumption that they are to have the right of practising here; now, if you admit the Sheriff Court agents to practise in the Court of Session, would you give Court of Session agents the right to practise in the Sheriff Courts?—Certainly I would. Sheriff Court agents talk about being permitted to practise in the Court of Session as removing a grievance which they feel; and what I meant was, that in place of giving them the remedy they ask, it might be enough to say that any bargain made between them and the Edinburgh agents should be legal and enforceable, without giving them the power to practise there.

2544. Dr. Barclay.—As to the Commissary Courts, do you find any advantage in having two separate staffs of clerks?—No advantage, but no harm. It is a mere question of expense.

2545. The Chairman.—Would there not be this advantage in combining the offices of Sheriff-clerk and Commissary-clerk, that the same person would have the custody of the records in all cases?—Yes, there would, no doubt, be an advantage. It would make one office for all the judicial business of the county.

2546. Mr. Baxter.—Does your Sheriff-clerk do the duty in person?—Yes.

2547. Mr. Shand.—Have you any procurators who are procurators in the Commissary Court and not in the Sheriff Court, or vice versa?—No.

2548. Do you know that that is the case in some counties?—No.

2549. The Chairman.—Have you anything to state as to Burgh Courts?—There is little law business in the Burgh Court of Stirling, beyond issuing peace-warnings forty days before Whitsunday, and an occasional process of ejection arising out of them. There are also applications for aliment at the instance of debtors in prison, under the Act of Grace. If the Burgh Courts do no good, they do no harm.

2550. Lord Barcaple.—Is there any benefit in present times from keeping up the civil jurisdiction of the Burgh Courts?—No benefit.

2551. Mr. Baxter.—Is it ever exercised?—Not beyond what I have stated.

2552. Mr. Shand.—I presume you would transfer the power to the Sheriff?—Yes; and there is another reason for doing so—because the form of process adopted in that court is the old-fashioned form. There is no separate Dean of Guild Court in Stirling, and no Dean of Guild business. If there was any, it would be done in the Burgh Court.

2553. The Chairman.—Is there any objection to its being done by the Sheriff?—None; it should be done by the Sheriff, in my opinion.

2554. Dr. Barclay.—You say there is no Dean of Guild Court in Stirling; are you aware that the ruling decision as to guildry jurisdiction is The Dean of Guild of Stirling v. The Sheriff of Stirling in 1775, finding that the Sheriff had no power to exercise guildry jurisdiction in the town of Stirling?—Yes.

2555. The Chairman.—Has the Dean of Guild jurisdiction ceased to be exercised?—There is a Dean of Guild, but he holds no court. As to Baron and Regality Courts, I may state that in Stirlingshire there is a Baron Court at Kilsyth, with a magistrate chosen annually. Very little business is done in it. Occasionally, however, parties are taken before it for assaults and breaches of the peace, and there has been collision between the Baron Court and the Sheriff Court in some matters of that kind. In particular, after the rural police constable had made inquiries and reported, with a view to its being considered whether there should be a prosecution in the Sheriff Court, the matter was taken up by the burgh authorities; and there was an instance where, after certain parties had been prosecuted in the Sheriff Court at the instance of the Fiscal, the Burgh authorities took in the complaint of those who had been punished, and raised a prosecution for the same act against those who had complained to the police, and whose information had been acted upon in the Sheriff Court. I think the Baron Court useless, and a source of evil. There is also a Bailie of Regality at Denny, but no business is done before him.

2556. Mr. Webster.—By whom is the Baron Bailie elected?—By the burgesses.

2557. Dr. Barclay.—Have you never had res judicata pleaded upon a Baron conviction?—I think that occurred a good many years ago.

2558. Mr. Baxter.—Then you can conceive a case being brought in his court in order to prevent it from being brought before the Sheriff?—I can.

2559. Dr. Barclay.—You say they don't do much business?—Not much.

2560. Is there not a leading case of a bailie having convicted a man, and driven him to jail in his own cart?—Yes. The cases in the Baron Court at Kilsyth average six criminal cases every fortnight.

2561. The Chairman.—These are police cases?—Yes.

2562. Dr. Barclay.—Have they availed themselves of the General Police Act?—No.

2563. Have they any civil jurisdiction? have they the 40s. jurisdiction?—They might exercise it, but they don't.

2564. Mr. Webster.—Do you think their power to do so should be abolished?—Decidedly. There is a Police Court in the Royal Burgh of Stirling, presided over by the magistrates of the burgh. The business seems to be satisfactorily performed.

2566. Dr. Barclay.—Do they never take up night poaching cases?—No, that is done in the Sheriff Court.

2567. Have they the jurisdiction?—Yes, but it is not done.

2568. Mr. Shand.—Do you think there should be any change in the jurisdiction of the Justice of Peace Court?—I think that it is unnecessary to maintain the Justices' civil jurisdiction, but I think it is useful to preserve their criminal jurisdiction.

2569. Would you limit that criminal jurisdiction to any extent? I refer particularly to game cases?—That is a matter I think for the Legislature alone. It is a large public question.

2570. The Chairman.—The magistrates in Stirling grant licences for public-houses?—The magistrates of the burgh license the public-houses within the burgh.

2571. Are their deliverances in that matter subject to review by the Quarter Sessions?—Yes.

2572. Is that jurisdiction exercised in Stirling by the Justices?—Yes.

2573. Is it advantageous to have a control of that kind?—I do think so. There was an instance this year where I think it was judiciously and rightly exercised by the Justices.

2574. Do you think, on the whole, that the Justices exercise that jurisdiction properly?—I do think so.

2575. Do they exercise jurisdiction in Inland Revenue cases?—Yes.

2576. Dr. Barclay.—Have you a separate Fiscal, or the same Fiscal?—The same gentleman happens to be Fiscal in both courts.

2577. Therefore there is no collision?—No.

2578. The Chairman.—Have you any collision with the county police authorities?—None whatever.

2579. That works smoothly?—Perfectly smoothly. It is very satisfactory indeed.

2580. Do you find the police authorities always willing to carry out whatever you think expedient, and direct to be done?—In every instance they have done so.

2581. Whether you direct it in person or through your Fiscal?—Yes.

2582. Mr. Webster.—Do you attend at the taking of prisoners' declarations, and dictate what is to be taken down?—The Procurator-fiscal asks the questions, and I dictate the whole declaration.

2583. Lord Barcaple.—Do you attend at the taking of precognitions?—I do not.

2584. I suppose in extraordinary cases you do so?—Yes.

2585. But in ordinary cases the Sheriffs in Scotland do not attend the taking of precognitions?—They do not.

2586. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you would find it impossible to do so?—I could not do so and attend to my other duties.

2587. Do you think the present mode of investigating sudden deaths, and deaths by accident, is satisfactory to the public?—I do. In looking back over my experience, I don't know any instance in which either the accused or the public suffered from the investigation being in private.

2588. And as to sudden deaths?—Either sudden deaths or otherwise.

2589. The Chairman.—Do you attend to the precognition yourself in the case of very grave crimes, such as murder?—I do; in all grave cases.

2590. Lord Barcaple.—Do you attend the precognition throughout in these cases?—I attend the precognition of all the leading witnesses.

2591. Dr. Barclay.—Do you think that the introduction of coroners' inquests into Scotland would be of any advantage?—I don't think so.

2593. Dr. Barclay.—Have you ever known a person put on his trial for murder, when you were quite aware that there could be no conviction, simply for the purpose of satisfying the public?—No; not in our county. We have not had a murder case for a great many years. I have heard of its being done in larger places, and I know that it has been done, but it has not been done with us.

J. Guthrie Smith, Esq., examined.

2594. The Chairman.—You are a member of the bar of Scotland?—I am.

2595. How many years have you been so?—Since 1855.

2596. You are Sheriff-substitute at Dundee?—I am Sheriff-substitute at Dundee, having previously for two years, from October 1860, acted as Sheriff-substitute at Forfar.

2597. How long have you been at Dundee?—Since December 1866.

2598. Dundee is a place with a large population?—The estimated population is about 120,000. The town has a large export and import trade, and is the chief seat of the linen manufacture in Scotland. Besides that, I have jurisdiction over the neighbouring portion of the county, containing a population of about 30,000 or 40,000.

2599. There are two substitutes in the county?—Yes; there is a Sheriff-substitute at Forfar, and one at Dundee.

2600. What is your opinion as to the present constitution of the Sheriff Court with reference to Sheriffs and Sheriff-substitutes?—It appears to me that the present constitution of the Sheriff Court is objectionable. Were it proposed to establish the County Courts in Scotland for the first time, I don't believe that the judge of the Sheriff Court would be allowed to continue his practice at the bar, and appoint a brother barrister to do his work for him on the spot as his depute, the depute's acts being sent up to the principal in Edinburgh for his approval and confirmation. That is practically the state of things which now exists, and that seems to me to be objectionable in many particulars. In the first place, it gives rise to great delay; the delay involved in a system which keeps the case oscillating between the resident and the non-resident judge. There are five different stages at which it is competent to appeal against the interlocutors of the Sheriff-substitute; namely, the interlocutor repelling preliminary pleas, the interlocutor allowing a proof, rulings on points of evidence during the trial after proof is ordered, the interlocutor on the merits, and the interlocutor on the expenses. One can easily imagine the facilities for staving off a just demand which a system of this kind gives to a debtor, whose only true defence is that he has no money wherewith to pay the debt. He puts on record a preliminary plea; that is repelled. He then appeals against the Sheriff-substitute's judgment; that removes the case to the Sheriff for a time. The same thing takes place when the case is ordered for trial. At the close of the trial further delay may be gained by bringing under review all the rulings on points of evidence at the trial, and so on till the opponent's patience is exhausted, and he is disposed to settle upon very easy terms. The mode in which this state of things has arisen is instructive: when in the year 1746 the Sheriff of the shire was permitted to appoint a substitute or substitutes, he was taken bound to reside in the county for at least four months every year. It was not then intended apparently that the substitutes should be lawyers,—at least I have been told they were not in point of fact lawyers, many of them being half-pay officers and landed gentlemen; and in some counties the cases, without being decided by the Sheriff-substitute at all, were merely sent up by him to the Sheriff in Edinburgh, and the opinion of the Sheriff was signed by the substitute upon the spot. Since then, by the 6 Geo. IV. c. 23, the substitute now requires to be a member of the Faculty of Advocates, or a member of the legal profession, and in 1838 he was declared to be irremoveable. Thus it has happened that two courts and two judges have been created out of what, in theory at least, is only one court. I would also say, that I think the present system is objectionable, in so far as the power of appointing any person to a judicial office should not be vested in a private individual. I think that that power should only be vested in a Minister of State, who can answer for his conduct in Parliament. At the same time, I am bound to say that, so far as I am aware, the appointments which have been made by the Sheriffs have given general satisfaction to the country. But it seems to me that the public would have a better guarantee that the best person was appointed to fill the office were the power of selection vested in a Minister of State, who is thinking only of the public interest, and who would be responsible for his proceedings to Parliament. I may also take leave to say that I think the present system, by circumscribing the position and keeping down the salary of the Sheriff-substitute, makes the office less attractive to men of talent and learning than it should be. The money given to the office by Parliament having to be divided between two men—the resident and the non-resident judges—the salaries of the resident judges are much too small. Any one who compares the quantity and kind of the work done by the Sheriff-substitutes, with the work done by the County Court judges in England, and the salaries received by them respectively, must admit that the salaries paid to the Scotch Sheriff-substitutes are too small. In such cases I think the salary should be fixed on the principle, not simply of its being a payment for the work actually done, but of being large enough to attract the best talent from a profession in which a successful practitioner makes much money. The remedy seems to me either to abolish the Sheriff-principal or the Sheriff-substitutes, and appoint in their room one efficient resident judge with a competent salary. I would only further point out to the Commissioners that the duties of the Sheriffs at present are either judicial or ministerial, either as appeal judges, or as connected with the administration of the law and of the police in the county. Now, looking at the matter in these two aspects, first as regards the duties which devolve upon them other than as appeal judges, it seems to me that the office of Sheriff is unnecessary. The Sheriff may conduct inquiries for the Secretary of State as to the propriety of proposed provisional orders, and hear applications for the closing of burial-grounds under the Burial Grounds Act, hear appeals from the decisions of the Police Commissioners under various Police Statutes, and he may take the general supervision of the police; but in all such and the like matters the Sheriff-substitute is entitled to act, and frequently does act, and I presume to say is just as well qualified to act as the Sheriff-principal. When the Sheriff-principal is so occupied, the Sheriff-substitute may be going about doing nothing. Then the Sheriff is entrusted with the revision of the register of electors, and acts as returning officer at the election of members of Parliament. It seems to me an unseemly thing, that a person who may be acting as a political partisan in one county is entrusted with duties of that kind in another county. I rather think that the person who should act in these matters is one who, like the Sheriff-substitute, does not meddle with politics at all. Then I think that, looking at the Sheriff as an appeal judge, the present system of review is objectionable. I think that the system rests upon a wrong principle; in fact, it is contrary to all the principles by which an appeal is, or at least ought to be, regulated. An appeal means an appeal from a judge ill informed to a judge better informed. Now in matters of law this may be the case in some counties, but at best the appeal is but an appeal from one judge to another judge, and that judge of the same rank. As regards facts, the case is worse. Here the Sheriff-substitute sees the witnesses, the Sheriff-principal does not. He has nothing before him but the Sheriff-substitute's notes of evidence; and in estimating the weight of evidence, attention must be given to the terms of the question as well as the answer, and above all to the witness' demeanour, and consequently in this case the appeal is from a judge well informed to a judge worse informed. The more numerous and the more dense the media through which testimony has to pass before it reaches the judge's mind, the greater is the liability to mistake. The only further observation I have to make as to the constitution of the court is as to the office of the Sheriff-clerk. At present there is one Sheriff-clerk for each county, who appoints a depute to each court in the county. These deputes are most efficient public servants, but they are very poorly paid. The more efficient they are, the less necessary it is to have a Sheriff-clerk. I think one clerk should be appointed for each court, with a competent salary. The Sheriff-clerk may himself do the work, by giving personal attendance at his office where there is only one court; but where, as in Forfarshire, there are two, it is obvious that he cannot be in two places at the same time. At Dundee the depute-clerk has a salary of only £155, while the salary of the depute at Forfar is only £110. The entire expense of both the offices at Forfar and at Dundee must be under £600, and yet the principal clerk gets a salary of £1000 a year as Sheriff-clerk, and draws from £600 to £700 a year as Commissary-clerk. The country thus gives this gentleman close on £1200 a year for doing literally nothing, but dividing among those who do the work £600 of the public money.

J. Guthrie Smith.

2601. Mr. Baxter.—Does he not do the duty in person?—He does not, but he is resident, and occasionally comes to the office.

2602. The Chairman.—Are these all the observations you have to make on the constitution of the court?—Yes.

2603. What are your suggestions with a view of remedying the evils which you think exist?—The suggestion I would make is, that the office of Sheriff-substitute should be abolished, or perhaps both the offices of Sheriff-principal and Sheriff-substitute should be abolished; and the Crown should be empowered to select from the two one efficient resident judge at a greatly increased salary, and that an official resembling the registrar of the County Courts should be appointed by the Crown to each Sheriff Court to perform the duties of clerk.

2604. Would you make the judgments of that resident Sheriff final?—I think there should be an appeal in all cases, because it acts as a most efficient check on the manner in which the local judge performs his duties. I think that there should be an appeal upon a case stated, on questions of law only, in all cases under £50 or thereby, and that there should be an appeal upon fact as well as law upon cases above that amount. That appeal, in my opinion, should if possible lie to the Supreme Court, or at all events to judges of the rank of supreme judges, provided that can be done at such an expense as a Sheriff Court case can reasonably bear. It seems to me, that by some alteration of the present system, and also some change in the usages at the bar, it would be possible to get a case argued before the Supreme Court at an expense of ten guineas a side or so. In the first place, I think only one counsel should be employed upon each side, and I would put an end to all such fees as for moving the case to the roll, approving of the auditor's report, and so on. My opinion is, that if the case be once in the hands of the clerk, it should find its way to the roll itself, and in that way the cost would simply be the cost of the argument. But if the people of Scotland cannot have a case argued before the Supreme Court for less than ten guineas a side, it will be necessary to establish some new court of appeal; and the next best thing to the review which I have indicated is an ambulatory court of appeal composed of two judges of a greatly more elevated rank than that held by the Sheriff-substitute.

2605. Dr. Barclay.—Supposing these two judges differed?—If they differed, then the judgment of the resident Sheriff would stand.

2606. Would three not be a better number?—No, I think two is sufficient.

2607. The Chairman.—How many districts would you assign to these judges?—I think if two judges were resident in Glasgow, they might overtake the counties of Lanark, Dumbarton, Ayr, Renfrew, Galloway, and the West Highlands, which contain a population of about 1,250,000; and I think the two other judges might move between Edinburgh, Perth, and Aberdeen, for the rest of Scotland.

2608. Then you would have four such judges?—Yes.

2609. How often should they hold their courts?—I think they might reasonably be expected to be in each place about once a month, except, of course, during the vacation.

2610. In what places would they hold their courts?—For example, to take my own district, with which I am most familiar,—Perth might be the place of meeting of the court of review for the counties of Perth, Fife, and Forfar. It is easily accessible by rail, and the procurators would feel no inconvenience in attending it. Then the court at Aberdeen might hear cases from the counties running along the shores of the Moray Firth. In dealing with matters of this kind, it is to be remembered that the bulk of the population of Scotland is resident in some seven towns.

2611. You have mentioned two places on one side of the country: on the other side, Glasgow would be one place of meeting; and where would be the other?—I would propose that of the four judges, two should sit at Glasgow continuously, and the other two at Edinburgh, Perth, and Aberdeen.

2612. Dr. Barclay.—Have you thought what salary you would give, in order to get men of the eminence you want?—I am not prepared to express an opinion on that subject. The salary should be such as to command the best talent which the bar of Scotland can afford for such duties.

2613. The Chairman.—You say that the salary of the resident Sheriffs should be greatly increased. What amount of salary do you think would command the services of persons suitable for that office?—Jurisdictions of course vary in importance; but where the duties are moderately extensive, I should think that the Sheriff-substitute should at least have £1200 a year.

2615. Dr. Barclay.—That is your maximum?—The range might be from £1000 to £1500 a year.

2618. What kind of salary do you think would command the services of the persons whom you talk of for the ambulatory court of appeal? You say they ought to be superior in position and qualification to those from whom the appeal is taken. What sort of salary would you propose for them?—They could not be allowed to practise at the bar; and that being so, I think the salary should be at least £1800 or £2000 a year.

2619. Dr. Barclay.—Would you give them their travelling expenses besides?—That is a matter of detail to which I have not turned my attention.

2620. The Chairman.—Do you think that would command the services of persons of the highest qualifications?—I think it would.

2621. Mr. Webster.—With or without retiring allowances?—I think all public servants should have retiring allowances, after a certain number of years' service, when they give up everything for the sake of the public service.

2622. The Chairman.—Do you take into consideration the surrender of prospects that exist, and that persons in high position at the bar are avowedly entertaining, of promotion?—Of course, a person who expects to be a supreme judge in time, would not surrender his position for an inferior one.

2623. Dr. Barclay.—Would he not be in a better position for another step? Would he not get more judicial experience than he could get from practising at the bar?—It is probable that would be the case. Moreover, if the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court is to be extended, and if the ambulatory court of appeal is to be established, one can easily see that that would involve important changes in the Court of Session. The number of judges would probably require to be reduced, and the chances of promotion at the bar would be proportionately lessened.

2624. The Chairman.—Would you allow an appeal from the judgment of the perambulatory judges to the Court of Session?—No; I think their decision should be final.

2625. In all cases?—In all cases that originate in the Sheriff Court. I think that a case which was so heard and disposed of, would probably be decided in a manner satisfactory to the country.

2626. Mr. Adam.—Would you allow an appeal from them to the House of Lords?—No; I say it should be final; but the proposal admits of this qualification, that cases above a certain value should all go to the Supreme Court, so as to keep the path open to the House of Lords.

2627. The Chairman.—The jurisdiction of the Sheriff extends to any amount in personal matters?—Yes.

2628. Do you think it ought to be extended in other respects?—Of course I am keeping in view the fact, that although the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court at present extends to any amount in petitory claims, it is competent to either party to remove the case to the Supreme Court, when a proof is ordered, if it be above £40. I think that right should be reserved, the sum being perhaps raised. If the party chooses to have his case tried in the Supreme Court, and it is of importance and value sufficient to justify its being taken there, I think he should have that right. But as to the question of the extension of jurisdiction, I think, in the first place, that the mere form of the action is no reason for excluding the jurisdiction of the local court. At present we have no power to deal with actions of declarator or reduction, or the process of suspension, except in limited cases. I think that, as regards form, every kind of action should be competent before the judge ordinary, the form I venture to suggest being in the shape of a petition or bill setting forth the relief prayed for in the manner proposed in the Court of Session Bill of 1862. It would be of great importance, for instance, were trustees able to obtain the opinion of a court of law in this manner, on a doubtful or obscure clause in a will; and I think that if Sheriff-substitutes may be entrusted with the decision of a question whether a person is indebted in the sum of £5000, he may surely be entrusted with the power of making a declaration that such and such is the measure of a party's legal rights in certain circumstances, or that a particular deed is null on the ground of fraud, or insanity, or intoxication, or anything of that kind. What is required is not to exclude the jurisdiction of the local court, but to afford a ready means of review from its decision; so that, if the inferior judge goes wrong, he would be easily set right.

2629. Would you extend the jurisdiction further in other matters?—I think that cases involving questions as to the title to land should also be competent in the Sheriff Court, either absolutely, or where the subject is of the worth of £20 a year, as is provided in the last English County Courts Amendment Act, 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 142. It seems to me unreasonable that the Sheriff may try the right to thousands of pounds, and yet be incapable of dealing with cases relating to a yard of land. This, I believe, simply operates in many cases as a denial of justice, because cases occur where the parties will not go to the Court of Session on account of the expense.

2630. Are there any other matters to which you would extend the jurisdiction?—The only other matter which I have considered, and I confess I have had some difficulty in forming an opinion upon it, is as to whether the action of divorce should be competent in the Sheriff Court. Some people think that decrees of divorce should not be granted at all; others that, if this remedy is allowed, it should at least not be too easy of attainment. Now I daily see abundance of evidence of the grievous hardship which is caused to the working classes from its being incompetent to bring an action of divorce save in the Court of Session. A woman takes to drink; she strips the poor man's home of all its furniture, in order to procure the means of ministering to her depraved appetite. He is obliged to turn her out of doors; then she gets from bad to worse, and after leading a life of open infamy, she hangs like a millstone round his neck; she contracts debt in his name. He cannot marry again; his home is desolate, and there is no one to act the part of a mother to his unfortunate children. If he does form another connection, it usually takes the odious and debasing form of concubinage. Stories of that kind are constantly cropping out in the course of criminal investigations, and in the Small Debt Court. I am sure that, if I have seen one instance of this, I have seen a dozen since I went to Dundee. The remedy is to allow cases of divorce to be entertained by the Sheriff, the Procurator-fiscal being bound to sist himself as a party in every case for the protection of the public interest, and an appeal being competent at his instance or at the instance of either of the parties to the Supreme Court. I also think the Sheriff might be safely entrusted with the power of appointing a judicial factor where the legal title to a property was in abeyance either from the person being absent or being a lunatic, or the lapse of a trust. I see occasionally instances of the inconvenience which results from the present system. I suggest to the parties that they should get a factor appointed. The answer is, the expense is too great, and the estate is too poor to afford it. I think, therefore, the Sheriff should have power to appoint judicial factors. I can give an instance from my own practice of the mischief which results from confining these appointments to the Supreme Court. William M'Laren, a cattle-dealer in the village of Comrie, became imbecile. He was an old man, about seventy years of age. He had no relatives nearer than second or third cousins. A natural daughter kept his house. His funds consisted of £170, which was lodged in the Central Bank at Crieff. The girl, taking advantage of the imbecility of the old man, induced him to indorse the deposit-receipts; she uplifted the money from the bank, and lodged £140 in her own name in the Commercial Bank at Comrie, and the remaining £30 in the name of her father and herself. This was in July 1860. The facts having oozed out, M'Laren was indignant at the trick which had been played upon him; and a distant relative, Mrs. M'Call, on 5th September 1860, presented an application to the Lord Ordinary for the appointment of a curator bonis, the application being accompanied by two medical certificates, and the object being that the factor should recover the money for the old man's use from his natural daughter. The Lord Ordinary ordered service on M'Laren and his daughter, and answers were given in in the name of the daughter on two grounds: first, that Mrs. M'Call was no relative, and had no title to make the application; and second, that M'Laren was not imbecile. The case gave rise to a great variety of procedure, which ended in the whole objections to the petition being declared unfounded, and on 12th February 1861 the factor was at length appointed. The daughter was found liable in costs, but she had nothing to pay them with. The accounts were taxed at a large sum, and the £170 which constituted the poor man's all went to pay the expenses, and he himself was thrown on the parish. Very soon after, the factor, having no estate to attend to, obtained the recall of his appointment, and his discharge.

J. Guthrie Smith.

2631. Mr. Baxter.—Would you extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to cases under the Conjugal Rights Act?—Yes; I think it would be expedient that the Sheriff should have power under that statute.

2632. Would you extend it to suspensions of charges?—Yes.

2633. Dr. Barclay.—Above £25?—Yes. We have it up to that point at present.

2634. Mr. Baxter.—Do you see any occasion for limiting it?—No, provided there is an efficient mode of appeal.

2635. The Chairman.—Is there any class of cases in which you think the judgment of the resident Sheriff should be final?—The judgment of the resident Sheriff is final now in cases up to £12 in the Small Debt Court. I don't think it expedient to extend the jurisdiction of the Small Debt Court; but I think that even in cases below £12, a party should be entitled to demand a case for the opinion of the appeal court on questions of law, probably with the leave of the judge. In the Small Debt Court, questions involving an important principle are frequently brought for the purpose of having that question determined: for example, the right to a toll, or a right to levy a particular rate, and matters of that kind.

2636. In those cases in which the judgment of the local court was not final, would you allow an appeal to the ambulatory court?—In all cases. I would say that, between £12 and £50, I think the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, or, as I would rather call him, the resident Sheriff, should be final in matters of fact; but there should be an appeal upon matters of law. As to cases above that sum, I think that the powers of the court of review should be similar to those which are embodied in the Debts Recovery Act; that is to say, the court of review should have the entire control of the case, the judgment of the Sheriff as to fact being treated as the verdict of a jury: in dubio, to stand; but if in their opinion against evidence, to be recalled, and a new trial ordered, or the case to be remitted, with instructions to take further evidence on a particular point. But every case involves a mixed question of law and fact; and if the court of review saw their way to reversing the decision of the local judge without further inquiry, they should have the power to do so.

2637. Would you have an appeal to the ambulatory court in all the cases to which you would extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs?—Yes, in all these cases. But I repeat that I think the best mode of review is review by the Supreme Court; and I think that the ambulatory court should only be established as a court of review in the event of its being found impossible to obtain review in the Supreme Court without very great expense.

2638. Supposing the ambulatory court to exist, would you give a party the option of appealing to it or to the Court of Session?—Probably it might be expedient that he should have that option.

2639. Do you think that the expense of the appeal to the ambulatory court would be greater or less than the expense of appealing to the Sheriff at present?—I don't think it would be any less than the expense of the present appeal to the Sheriff. The appeal to the Sheriff is a very inexpensive proceeding, but I don't think it is satisfactory.

2640. Do you think the expense would be greater?—I think that the procurators should be allowed much larger fees for the work they do than they now receive; and it may be that counsel would be employed in these courts, in which case the expense would be greater; but I don't think any person would object if the expenses were limited to £5, 5s. or £6, 6s., as I think they might be.

2641. Your main objection to the appeal at present is, that it is from one judge well informed to another judge not so well informed, and that there is great delay?—Yes.

2642. You propose to remedy that by sending two judges to deal with the appeal?—Yes.

2643. They would be in the same condition as to information that the one judge at present is in?—They would be so; but I propose that they should be persons of a higher position than the existing Sheriffs are as a class, and should deal with cases in a different way. I don't propose that they should be required to find out the truth of a case from the judge's notes of evidence, without seeing the witnesses. They should consider the decision which he has come to with his notes before them, treating his judgment very much as the verdict of a jury, and the judgment standing in dubio. But if they think he has come to a wrong result, the proper procedure would be to enter a new trial, or to remit the case with instructions.

2644. That is as to course of procedure; but their information, when the case came before them, would be of the same character with that which the present Sheriff in appeal has?—Yes.

2645. But there is the benefit of two judges?—Yes.

2646. Suppose that two Sheriffs, as now constituted, went to hear appeals once a month, or once in six weeks, would that meet your view?—That would be the ambulatory court which I propose; but of the twenty-four Sheriffs, you would be able to dispense with twenty.

2647. That would be equally effective with the per-ambulatory court?—I entirely hold to the opinion that a review by two judges is greatly superior to a review by one.

2648. And that would remove that objection?—No doubt it would.

2649. If that were compatible with the avocations of the Sheriffs practising at the bar, what would be the objection?—I would see no objection to that at all, except, of course, that I think the Sheriffs should be relieved of all duties unconnected with those devolving upon them as appeal judges.

2650. All executive duties?—Yes. The Sheriff-substitute is on the spot to perform them, and there is no use of appointing two men to do what one of them can well enough do.

2651. You think that the judges on appeal ought to be persons of high qualifications at the bar?—Most certainly.

2652. You said higher than those who are resident Sheriffs?—Yes.

2653. Would it be an advantage to have a person of that sort to see to the proper performance of the executive duties, or to perform them themselves in cases of difficulty?—I think the resident Sheriff should be capable of doing all the duties which the Sheriff now does; otherwise he should not be appointed.

2654. You say that the appointments of Sheriff-substitutes are good?—Yes. I am not prepared to say anything to the contrary.

2655. What is the objection you have to a person not resident, assisting or superintending and seeing that the duties are properly done?—The only objection I have is, that his superintendence is unnecessary. There is a curious provision in the Act 16 and 17 Vict. c. 80, § 46, in which the Sheriff is directed to go once in the year the Small Debt Circuit in use to be held by the Sheriff-substitute. Now in Dundee there are 1600 small debt summonses issued every year, and on an average from 40 to 60 small debt cases are tried every week. What is the use of appointing the Sheriff to hold one of the 40 courts that I hold in the course of the year, and to try some 50 or 60 of the more than 1000 cases that I have to try in the course of the year? There would be no use for him in that case, and there is no use for his going circuit. In the office, as at present held, there are many anomalies of that kind. I think, if one official judge is resident on the spot to do all duties in the Sheriff Court, that should be enough, and it is unnecessary to appoint two.

2656. Mr. Baxter.—Do you ever feel yourself discredited, as resident judge, by the Sheriff coming and suspending you?—No. I feel no discredit in the matter.

2657. You don't feel that it lowers your status?—I don't think that the presence of the Sheriff in the county lowers my status in the least.

2659. The Chairman.—Do you think it an advantage or a disadvantage, that a person not resident, and not under the suspicion of being subjected to local influences, should go into the county occasionally?—I don't think there is any advantage in it. I believe it is the case generally; but I can at all events speak for my own county, that the Sheriff-substitutes make it a point to keep themselves clear of all local influences; and I think the public regard them as being just as free from local influences as the Sheriff-principal.

2660. The Lord Advocate.—What is the precise benefit that you expect to accrue to the litigants from a change in the appellate jurisdiction? Is it economy, or despatch, or the quality of the judgment to be obtained?—One great object of a court of appeal should be to give coherence and uniformity to the law. That cannot be said to be the case when there are twenty-four Sheriffs over the country, assuming their decisions to be final. If it is desired that uniformity and coherence should be given to the law, then an appeal should be to one central court; and therefore I say that the appeal should be straight from the Sheriff-substitute to the Court of Session; and if that cannot be got save at a great expense, then I suggest the ambulatory court as the next best thing that I can think of, and which would just come to be a branch of the Supreme Court, two judges being in Glasgow and two for the rest of Scotland.

2661. Then it is uniformity of the law that is the main object of this change?—That is one benefit.

2662. What is the present expense of an appeal in your court?—I have no means of stating that.

2663. What is the average?—I don't know.

2664. Is it not a matter of some consequence, with reference to the arrangement which you propose?—I don't know the expense of an appeal.

2665. Do you imagine it to be anything like £10 a side?—I am aware that it is much less than that.

2666. Is it £2 a side?—I really don't know.

2668. So that the litigant would have his remedy abridged to that extent?—But the litigants will have greater cause to be satisfied with the result.

2669. Do you think that the litigants are at present dissatisfied with the result of the judgments on appeal?—The opinion among the mercantile community is decidedly against the double Sheriffship.

2670. Are the litigants dissatisfied with the judgments on appeal, in your opinion?—I have not heard any open expression of dissatisfaction, but I am not prepared to say that grounds for dissatisfaction do not exist; and I am certain that the course I have suggested would give greater satisfaction. So far as I know, the feeling among the mercantile community is against the number of courts which they have to go through in Scotland before a case comes to an end. Mercantile men have told me over and over again that they never think of appealing to the courts of law in regard to any of those numerous questions that are constantly arising: for example, as to a short shipment, or deficiency of quality, or a question on a bill of lading, they refer such a question, and it is settled by arbitration at once; the reason given for that being, that when they enter a Scotch court, there is no saying when the case may come to an end. They have first to go before the Sheriff-substitute, then before the Sheriff, and then to the Court of Session. The remedy I suggest is the one appeal straight to the Supreme Court.

2671. As far as can be seen from the course adopted by the litigants, have you every reason to suppose that they are more dissatisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff-principal than they are with the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute?—I don't know whether they are satisfied or not with the judgment of the Sheriff-principal, but they have to rest content with it, because the expense of bringing it under review is now so great.

2672. Do you know what the percentage of appeals to the Sheriff in your court is?—No, I do not. I never make any inquiry about a case after it has left my hands.

2673. Do you know what the percentage of advocations from final judgments is?—No, I have no information on that point either.

2674. It is competent to advocate the Sheriff-substitute's judgment?—I believe it is competent; but when it was once tried, the party was sent back to the Sheriff, on the ground that he had not exhausted his remedy.

2675. You think it is not now competent?—I am merely stating that as my impression. That was the impression I had when at the bar.

2676. If it were competent, do you think it would be frequently resorted to?—I think it would be resorted to in many cases.

2677. You propose to enlarge the jurisdiction of the Sheriff, and to give jurisdiction to the ambulatory court, if you cannot reduce the expense in the Court of Session to £10 a side. Do you think there might not be a good deal of expense and delay from double instruction, from an agent in Aberdeen, or Inverness, or Perth, being instructed to plead the cases?—I don't think there should be double instruction. I think a person once admitted to practise the law in Scotland should be entitled to practise in any court.

2678. But he must travel to Perth, or Aberdeen, or Edinburgh to plead the case, if there is to be no double instruction?—Yes.

2679. And that expense, and the expense of his living while the case was being conducted, would have to be added to the litigant's expenses?—Of course that would add to the expense; but if any one looks at a railway map of Scotland, he will be astonished at the facilities which exist for carrying out a scheme of that kind. In most cases a party could go to the court and be home again in the evening.

2680. Provided his case were sure to come on?—Yes.

2681. Do you think the present Sheriff-substitutes fit to undertake the duties which you propose to impose upon them?—That is a question which I am not in a position to answer. I would have no hesitation in undertaking them myself.

2682. You had the advantage of having a considerable practice at the bar before you became a Sheriff-substitute?—I had.

2683. That is an advantage which a good many of your brethren had not?—I am not in a position to answer that question; but their practice must have been small indeed, if it was not more than that of some Sheriffs.

2684. Mr. Shand.—You spoke of the delay that is at present caused by cases oscillating between the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute. Have you any remedy to propose to prevent that?—Yes, I think there should be no appeals at all, except at the end of the cause. The experience of my court is, that no practical injustice would result from the appeal being reserved till the end of the cause.

2685. Would you give no power of any kind to appeal during the progress of a case?—Not except with the leave of the court.

2686. Would you give it with the leave of the court?—Probably; if things are to remain as they are.

2687. If that remedy were adopted in any new legislation, it would remove your objection on the ground of delay on appeals?—To a certain extent.

2688. Entirely as far as delay is concerned?—Not altogether.

2689. Would it not put the system exactly on the same footing in reference to delay in obtaining review as an appeal either to the ambulatory court or to the Court of Session?—There would still be delay.

2690. But no greater delay than in the case of the ambulatory court or the Court of Session?—There would be no greater delay in going to the Sheriff.

2691. Therefore that remedy would remove the cause of the delay?—Yes, so far as it abridged the existing right of review.

2692. And the only advantage to be gained by the other system would be getting a decision of higher authority?—Yes.

2693. But which could only be obtained at considerably greater expense?—No doubt.

2694. You approve of the appointments of the Sheriff-substitutes that have been made throughout the country?—I think I may say so, though I am not exactly in a position to give an opinion; but that is the general impression.

2695. Are you aware that, on the occasion of every vacancy of that kind which occurs, a number of competitors come forward for the office?—I believe that generally the Sheriff has an ample choice.

2696. And an ample choice amongst men well qualified for the office as it at present exists?—Yes.

2697. Lord Barcaple.—Have you known cases in each of which appeals have been taken at all the five stages you have mentioned?—These cases don't very often occur. In truth, in my court the great bulk of the business is confined to merely petitory actions.

2698. Would these five stages not occur in a petitory action?—They might; but many a case in my court is decided upon proof, and an appeal is taken against my judgment on the merits, but not till then.

2699. That is to say, usually there is no appeal till you come to the final judgment?—Often there is none; but incidental appeals are very numerous.

2700. You mentioned that mercantile men have frequently told you that they don't take cases into the Sheriff Court in consequence of the number of courts they have to go through. Do you speak of mercantile men resident in Scotland?—I speak of mercantile men in Dundee; but I should also say that there are other reasons which deter a mercantile man from litigation. In the first place, there is a great advantage in having the matter settled at once, in five minutes; secondly, a mercantile man does not like to have his difficulties paraded before the public,—he objects to the publicity; thirdly, there is a great objection to acquire the character of being a litigious person, because many foreign houses send to their correspondents here instructions not to deal with A. B. or C. D. because he is such a litigious person. I believe in great establishments the practice now is either to propose arbitration, or, if that is not agreed to, just to write off the claim as loss.

2701. Dr. Barclay.—Is it not a fifth reason that a number of these cases are technical?—They are usually referred to a person in the trade who knows about them. The cases disposed of in that way may involve £20 or £30, or even £300, and the arbiter gets a fee of three guineas from each party, and there is no record kept.

2702. Mr. Webster.—Many of these disputes also have reference to goods which very rapidly change in value?—That is so.

J. Guthrie Smith.

2703. And the custody of which would be attended with very great expense?—That is also true.

2704. And they necessitate that short mode of settling disputes which could never be carried through in a court?—That is so. I have looked over the litigated cases that were finally decided in the ordinary court at Dundee last year. They amount altogether to 234; of these only 78 have been extracted, and I can give the particulars of these 78 cases, as showing the character of the business I have to do. Of the 78 cases, 5 were actions on bills of exchange, involving the following amounts—£2673, £368, £105, £96, and £50; 16 were actions of damages; 15 were actions of affiliation and aliment; 28 were petitory, involving these amounts—namely, 2 under £100, 1 under £62, 1 under £52, 1 under £50, 5 under £40, 8 under £30, 9 under £20, and 1 under £10. These are the sums which were decerned for. There were 14 miscellaneous cases, involving questions of right of access to a close, delivery of moveables, diversion of a stream, and matters of that kind.

2706. The Chairman.—Would you desire to have the assistance of a jury in disposing of cases before you?—I think a small jury might be had recourse to in actions of damages. I think it is peculiarly the province of a jury to estimate the amount of damages; and probably the objection of expense and time, which is the great objection against jury trial in the Court of Session, would not apply to the Sheriff Court, because at present I have sometimes three or four proofs in the day.

2707. Dr. Barclay.—What number do you suggest for the jury?—A jury of five, I think, would be sufficient.

2708. Would you require that they should be unanimous?—If they were of that number, I think they should be unanimous. In fact, I think the practice of the Scotch courts should be assimilated to the practice of the English County Courts in that matter.

2709. The Chairman.—How do you account for the cases before you on proof being so much shorter than the trials by jury in the Supreme Court?—There is not the elaborate cross-examination that there is in jury trials, as I have seen them, and the procurators have no disposition to spin out the proceedings. I myself frequently make suggestions that a certain point has been, in my opinion, sufficiently established, and that further evidence upon it is unnecessary.

2710. You are, in fact, the jury in that case?—Yes.

2711. Mr. Webster.—Would that advantage not be lost by having a jury?—That would depend very much on how the judge was allowed to put the case to the jury. I have seen an English judge, after a single witness was examined, asking if there was to be any further question as to a particular point, or putting it to the jury if they had any doubt of the witness' testimony.

2712. Have you seen a recent jury case in Ireland which occupied 38 days, and where the jury were not able to give a verdict?—I don't propose to reason from anything Irish in Scotch matters.

2713. Have you anything further to say as to the forms of pleading and the investigation of fact?—I think it is very unfortunate that we should have at present no fewer than three different forms of process in the Sheriff Court. The Debts Recovery Act has certainly given great satisfaction in Dundee. The issue is easily adjusted, and there is no delay whatever; and I think the cases that have been tried under that statute have been tried in a way to give general satisfaction. But it is faulty in two particulars: First, a difficulty arises in knowing whether the case brought under it really is under the statute or not; and then, supposing it be under the statute on one branch of it, there may be another item in the account which is clearly out of the statute, and in that case the only course open is to send the case to the ordinary court. Second, I think the fees allowed to the procurators need revision. I think 10s. is probably a sufficient sum for a decree in absence; because where no appearance has been entered for a defender, the Sheriff-clerk should have power to give decree at once, and I don't think there is any necessity for its being moved in court at all. But where appearance is entered and issue is joined, I think it is unjust that the defender should be permitted to litigate upon such favourable terms as are presented to him in the statute. I think if he litigates wrongously he should pay for it, and that the procurator should get a suitable fee for his trouble. Just now it seems to me that the fees are wholly inadequate for the services rendered; therefore I would suggest that that statute should be repealed, but, at the same time, that the practice which it has introduced, of throwing upon the Sheriff the duty of noting the pleas of parties, should be continued. I think that is a most useful course. Indeed, I am not sure that that is not the meaning of the Act of Parliament that is now in force. The statute of 1853 says that the Sheriff is to hear parties, and to cause a minute of the defence to be written. Nothing is allowed to the procurator for drawing that minute; and it rather appears to me that the meaning was, that the Sheriff should dictate the minute, or write it himself; but the practice is the other way, and I did not choose to interfere with it.

2714. The Chairman.—Do you think that the principle on which the fee to procurators is arranged is erroneous or not?—I think the principle is erroneous. I think the procurator's fee should be proportioned to his services.

2716. It might be remedied under that?—It might; but the Court of Session has not given the Sheriff Court much assistance in the way of Acts of Sederunt. I think, also, if I had the power of allowing a pursuer to put in a minute of replication or answer to the matters stated in defence, it would be a great advantage. Just now the only course open in a case of that kind is to order condescendence and defences; that is a very serious proceeding, and is the cause of great delay. For instance, the course of procedure, where the record has to be made up by condescendence and defences, is this in my court: The first interlocutor is, 'The Sheriff-substitute appoints the record to be made up by condescendence and defences in terms of the statute.' The time is usually allowed to run down without anything being done; the order is renewed to consent, and the papers being at length in, this interlocutor is pronounced: 'The Sheriff-substitute appoints parties' procurators to meet with him next court-day, to adjust and close the record.' At this meeting it is discovered that the defender has added a separate statement of his own, which the other procurator insists on answering. Hence the next order is: 'The Sheriff-substitute appoints one revisal of the condescendence and defences to be made on the original papers within eight days each.' When this order has been complied with, the next interlocutor is: 'The Sheriff-substitute appoints parties' procurators to meet with him to adjust and close the record.' At this meeting it is discovered that a preliminary plea has been put on record, which under statute must be disposed of before the record is closed; and another interlocutor is pronounced: 'Appoints parties' procurators to be heard on the preliminary plea.' The case goes to the debate roll for that purpose, and I dispose of it. Then an appeal is taken to the Sheriff, and the case goes before him. It then comes back, and the record is closed; and after all the record is practically thrown aside, because very likely the case is decided on the proof. In 1867, of the 234 cases disposed of, 54 lasted a month; 26 two months; 15 three months; 29 four months and under; 31 six months and under; 18 eight months and under; 13 ten months and under; 14 twelve months and under; 15 fifteen months and under; 3 eighteen months; 8 two years; 4 several years; and 7 unaccounted for.

2717. Mr. Baxter.—If the pursuer had the power of replication, would many of these condescendences and answers be useless?—That is my impression.

2718. The Lord Advocate.—Have you found, on the whole, that the short form of minute and defence has been preferable to condescendence and answers?—Certainly. At the same time, it is not so artificially prepared as a person accustomed to the rules of good pleading would make it.

2719. You think the form might be better manipulated; but on the whole, you think it has worked satisfactorily?—I think so.

2720. You have suggested that it might be extended to the Sheriff minuting a replication?—Or allowing the pursuer to put in a minute in replication.

2721. Might it not be done by the Sheriff himself noting that on the paper?—I think the Sheriff has that power under the Debts Recovery Act. He is required to take a note of the pleas, which means the pleas of both parties. Hence the issue, under the Debts Recovery Act, is generally brought out in a very clear form. I think the judge might have these three courses open to him in making up the record: he might either in a simple case minute the pleas of parties, as he does in the Debts Recovery Act; or if the defence is longer than he can conveniently take a note of, he should order it to be made up by minute of defence and replication; or if it is a purely equity suit, involving long statements, he might order condescendence and answers.

2722. Don't you think the minute in that shape would be very apt to run into a condescendence?—Anything may be abused.

2723. But your experience would not suggest that?—I think not.

2724. Do you think it better to put it in that shape, or to let the Sheriff minute the reply in larger cases?—The effect of my suggestion would be, that practically, in the great majority of cases, the pleas of parties would be minuted by the court, and only in very special cases would the Sheriff order the minute of replication.

2725. Do you think there would be any harm in abolishing the condescendence and answers?—I don't see how you could frame the pleadings in equity suits without condescendence and answers; but I think some order should be issued by the court as to the form in which a paper like a condescendence should be framed. It seems almost impossible to get a country practitioner to content himself in answering a paper with simply admitting or denying. Occasionally the answer is as long as the statement which he undertakes to answer; and when one comes to the end of the paper, it is impossible to tell the issue between the parties. If the court were to order that they should be framed in such a way as was required by the bill of 1862, that would be a great advantage. I question, also, whether there should be any record at all. I think there should be unlimited power of amendment to the very last entrusted to the discretion of the judge, so as to prevent justice being defeated by technicalities.

2726. You mean any closed record?—Yes.

2727. Mr. Harrison.—Have there been many cases, under the Debts Recovery Act, brought before the courts in Dundee?—A great number.

2729. Have they diminished to the same extent in point of number?—I think many cases are brought under the Debts Recovery Act, of which we heard nothing before.

2730. Then you think it has had the effect of bringing justice home to people's doors who did not ask for it before?—I think it has been a most useful statute, though it contains many blemishes.

2731. But you think that it has made justice cheaper and more speedy than it was to be had previously?—I think that has been the effect of it.

2732. Do you think it is an advantage to the public to have the maximum expense known, as is provided by that Act?—I don't know that there is any great advantage to the public in that. If you confine the maximum to a decree in absence, you do all that the public are entitled to require. The great advantage of the Debts Recovery Act has been the facility it has given to a tradesman to get a decree in absence.

2733. The Lord Advocate.—Is the large proportion of cases which you have had decrees in absence?—A large number of them; but very important questions have been raised and tried under the Debts Recovery Act: for instance, whether a man has ceased to be a partner, questions of warranty, and so on.

2734. Mr. Campbell.—As a general rule, do you find that the practitioners usually require the Sheriff-substitute to make a note of the evidence in writing?—In almost every case they require him to do so.

2735. Dr. Barclay.—Have you adopted shorthand?—No; I make my notes in such a form that they can be read by the Sheriff-principal.

2736. You seem to think that the form of making up the record in the Debts Recovery Act should be adopted?—I think so; it should be extended to all cases.

2737. Your procurators prepare the minutes?—Yes.

2738. Have you not been obliged to purge them and correct them when they ran into argument?—I don't like to meddle with them; I confess I don't purge them. The great objection to the minute of defence is, that it is a mere repetition of the pursuer's story under a different colour, whereas it should raise a distinct plea.

2739. The Chairman.—You point at an assimilation of the form of proceeding in the different classes of cases that come before the Sheriff under the Debts Recovery Act and the ordinary Act?—Yes.

2740. And also the Small Debt Act?—Yes; I think that it would be an improvement, in ordinary petitory suits, if the action were to originate by writ with an endorsement. I think that would be an improvement on the present form of summons. It would be suitable for the Small Debt Court as well as the ordinary court. The form of the Court of Session Bill of 1862, mutatis mutandis, would, I think, supply what is wanted in the Debts Recovery Act.

2741. Dr. Barclay.—Have you had any experience of the practice, where imprisonment follows on a decree for £8, 6s. 8d., that there shall be a suspension, and the case tried over again in the ordinary court?—I have never seen any instance of that.

2742. You seem inclined to give the Sheriff jurisdiction in cases of divorce: do you refer to divorce a vinculo or to divorce a mensa et thoro?—I think both remedies should be competent to the Sheriff. I don't see any harm in that, provided the Fiscal is there to prevent collusion, and provided the parties have an appeal.

2743. Mr. Shand.—Taking the whole of Scotland, are you satisfied that there must be a very great number of cases in which poor persons have grounds for divorce, but cannot obtain it at present on account of the expense?—I think there is no doubt about that.

2745. Would you say that there are hundreds over the country?—I think so; at least a much larger number than that estimate.

2746. Dr. Barclay.—Have you a Commissary Court in Dundee?—Yes; I act as Commissary-depute.

2747. The Chairman.—If there was only one local Sheriff, would you give him power to review his own judgment?—Probably advantage would result from a re-hearing before the same judge. We have that power just now in cessios. Where a party is refused cessio, he may present a reclaiming petition to the same judge who refuses it; and if the Sheriff-substitute is disposed to adhere to his judgment, then the statute requires him to send it on to the Sheriff. I may state that I have altered my opinion under these circumstances, and saved the party the trouble of going further; and I think there would be no harm in allowing the Sheriff-substitute to reconsider his opinion. Perhaps the effect of the decision would be to bring out more clearly to the parties the points on which the case hinges.

2748. Then you think that he should have the power to review his own judgments?—Yes, I think so.

2749. In what form would you have that done?—Either by reclaiming petition or by a motion for re-hearing.

2750. Which of them? or would you give him his choice?—I think he might have his choice.

2751. Mr. Webster.—Would not that add greatly to the cost of each case?—The expense of it would not be very much.

2752. Mr. Shand.—Would it be the same expense as an appeal to the Sheriff?—What I am pointing at is having one efficient local judge instead of the present divided system.

2753. But would it not be the same expense as an appeal to the Sheriff?—Yes, if the case did not go off on the motion.

2754. Mr. Webster.—Do you know that in the Court of Session the Lords Ordinary have not the power of reviewing their own decisions, as they at one time had?—I am aware of that.

2755. Do you approve of that?—I am only speaking of the Sheriff Court. I say nothing about the Court of Session. I speak from my own experience in cessio cases.

2756. The Chairman.—Have you any observation to make on the matter of costs beyond what you have already said?—I think that just now there is no doubt that the right administration of justice greatly depends on the character and the attainments of the men whose business it is to act as pleaders in court, and I think that the fees now allowed to the procurator are too small. In truth, few procurators care for court business at all. They confine themselves to conveyancing and general business, and they rather avoid taking up court business. Now, I think the fees should be such as would be a fair return for the services that these persons render. I would increase the fees, but probably make the steps of process fewer. There are too many sixpences and eighteenpences and items of that kind in the present table.

2757. You would make the steps fewer at which they would be entitled to fees?—I would say the steps for which they should be entitled to fees should be made fewer, but the fees much increased in amount.

2758. Have you anything to say as to the privileges of agents?—I think an agent, when once he has passed and got his certificate of competency from the examining board, should be entitled to practise anywhere, in any court.

2759. In the Court of Session?—I see no distinction between the Court of Session and the local courts. I think the practice of the two kingdoms, England and Scotland, should be assimilated in that particular.

2760. What would be the qualifications you would require?—The qualification which is now required,—namely, a certain amount of literary attainment, a knowledge of the law, and of the practice of both the superior and inferior courts.

2761. Mr. Baxter.—You don't think that any faculty should have exclusive privileges?—Just so; I think no faculty should have any exclusive privilege, or should be, in fact, a professional trades' union.

2762. The Chairman.—Would you carry that into the Faculty of Advocates?—I am not prepared to abolish the distinction which now exists between the bar and the agents. I think we have experience to guide us in that matter—the experience of America, where it was attempted; and the result was, that it gave rise to partnerships, the one partner acting as a barrister and the other as a solicitor.

2763. Are you aware that that was the system in Scotland at one time, when the same person conducted the cases and pleaded them?—Yes.

2764. And that was departed from, and what was considered a better system introduced?—Yes.

2765. The counsel's clerks were generally made agents, and that system of the clerks having the privilege of practising as agents continued till a comparatively late period?—Yes.

2766. You have the experience of America, you say, and you have the experience of this country in the matter?—Yes.

2767. Are there any other points on which you wish to make any observations?—In regard to the criminal jurisdiction, I think the Fiscal should be appointed by the Crown. Perhaps there is no more important functionary in Scotland than the Procurator-fiscal. The theory is, that he is the deputy of the Sheriff in making investigations; but that theory has long ceased to be consistent with the fact. The Fiscal is truly an independent officer, and is responsible for his proceedings to the Crown counsel in Edinburgh. Therefore I think he should be appointed by the Crown. I also think that he should not be allowed to practise.

2769. Mr. Shand.—You say he is directly responsible to the Crown officials. Is he not directly responsible to the Sheriff?—That is a supervision which is never exercised in Dundee; but theoretically, no doubt, he is responsible to the Sheriff.

2770. Mr. Webster.—And he is removeable by the Sheriff?—Yes.

2771. Mr. Shand.—And the Sheriff may call upon him at any time to undertake investigations, and may take any charge of these investigations he deems proper. In short, the Procurator-fiscal is responsible to the Sheriff?—Yes.

2772. Dr. Barclay.—The Lord Advocate may do the same?—Yes; but I say the working of the system is, that he is responsible to the Crown Office only, and therefore he should be appointed by the Crown.

2773. Would the object not be gained by the Sheriff appointing the Fiscal with the approbation of the Lord Advocate, and the Lord Advocate's consent being necessary to his removal also?—I think it would be better that he should be appointed directly by the Crown.

2774. You thereby make him very independent of the Sheriff?—So much the better, in my view.

2775. The Chairman.—Is not the Fiscal an important officer to assist the Sheriff in the performance of his duties?—Yes.

2776. Has not the Sheriff an important interest in having an efficient Fiscal?—No doubt he has.

2777. Are they not persons who ought to be on very confidential terms with each other?—I don't think they should. I hope the Sheriff and the Fiscal will always be on good terms with each other; but my view is, that the Fiscal should assume the sole responsibility for criminal investigations. For instance, I don't think it right that, first of all, I should assist at a precognition, as I am entitled to do, and then perhaps have to try the man afterwards. I think that the duties of the Sheriff and the duties of the Fiscal should be separated in that matter, making the Fiscal a Crown officer, and relieving the Sheriff of all responsibility.

2778. You think the Sheriff should be deprived of these executive powers?—Yes.

2779. And of the responsibility for the investigation of crime?—I think it would be better if these powers were entrusted to the Fiscal absolutely.

2780. That would be a radical change in the constitution of the office of Sheriff?—No doubt of it.

2781. He would then be a mere judicial officer?—Yes.

2782. And no longer an executive officer. That you think would be an improvement?—I think it would be an improvement. In point of fact, in Dundee the Fiscal is never interfered with.

2783. Mr. Shand.—Is the office of Procurator-fiscal throughout Scotland, as a rule, held by efficient men?—To the best of my belief, it is.

2784. Mr. Baxter.—If you deprive the Fiscal of his private business, would you get good men as Fiscals in such small places as Dunblane?—I think these are the very places where the Fiscal should have no private practice, because there is not a strong expression of opinion in these places. There is no daily press to exercise a supervision over the proceedings of the local officials; and these are the very places where, if a client is found tripping, the Fiscal—I don't say is, but may—become blind to the circumstance.

2785. How would you remunerate him in these small places?—I assume that the State would find money sufficient for the performance of the duties.

2786. Mr. Morton.—How would prisoners' declarations be taken if the Sheriff were relieved from any share in the investigation?—The Sheriff, in taking the declaration, acts as committing magistrate.

2787. And he would still take the declaration?—I assume he would still act as committing magistrate.

2788. Mr. Baxter.—Who dictates the declarations?—The declaration is generally dictated by myself, and I take care that no undue pressure is put upon the accused. The question is always put in the most general terms. He is invited to make any statement, and what he does say is taken down, but there is no application of the screw to him.

2789. Did you ever see any question put with a view of entrapping a prisoner?—Never in my experience.

2790. Have you seen questions pressed on him when he shows disinclination to speak?—Quite the contrary. When he shows such disinclination, I ask, 'Do you wish to make any statement on the subject?' and if he says No, the proceeding is brought to an end.

2791. The Chairman.—What do you do if he says No?—He is committed for further examination.

2792. But if a question is put, and he shows hesitation and unwillingness to answer, what do you do?—Perhaps it will be minuted that the prisoner has no further statement to make.

2793. But he may have further statements to make in reply to future questions. A question is put which he shows a disinclination to answer; what do you do?—Of course, if a question is put, we generally get an answer.

2794. But the case Mr. Baxter put was where he indicates a disinclination to answer?—In that case I don't put any more questions.

2795. If he hesitates, and shows a disinclination to answer, what do you do?—I never met with a case in which an answer of some kind was not given; but I am explaining that there is no undue pressure, and that he is generally asked whether he wishes to make any further statement.

2796. Would you not tell him, if he is indisposed to answer, that he need not answer unless he likes? Would you not renew that statement to him?—Yes; that is explained to him.

2797. When you see his disinclination, would you help him out in that way?—Yes.

2798. Then you put down that he declines to answer?—That would be minuted, of course.

2799. Mr. Baxter.—Would you extend the Sheriff's power of pronouncing sentence in criminal cases tried with a jury?—I think the bulk of the crime in towns like Dundee consists of simple cases of theft, committed by persons who are convicted thieves; and these cases are the simplest of all to try. They merely involve a police charge—theft of a pair of boots, or of a shirt from a washing-green; and the only thing that makes them aggravated is, that there are so many convictions standing against the accused party. I think the Sheriff's power to deal with that class of offenders should be enlarged, so that he could sentence them to penal servitude; and in that way there would be a great saving of judicial time, by the abolition of the Circuit Courts, because the other cases remaining for trial of a graver kind might be brought to Edinburgh.

2800. Robbery?—I think the technical distinction between theft and robbery ought to be abolished. Robbery is merely theft with violence; and it is very inconvenient at present that on a charge of theft you cannot receive previous convictions of robbery as an aggravation, and vice versa; therefore I think the Sheriff should be empowered to deal with cases of robbery.

2801. In criminal libels, would you be inclined to give power of amendment during the trial in regard to particulars which would not be deemed prejudicial to the prisoner?—I think, wherever the amendment does not substantially interfere with the matter of the charge, the judge should have powers to allow it in his discretion, just as in the Summary Procedure Act.

2802. Dr. Barclay.—Have you ever turned your attention to the right of the prisoner to ask his declaration to be read to the jury, if it has been libelled on?—I think the prisoner should have that right.

2803. In your practice in jury trials, which has been very great, have you formed an opinion of the propriety of dropping the verdict of not proven, and adopting the English form of guilty or not guilty?—I don't propose any change in the Scotch practice in that particular.

2804. Don't you think it gives opportunity to jurymen in a difficult case, to let the prisoner off with a verdict of not proven?—In that case, I think the prisoner should get off.

2805. But he gets off with a blemished character?—I think he ought to rest content.

2806. Mr. Baxter.—Have you any observation to make on the present law and practice with regard to bail?—I think the present law is in an unfortunate condition. It is very difficult for one to know what bail to take without communicating with the Fiscal. Therefore I think that in all applications for bail the first step should be intimation to the Fiscal, that he might be heard for the public interest in every case.

2807. Dr. Barclay.—That is, as to the amount of bail?—And also whether the bail should be taken or not.

2808. Mr. Adam.—Do you think it is a proper thing that the prisoner should in certain cases be entitled to get out on bail as a matter of right?—Just now the effect of it is, that you may fix the bail at such an amount that he cannot find it.

2809. Suppose the case of a breach of trust to a large amount: do you think the party should be entitled to the privilege of getting out on bail?—I think that ought to be under the control of the public authorities.

2810. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think it would be better to leave it to the discretion of the bailing judge in all cases?—I mean so, and let there be review if that is thought proper. Practically, no hardship would result from the discretion being left to the bailing magistrate.

2811. Mr. Adam.—Is there great evil practically under the present system?—Yes, by persons getting away who should not get away.

2812. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make?—The only other matter I would suggest is, that there should be some restriction on the right to sue certain classes of actions in the Supreme Court. When I was at the bar, I saw great injustice from persons bringing random actions of damages against their employers or others on the ground of negligence. I have been consulted about cases of that kind; and though frequently clearly of opinion that there was really no case against the defenders, I have over and over again advised them to pay £50 or £60 to get rid of the claim, because if they went to trial with a mere man of straw they would be worse off at the end of the day, even with the verdict in their favour, than by making a small payment at once. Therefore I think it is a matter for consideration whether the provisions of the 30 and 31 Vict. c. 142, on that subject, should not be adopted, and particularly the sections which provide that if a party suing in the Supreme Court should not recover more than £20 if the action is founded on contract, or £10 if founded on tort, unless the judge certify on record sufficient reason for bringing the case in the Supreme Court, he shall not be entitled to any costs of suit; and second, in all actions for malicious prosecution, false imprisonment, libel, and slander, the defender should be entitled to make oath that the pursuer has no visible means of paying costs, in which case he must either find security or satisfy the judge that he has a cause of action fit to be tried in the superior court, failing which it should be sent for trial to the Sheriff Court.

2813. Dr. Barclay.—Is that last matter in the English statute?—If a party bring a case of the kind I have indicated, and the other party swears that the pursuer has no means of paying costs, he is required to find security, or the judge sends it to be tried in the local court, unless he is satisfied that it is an action which should be tried in the Supreme Court.

2814. Would it not be better to have a report upon the probabilis causa?—I would rather take it out of the hands of the reporters on the probabilis causa. I think it should be disposed of by a judge at chambers.

2815. Have you had many cases of advocation for jury trial under the 40th section of the Judicature Act?—I am not aware that we have had any from Dundee.

2816. Do you think that should be kept up?—I think so. The party should be entitled to bring his case to the Supreme Court if it is of a certain value.

2817. Mr. Webster.—Would you keep it at £40, or would you raise it?—Perhaps it should be raised to £50.

2818. Dr. Barclay.—When an issue is prepared and goes to proof, would you still give a power to remove the case to the Court of Session?—I think so.

2819. Would it not be better to have a jury trial in your own court?—That might be regulated by the Court of Session; but I certainly think that, when an action is above a certain value, either party should be entitled to say, 'I insist on my case being tried in the Supreme Court.'

2821. The Chairman.—What was the remedy you proposed with reference to parties bringing actions against their masters? One part of it seemed to be applicable to the case of a party not being entitled to recover more than a small amount?—Yes; that is, if he recovers only £20 in an action ex contractu, or £10 in an action ex delicto, unless the judge certifies on record that the case was fit to be tried in the Supreme Court, he should not be entitled to any costs of suit.

2822. There is a similar provision, is there not, in reference to a certain class of cases in the recent Scotch Act?—Yes.

2823. The other branch of your suggestion was as to remitting to the Sheriff where the defender makes oath that the pursuer is not able to pay costs?—Yes. I intended that to meet the case of what is well enough understood in the profession as speculative actions of damages.

2825. Would it depend on the oath of the defender that the pursuer was not able to pay the expenses, or would you make it still a matter of discretion for the judge in the Supreme Court?—I assume that the matter would have to be disposed of on motion in some way.

2826. How would the judge determine whether it was a fit case to be tried in the Supreme Court? What kind of investigation would be necessary to enable him to do that?—I should think he would first look at the question involved; and second, at whether the party would suffer any harm from the case not being tried in the Sheriff Court, if he had no means of paying.

2828. If it were apparent to the judge that there was an injury sustained through the fault of the collaborateur, would it not be better to take the case out of court?—Of course the judge has no power to try the case with nothing before him but a summons and the affidavit of the defender. I have known many cases of that kind where £50 or £60 has been paid whenever the summons was called, as the shortest way of getting rid of it. That is an evil, and the only way that occurs to me of meeting it is that which I have suggested. But God forbid that unnecessary obstacles should be placed in the avenues leading to courts of justice.

2829. The feeling among labourers at present is that the law leans rather hard against them. You are for making it a little harder?—They would practically have no cause to complain.

2830. Suppose the defender should swear that the pursuer is not able to pay the expense of a Sheriff Court proceeding?—I don't propose to interfere with him in that case.

2831. Have you any suggestion to make as to the Commissary Court?—Would you amalgamate it with the Sheriff Court?—Practically the distinction in Dundee is only in name. There is the same judge and the same clerk.

2832. He happens to be the same clerk?—Yes. I don't think there is any ground for any distinction.

2833. Is there a convenience in having the same clerk?—Most certainly there is.

2834. Are there Burgh Courts in Dundee?—So far as I am aware, the magistrates in Dundee don't exercise any civil jurisdiction.

2835. Dr. Barclay.—Are you aware that they did so at one time?—Yes.

2836. The Chairman.—Do the magistrates in Forfar exercise any civil jurisdiction?—Not that I am aware of. I think the only local courts are the Justice of Peace and the Sheriff Courts.

2837. Is there a Dean of Guild Court in Dundee?—Yes; but there is a controversy going on just now about his powers. I don't know how that matter stands.

2838. Do you think there is any practical advantage in keeping up the Dean of Guild?—I think all the powers exercised by the Dean of Guild might just as well be transferred to the Sheriff.

2839. There are not many cases before the Dean of Guild Court in Dundee?—I am not aware. At all events, the Dean of Guild has interfered with very little effect in Dundee, if one may judge from the structure of the streets.

2840. Are there any Barony or Regality Courts in Forfarshire?—Kirriemuir is a burgh of barony, I think. I think it holds under Lord Airlie.

2842. Is there any civil jurisdiction exercised by the magistrates of Montrose, Arbroath, or Brechin?—Not that I am aware of. I think there was a case in the Supreme Court lately from Brechin. I rather think that in Brechin they have always exercised civil jurisdiction. It is an ancient cathedral city.

2845. Dr. Barclay.—Then the assessor is a judge?—In effect he is.

2846. Mr. Murray.—Who appoints him?—I am not aware.

2847. Mr. Webster.—Is that a jurisdiction which you would continue over the country?—I think they might as well go to the Sheriff Small Debt Court.

2848. Mr. Baxter.—The assessor is the judge?—The Justices have very little to do with it.

2849. The Chairman.—Do they exercise any criminal jurisdiction?—No, I think not; but I never sat as a Justice of Peace, except under the Revenue statutes.

2850. There is jurisdiction exercised by Justices in revenue matters?—Yes.

2851. Mr. Harrison.—Do you know how the comparative expense stands as between the Justice of Peace Court and the Small Debt Sheriff Court?—I don't know the particulars, but there can only be a shilling or two of difference. The Justice of Peace Court is cheaper, if anything, to the pursuer. J. Guthrie Smith.

2852. Mr. Murray.—The judge is both judge and clerk?—Yes.

A. B. SHAND, Esq.
CHARLES MORTON, Esq.
JAMES WEBSTER, Esq.
J. B. BAXTER, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

PETER MORISON, Esq., examined. Peter Morison.

2853. The Chairman.—You are secretary to the Scottish Trade Protection Society?—Yes.

2855. What are your duties as secretary?—I attend to the department for the recovery of debt. That is my principal work.

2856. What do you mean by attending to the department?—There is a large number of claims sent to us for collection every year. For example, in 1867, there were 5850 claims lodged for collection, the amount of which was £36,784, 19s. 3d. My work chiefly is to attend to the collection of these claims.

2857. In doing so, do you employ any practitioner to conduct the cases?—Cases that are in the country we send to solicitors throughout the country; cases above £12 in town we send to a solicitor in town; those below £12 we cannot get a solicitor to take up, and we are obliged to take them ourselves.

2858. How do you take them yourselves?—We take them in the Small Debt Court.

2859. Who conducts them in the Small Debt Court?—I do.

2860. Dr. Barclay.—In the country too?—No.

2861. The Chairman.—You appear in court, make the claim, and act as the pursuer of the action?—Yes.

2862. Have you any special authority from the party to do so?—I have a mandate invariably.

2863. Are these prosecutions conducted at the expense of the parties, or at the expense of the Society?—At the expense of the parties, so far as the outlay is concerned; the cost of the summons, the officer's fees, and the cost of the execution.

2864. And as regards the charges of professional men employed?—They get their fees.

2865. From whom?—From the members.

2866. From the society?—No, from the individual members.

2867. Do you mean the individual who is claiming?—Yes.

2868. Then the individuals pay that the same as the outlay?—That is between the agent and the member. The claim passes entirely out of our hands when it is sent to an agent.

2870. The Chairman.—It is part of your duty as secretary to appear, and you are remunerated by the society?—Yes, by a salary.

2871. You have stated the number of claims, and the amount of the sums involved in them; can you distinguish those above and under £12?—We make up the numbers every year, and I have here the numbers for 1866 and 1867. In 1867 the claims not exceeding £1 were 980; above £1 and not exceeding £2, 1028; above £2, and not exceeding £5, 1711; above £5, and not exceeding £8, 6s. 8d., 808; above £8, 6s. 8d. and not exceeding £12, 471; above £12 and not exceeding £25, 563; above £25, 289.

2872. Dr. Barclay.—You make no division beyond £25?—No.

2873. Mr. Clark.—What was the largest sum involved in one claim above £25?—I had one last year of £600. That is the largest I recollect. It was for machinery, and the debtor resided in England.

2874. Dr. Barclay.—Do you take in any claim?—Any claim from a member.

2875. The Chairman.—In such a claim as that for £600 against a debtor in England, what did you do?—We sent it to a solicitor in London.

2876. Of your own selection?—Yes.

2877. Did you intimate to the party that you had done so?—They knew our solicitors, and granted a mandate in their favour. We print a list of our solicitors.

2878. After that you had no more to do with the matter?—He collected the money, and remitted it to us.

2879. Did the solicitor communicate with you or with the party?—With me.

2880. Mr. Baxter.—Do you take in claims from all Scotland?—We take in claims from no one except he be a member of the society, but we have members in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

2881. Dr. Barclay.—And you recover claims in any part of the three kingdoms?—If the claimant be a member of the society.

2882. Mr. Shand.—Of what class are the members composed?—Merchants.

2883. Shopkeepers?—And shopkeepers.

2884. How many members have you?—About 1300.

2885. Mr. Harrison.—Does that include any bankers?—Yes; all the banks in town, I believe, are members.

2886. Dr. Barclay.—Any one may become a member, I suppose; you have no qualification?—No, except that he must be passed by the directors.

2887. Mr. Harrison.—And must be recommended by members?—Yes; he must be proposed and seconded, and passed by the directors.

2888. Dr. Barclay.—What is the annual fee and the entry-money?—There is no entry-money. The annual fee is one guinea.

Peter Morison.

2889. Failing to pay that, a party will be struck off the roll of membership?—Yes.

2890. Mr. Webster.—Can you state how many of the actions you have mentioned were defended, and how many undefended?—The whole of these were not prosecuted. The number prosecuted in 1867 was 1679.

2891. Mr. Clark.—What do you mean by prosecuted?—Actions raised.

2892. Dr. Barclay.—You send a circular first?—Yes.

2893. And that frequently brings payment?—By circular, without anything else, we recovered £8699, 13s. 8d., of the £36,000 odds.

2894. Mr. Clark.—By prosecuted do you mean the number of decrees obtained, or the number of summonses issued?—Summonses issued.

2895. How many decrees were obtained?—I cannot tell that. We generally obtain decrees in all the cases.

2896. Mr. Webster.—Are they generally defended or undefended?—Generally undefended; most of them undefended.

2897. Dr. Barclay.—Do you go to the Justice of Peace Court with the sums below £5?—I do; with some of them.

2898. Do you make it a rule that all below £5 you go to the Justice of Peace Court with?—Yes.

2899. Would you state your opinion of the comparative merits of the Sheriff's and the Justices' jurisdiction in cases below £5?—I would prefer the Sheriff Court if I suspected that the case was to be defended; but as most of our cases are undefended, and the means of recovery provided through the Justice of Peace Court are more summary, we recover the debt much more effectually by going there.

2900. How are you aware whether it is to be defended or not?—We generally know from the case. When we write to the debtor, he makes an excuse, or says he has a defence.

2901. Have you had many defended cases in the Justice of Peace Court?—Probably one or two in each weekly court out of 10 or 11 cases.

2902. In those cases which are defended, are you pleased with the adjudication of them?—I am generally pleased with the decision.

2903. Is the decision generally given by the assessor or by the Justices?—It is nominally of course given by the Justices, but the assessor does the principal part of the work.

2904. The Chairman.—Are the decisions generally in your favour?—Generally.

2905. And you are pleased with them?—Yes.

2906. Dr. Barclay.—You say the mode of execution is more summary; is the charge shorter?—No; the charge is the same.

2908. It is somewhat like the English distress?—Yes. There is a great number of what may be called fraudulent debtors, who have the means to pay, but who will not pay, and resort to all sorts of subterfuges to avoid paying. They are taken unawares by the Justice of Peace officer carrying off at once. But my opinion is that this summary power ought to be abolished. It is frequently used most oppressively. I know that it is abused, and I think it should be taken away. But I would not have it taken away unless some remedy was provided to meet the case of the class of debtors to whom I allude,—a remedy something like what exists in the English County Courts. If a judgment be granted against a debtor in England, and he does not pay, a judgment summons is issued requiring the debtor to appear before the judge; he is then examined as to the circumstances under which the debt was contracted, and his means of payment. The judge, if satisfied that he has the means of paying, but from some cause or other does not pay, makes a peremptory order on him to pay by instalments, or commits him to prison if he is satisfied that he has behaved in a fraudulent manner. I think we ought to have something like that in Scotland; if we had, I think the Justice of Peace method ought to be abolished.

2909. Are you aware that that system has been very much complained of in England, as being tyrannically used?—I would say that is the fault of the judge; as a general rule, I should say the judge ought to see what is right.

2910. You mentioned that the Justices allow you to appear, and the Sheriff does not?—I believe that the order of the Sheriff was practically found not to work.

2911. Is the Justice of Peace Act not more stringent in that respect than the Sheriff Court Act, the former being that a party may appear by himself, his wife, or one of his family, or by a clerk, while the latter says by a procurator or by any one the Sheriff may authorize to appear?—Yes.

2912. Mr. Campbell.—The terms of the order issued by Sheriff Davidson are, that a person might appear himself, or by any member of his family, or by any person employed by him ordinarily in the course of his usual business, but that no law-agent or person practising as a law agent should appear, unless he were a procurator of the court. Is not that so?—Yes.

2913. And gradually the older practice has begun to prevail again, and there is no obstruction placed in the way of competent and respectable persons appearing, though they be not procurators of court?—I believe that is the practice of one of the Sheriff-substitutes, but I am told that one of them is inclined rigidly to adhere to the order.

2914. The Chairman.—You have stated your reasons for going to the Justice of Peace Court in preference?—Yes.

2915. Mr. Harrison.—You stated that the decision in the Justice of Peace Court is to a great extent influenced by the clerk of court; do you think there is any beneficial influence exercised by the presence of the Justices?—Oh yes.

2916. Of what nature?—The Justices are generally gentlemen of position and humanity; and certainly they have much reason for the exercise of their humanity in that court, because many of the cases that come before them are most distressing, from the wretched squalor of the poor people who are prosecuted; and the Justices very often mitigate the rigour of the law to a very great extent.

2917. Dr. Barclay.—Have you ever seen any diversity of opinion between the bench and the assessor?—I have.

2919. Mr. Shand.—Would you not characterize that as a harsh proceeding?—I do.

2920. But yet you resort to it?—I am forced into it.

2921. Dr. Barclay.—But for that, you would prefer the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

2922. Mr. Shand.—You are forced into it by the necessity of having a procurator in the court?—That does not now exist.

2923. The Chairman.—In the case of fraudulent debtors, they can more easily put away their goods before you get at them?—Yes.

2924. That is the objection you have to going before the Sheriff?—Yes.

2925. If there was any mode devised by which that could be prevented, and that mode substituted for this very summary seizing of the goods, you would prefer it?—Yes. There is another respect in which that summary mode is used, and it is this: The Justice of Peace officer goes to these poor people; they have nothing to satisfy the debt, but he says, 'Give me 5s. or 10s. to cover expenses, and I will give you delay.' And he goes back perhaps in a week and repeats the thing, and the money he gets is not attributed to the debt, but goes into the officer's pocket.

2926. The Justices have a power of directing the debt to be paid by instalments, or interposing to produce an arrangement to that effect?—Yes.

2927. That is a matter of discretion very much with them?—Yes.

2928. You think that the bench of Justices is beneficial as regards the exercise of that discretion?—I do.

2929. And other humane views?—Yes; but the Sheriff has the same power.

2930. Mr. Clark.—I suppose the practice of the officer giving delay for 5s. or 10s. is a clandestine practice?—It is.

2931. Does it prevail to any extent?—It does not so much prevail here as in Glasgow, I understand; and it does not now prevail so largely as it did about six years ago. It prevailed to a great extent then; but I understand that the clerk of the Justice of Peace Court is doing as much as he can to put it down. Still it cannot be wholly put down, from the nature of the case.

2932. The Chairman.—Does it consist with your knowledge whether in the recovery of debts in other towns, such as Glasgow, Dundee, and Aberdeen, your cases are brought before the Justices or before the Sheriff?—Generally before the Sheriff.

2933. Mr. Campbell.—Does the existence of the lock-hole execution add materially to the hardship of the summary mode of levy you have spoken of?—Very much.

2934. A respectable working man against whom there is a lock-hole execution, being absent from home in the ordinary hours of business, may never know that any proceeding has been taken against him till his goods are seized for the debt?—I knew a gentleman to whom that happened. He was in a respectable position, but his wife drank, and she contracted a debt. The first notice he got of it was when he came home from his work one day, he found his effects had been sold.

2935. Dr. Barclay.—If it had been in the Sheriff Court, above £8, 6s. 8d., his first notice of it might have been putting him in prison?—Yes.

2936. Is it not the case that in the Justice of Peace Court, if a defender appears, he has to table 6d. before he opens his mouth?—Yes.

2937. And for every witness 4d.?—Yes.

2938. And oath of party 1s.?—Yes.

2939. Do you think these are good regulations?—I think they are very bad.

2940. That is not so in the Sheriff Court?—No; and the greatest number of appearances are to crave time; but before the debtor can say, 'I am very poor—I am not able to pay the debt,' he must lay down 6d.

2941. Mr. Gordon.—Who gets the 6d.?—The clerk.

2942. Dr. Barclay.—Is it not another hardship in the Justice of Peace Court, that if a defender has not appeared, and a lock-hole citation has been left for him, he must consign the whole debt before he can be reponed?—Yes, and expenses.

2943. And when he comes he pleads poverty?—Yes.

2944. In the Sheriff Court he has only to pay a small sum?—Yes. He consigns the expenses, and 10s. to meet expenses.

2945. Do you consider it a hardship that he should have to consign the whole debt?—I do.

2946. Mr. Webster.—You have said that you invariably send a circular claiming payment of a debt before raising a summons?—Yes; we send two circulars.

2947. In these do you demand any sum for costs of the application?—No.

2948. The Chairman.—Do you give a time for payment?—Four days in the first circular, and four days in the second.

2949. Mr. Baxter.—Do you ever send circulars after you get a decree in the Justice of Peace Court?—Yes, we invariably do that.

2950. The Chairman.—Before proceeding to execution?—Yes.

2952. The Chairman.—Is that affected by the amount?—No.

2953. Dr. Barclay.—What is the expense of a sale under a Sheriff's warrant?—9s. 6d.; but the other is often above £1. There is a charge for storage, porterage, and other extras.

2954. Mr. Baxter.—In the Sheriff Court do you give a charge on the decree?—That depends on the warrant. If the warrant says there is to be a charge, we do so. We must follow the warrant.

2955. Dr. Barclay.—It depends on whether the person has been personally present?—Yes; I think a charge ought to be given in all cases.

2956. Mr. Baxter.—If he is not present, you give a charge?—Yes.

2957. Mr. Shand.—But you think that even where the party is present a charge ought not to be given?—Yes. It is often necessary for cutting down a preference. I have known a small debt decree for the same sum, and the one creditor could cut down the preference of the other, who could not retaliate, because a charge was necessary on the one decree and not on the other. In fact, in the former the debtor sent an agent to defend the action, while in the latter he appeared and admitted the debt.

2958. Dr. Barclay.—Are you aware that in some courts it is considered that if a person is present a charge is not required; but if he appears by proxy a charge is necessary, because the proxy may have simulated authority that he had not?—In the principal counties in Scotland the practice is, that unless the defender appears personally, a charge is necessary.

2959. Do you think that the proper mode?—I think that is the carrying out of the Act; but I know that in some of the smaller counties they act on a different principle.

2960. Mr. Campbell.—In regard to the original expense of taking out the claim and serving it, are the charges in the two courts identical?—They are not. In the Justice of Peace Court there is about 1s. less to begin with, but it increases very much before the conclusion by the additional expenses.

2961. Dr. Barclay.—In the Sheriff Court the fees are all at the beginning and the end?—Yes.

2962. The Chairman.—There has been an Act passed lately for the recovery of certain debts. Have you availed yourself much of that Act?—Yes, very much. We find it very useful.

2963. You have now had a year's experience of it?—Yes.

2964. Can you tell us how many actions you have had under that Act?—No.

2965. Mr. Harrison.—Can you supply us with the information?—Next month I will make up the return for 1868, and I shall then have the numbers for the whole year.

2966. Dr. Barclay.—You did not make up a return for the three months in which the Act was in operation in 1867?—No.

2967. Mr. Campbell.—Will you hand in that return to the Commission?—I will hand it in when it is ready.

2968. Dr. Barclay.—Can you give us also the three months of 1867?—I believe I can.

2969. Mr. Shand.—By whom are these cases conducted?—If they are in the country, they are conducted by solicitors in the country; if in town, they are conducted by our solicitors in town.

2970. Dr. Barclay.—Do they hold a mandate from the individual creditors?—They do.

2971. When you appear in these cases, is the mandate in your favour or in favour of the society?—It is in my favour.

2972. Nominatim?—Yes.

2973. Mr. Baxter.—Do you appoint the solicitors in the country?—We do.

2974. The Chairman.—In making the return which you are to make, can you distinguish between defended and undefended causes?—No, not without a great amount of correspondence.

2975. Can you give the average amount of the claims, and the greatest and smallest claims?—We can.

2976. Can you give the average amount, and the greatest and smallest amount of the sums decerned for?—No.

2977. Can you tell how many cases have been decided in favour of the defenders?—Yes; but I am not aware of one. I think there have been none.

2978. Have there been many defended cases?—Of course, if they came through our Edinburgh solicitors, I would not know about them. I would know the country ones, but I would not know these.

2979. When you say there were no cases decided in favour of the defender that you recollect, does that answer apply to country cases as well as Edinburgh cases?—It does not apply to Edinburgh at all; it only applies to country cases.

2980. You can distinguish the number of Edinburgh cases from the number of cases in the country?—Yes.

2981. Mr. Harrison.—Have you any recollection as to the proportion of undefended cases under the Debts Recovery Act?—I cannot tell the defended from the undefended.

2982. The Chairman.—Your Edinburgh solicitor can tell us as regards Edinburgh?—I can get it as regards Edinburgh quite easily.

2983. You correspond with one solicitor in Glasgow?—Yes.

2984. One solicitor in Dundee?—Yes.

2985. And one in Aberdeen?—Yes.

2986. And one in Perth?—Yes.

2987. If you were to take four or five of the principal towns, you might be able to obtain that information for us?—I shall do so.

2988. Have any defects in the Debts Recovery Act presented themselves to your mind?—I think it is too limited in its scope.

2989. Do you mean that it ought to embrace a greater variety of classes of cases?—I do; and there are some technical defects in it.

2990. What are the classes of cases which you think it material that it should embrace, which are not embraced in it now?—For example, a bill. If the six months allowed for summary diligence have expired, it is not competent to sue under the Debts Recovery Act for the amount of the bill. I believe it has been so decided. Then there are actions of freight and carriage, which I believe are not competent, although I have not so much experience in that class of actions. But they ought to be embraced under the debts recovery form.

2991. Mr. Baxter.—Would you make exceptions of any class of cases?—No, if the Sheriff had power to remit them to the ordinary roll, as he now has.

2992. The Chairman.—You would include all cases that resolve themselves into claims of debt from any cause?—Yes. In fact, I would say, let all actions of debt be first brought in the manner provided in the Small Debt Court; if they are undefended, let the mode of execution provided by the Small Debt Court be applied, because there is no difference between recovering a debt whether the amount is £5, £20, or £100, if it is not disputed. If the debt be disputed, then let the judge inquire and see if it is capable of being disposed of in the summary manner provided either by the Small Debt Act or the Debts Recovery Act; and if he is satisfied that it is not so, let him remit it to the ordinary roll.

2993. Dr. Barclay.—Then you would not even limit the amount in that respect?—I would not, unless there was appearance entered to defend the action, and then I would remit it to the ordinary roll.

2994. Originally you would make no distinction of class of cases?—No; but there would require to be one provision made as to that—viz., when a poinding is ordered, the summary mode of carrying through a sale under a small debt poinding is perhaps not just if the amount of the inventory be large. In this case I would say there would require to be more publication, so as to ensure competition at a sale; but with that proviso I would say, let all actions of debt commence in the manner of small debt actions. If they are undefended, let them pass into the Small Debt Court; and if they are defended, remit them to the ordinary roll where the sum exceeds £50.

2995. The Chairman.—No matter what the amount of the claims?—No.

2996. Dr. Barclay.—Or the kind of debt?—Or the kind of debt.

2997. Is it not a defect in that Act, that there is no power to use inhibition, but merely arrestment?—It is.

2998. Would you give that power?—Certainly.

2999. Mr. Clark.—Do you mean by debt any claim which resolved itself into money?—Not exactly.

3000. Or are you using debt in the strict sense of the word?—I am.

3001. Dr. Barclay.—Would you exclude damages?—I would, in talking of the actions of debt; but I would not exclude the raising of actions of damages.

3002. Mr. Clark.—Then, whenever there is a money claim, of whatever amount, and from whatever consideration arising, you would begin with a summons in the form of a small debt summons?—Yes.

3003. Do you think that would be a convenient course?—I do.

3004. Whatever the character of the claim, if it was a money claim?—Yes.

3005. A claim for aliment?—Yes.

3006. In short, every money claim?—Yes.

3007. Dr. Barclay.—Arising from any cause?—Yes.

3008. Damages and solatium?—Yes; but the mode of citation would require to be amended. It would not do to have lock-hole citations.

3009. Have you any suggestion to make as to what could be put in the place of lock-hole citations?—In England it is required that the claims be served personally or by notice. A person goes to the house of the defendant; and if he is not to be found, he gives notice that he will call on a certain day, at a certain hour, in order to serve the summons.

3010. Suppose there is nobody in, to whom does he give the notice?—Well, there could be no action.

3011. Mr. Baxter.—In the case of the lock-hole citation, there is nobody in?—I would say there should no decree pass against the person.

3012. The Chairman.—You would abolish lock-hole citations?—Yes.

3013. How would you proceed in order to entitle yourself to obtain a decree against a party who kept out of the way and locked up his house?—There is a hardship in all cases, but of two evils I would choose the least; and I think there would be less hardship in preventing a person from getting a decree than in retaining these citations.

3014. Mr. Gordon.—Could it not be effected in this way, that the pursuer, not being able to make personal service, should apply to the court for leave to serve the summons in such a way as the court might appoint?—Yes.

3015. By a substituted service, which could be made according to the circumstances of each case?—That would get over the difficulty, and I think the judge might be entrusted with that power.

3016. Dr. Barclay.—Would not advertisement in a local paper be a very good mode?—That might be invidious.

3017. The Chairman.—You think it would be safe to leave it in the discretion of the judge in each case?—I do.

3018. Advertisement in a local paper might be a good mode in some cases; it might not be proper or it might not produce any result in other cases?—It might not.

3019. I might not come to the knowledge of the party?—And it might unnecessarily expose him.

3020. Mr. Clark.—Your view is to commence all money actions in the form given in the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes, or the Small Debt Act.

3021. With a power to the Sheriff to remit all cases to the ordinary roll. At what stage of the case is the Sheriff to exercise that power?—At the calling.

3022. Is there to be any record made up, if he remits to the ordinary roll?—When he remits the cause to the ordinary roll, it is proceeded with in the same manner as ordinary court causes are proceeded with.

3023. If he remits under the Debts Recovery Act a case to the ordinary roll, you don't make up a record in the manner prescribed by that Act?—No.

3024. But you make up a record in the manner prescribed by the Sheriff Court Act?—It depends very much on the stage at which the Sheriff remits.

3025. Dr. Barclay.—Have you ever had in your experience a remit under the Debts Recovery Act to the ordinary roll?—I do not know.

3026. Would it be incumbent on the Sheriff in that case to make up a record by condescendence and answers?—If the parties ask it, he would be bound to do so.

3027. If it is by the short defence, the mode of making up the record under the Debts Recovery Act is preferable to that under the Act of 1853?—I would prefer it.

3028. Mr. Clark.—You would like the Sheriff to make up the record for you?—Yes.

3029. You think it would be convenient that in all money claims the Sheriff should make up the record between the parties?—Yes.

3030. Mr. Gordon.—But there might be cases so complicated as to require to be prepared in the ordinary way?—Yes.

3031. And therefore this provision is a sort of safety-valve to admit of these cases being sent to the ordinary roll?—Yes.

3032. It also allows a plea in compensation to be stated, which could not be done probably under the limited scope of the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes. I understand that the first duty of the Sheriff just now in debts recovery cases, is to inquire whether the action is one that should be treated in the summary way provided by the Debts Recovery Act. If it be clear to him that it is so, he disposes of it in that manner; if it is not clear to him, he is bound to remit it to the ordinary roll.

3033. Mr. Baxter.—You think that all actions should be brought in the form of a summons under the Small Debt Act?—Yes.

3034. Suppose appearance is made, and that the claim is between £12 and £50, do you think that the case should be proceeded with under the Debts Recovery Act?—No, under the form provided by the Small Debt Act.

3035. Would you supersede the Debts Recovery Act altogether?—No.

3036. What cases would you proceed with under it?—The mode of trying a cause under the Debts Recovery Act is virtually the same as under the Small Debt Act, except that there is a written record where the parties require it.

3037. Then you would proceed under that Act in cases between £12 and £50?—Yes.

3038. Mr. Clark.—To any amount?—Yes.

3039. Mr. Baxter.—Cases above £50 would go to the ordinary roll?—No.

3040. Mr. Clark.—Unless the Sheriff thought proper to remit them to the ordinary roll?—Yes, unless the parties consented.

3041. Would you leave it exclusively to the Sheriff to determine whether the case, however large the sum was, should or should not go to the ordinary roll?—Yes.

3042. So that the pursuer might select that court for a claim of any amount, contrary to the wish of the defender, if the Sheriff thought proper to transfer it?—Yes.

3043. Does that not seem to you to give rather too much power to the Sheriff?—I don't think so. I think we might trust the Sheriff with that power.

3044. Would there be no hardship in being bound to submit in such a matter to the decision of the Sheriff?—The party has an appeal against the decision of the Sheriff, under the Debts Recovery Act.

3045. Would you allow him to remove the case to the Court of Session if he thought proper, or must he submit in the first instance to the judgment of the Sheriff?—I would say he should submit to the judgment of the Sheriff.

3046. So that you give the pursuer the right of carrying on his case before the Sheriff Court, however great the amount involved, and you force the defender to submit to that selection of a court by the pursuer?—The pursuer has that power already. He can do it in the ordinary Sheriff Court.

3047. Are you aware that a defender can remove the case from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session at his own option, whenever an order for proof is made?—Yes; but it is never done in practice.

3048. Are you not aware of such a thing as an advocation with a view to jury trial?—I never knew of it.

3050. Then I understand it is only in cases under £12 that the summary mode of hearing parties and taking proof, and disposing of the case without record, should be followed?—I would say let that be done up to £50.

3051. Mr. Clark.—Suppose an action for a very large sum is brought in the Sheriff Court, you think the Sheriff should have power to dispose of it in the manner provided by the Debts Recovery Act?—If both parties are agreeable.

3052. That was not what you said before?—Well, that is really what I mean. I would allow the pursuer to bring his action in the small debt form: if it is undefended, he would get decree at once; if it is defended, and if the amount exceeds £50, I would allow the parties the option of taking the Sheriff's decision, and let it be final if they stated at the beginning that they agreed to that.

3053. Mr. Baxter.—Under the Small Debt Act?—Yes; but if it is beyond £50, I would certainly say the Sheriff must remit it to the ordinary roll.

3054. Mr. Clark.—That the Sheriff must do so?—Yes, unless the parties expressly said that they did not want that done.

3055. He must remit it to the ordinary roll on the motion of the defender?—On the motion of either party.

3056. You would exclude the defender from removing the case to the Court of Session?—No.

3057. Suppose the defender desired to have the proof taken and judgment pronounced by the Court of Session, would you give him the right of removing the case from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session for that purpose?—I would allow that only with the leave of the Sheriff; I mean above £50.

3058. Above £50 the Sheriff should have the power to give leave to have the case removed to the Court of Session?—Yes.

3059. But without leave, would you permit it?—No.

3060. Whatever the amount of the claim, unless the Sheriff gives that leave, the record must be made up, the evidence taken, and the case in the first instance disposed of by the Sheriff?—Yes.

Peter Morison.

3061. Dr. Barclay.—That would involve a repeal of the present law, which gives a right to either party to remove a case above £40 for jury trial to the Court of Session?—I don't think parties are very much pleased with jury trials.

3062. Mr. Clark.—But I suppose you are aware that, although a case may be removed for jury trial, it does not follow that it will be disposed of in that way?—I am.

3063. Mr. Campbell.—Do you know whether there are many appeals from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff under the Debts Recovery Act?—I am not aware.

3064. Dr. Barclay.—On the first calling of a case under the Debts Recovery Act, when the parties are agreed on the facts, and the question is a pure question of law, do you think the Sheriff can adjourn the case to a future day?—Yes.

3065. Is it not only where a proof is allowed?—No.

3066. Why should it be continued to another day, if it is a pure question of law?—It gives the parties more time to consider the case.

3067. Is the claim in a schedule annexed?—Yes, an account.

3068. Is there anything in the Act which implies that it must be on the same paper?—No.

3069. Don't you think that a defect?—No.

3070. Is it not possible that it may be withdrawn, and another one substituted?—That may be prevented by putting markings on it.

3071. Mr. Gordon.—Does the Sheriff-clerk not mark productions?—He should do so.

3072. Mr. Webster.—Are the accounts not sometimes very long, extending to a great many pages?—Yes.

3073. Dr. Barclay.—Have you had any experience of counter claims being set up?—I think counter claims ought to be competently set up under the Debts Recovery form, whatever their nature may be.

3074. In the Small Debt Act they require service the day before?—Yes.

3075. In the Debts Recovery Act they require no service?—No.

3076. Is that not a defect?—Yes, I think there should be service, but the defender should be allowed to plead any sort of compensation as a bar to the action.

3077. Without notice?—No, with notice. At present, unless the counter claim is of the same nature, he cannot plead it.

3078. He cannot compensate by a bill?—No.

3079. Is that not a great defect?—It is.

3080. Mr. Clark.—If a person raises an action for a debt, do you think he should be entitled to state a counter claim in respect of damages?—Yes.

3081. Then if a party raises an action for a debt of £50, the defender may say, 'It is not due, because you assaulted me, and you are owing me £50 of damages?'—But the judge might say he was not bound to wait till the defender established his counter claim of damages. That is an illiquid claim.

3082. Suppose neither are liquid,—suppose a man brings an action on a claim for £50, and the defender says, 1*st*, It is not due; and 2*d*, If it is due, you owe me £50; the Sheriff has to inquire whether the debt is due, and then into the counter claim?—Yes, but notice should be given to the pursuer that the counter claim is to be pleaded.

3083. In short, the counter claim may be just whatever the defender could include in a separate summons, and the two cases are to be tried?—Yes.

3084. Do you think that would be convenient?—I do.

3085. And that the public would like it?—Yes.

3086. Mr. Shand.—I suppose you don't intend to interfere with the judgment of the Sheriff as to what classes of claims might competently be compensated by other claims?—No; that is a point of law.

3087. Mr. Clark.—How is it a point of law? If you admit a defender by statute to state a counter claim, upon whatever ground, he has a right to state it, and the Sheriff must inquire into it?—I don't contemplate a new statute in order to admit counter claims; I would rather contemplate the abolition of the clause which prevents counter claims being stated.

3088. The Chairman.—But that is a new statute?—It is not a positive enactment to admit counter claims. It is rather the withdrawal of a prohibition.

3089. Mr. Clark.—Then all you mean is this: that under the Debts Recovery Act the defender should be allowed to state such pleas of compensation as may be competently stated at present?—That is all.

3090. Mr. Webster.—How would you ascertain whether the counter claim had been rejected as unfounded, or had been rejected as incompetent?—The interlocutor rejecting it would specify that.

3091. The Chairman.—Would you allow an appeal against the rejection of a counter claim?—No.

3092. Neither upon law nor fact?—No. The party could easily bring a new action. He need not plead his counter claim unless he chose.

3094. If it was rejected upon the facts?—If it was rejected upon the merits, it would be final.

3095. Mr. Clark.—Is it so, that under the Debts Recovery Act a plea of compensation cannot be stated?—Yes, it is restricted; you could not plead a bill or a bond against an account.

3096. The Chairman.—Have you any other objection to the Debts Recovery Act?—In regard to sequestrations for rent under that Act, I believe if the effects have been removed from the premises, it is not competent to sequestrate in the summary manner provided by the Debts Recovery Act.

3097. Mr. Baxter.—That is in the Small Debt Act?—Yes, and also in the Debts Recovery Act. The schedules are both the same.

3098. They both apply to goods upon the premises?—Yes. Now, because a tenant has fraudulently removed his effects, I don't think that is any reason why the pursuer should be obliged to go into the ordinary court. I think that is one of the cases that should come under the Debts Recovery Act, and the Small Debt Act, within their respective jurisdictions.

3099. Dr. Barclay.—Is that power to bring back the articles to be sequestrated on the premises, or to sequestrate them elsewhere?—To sequestrate them where they are found—to make an inventory of them. The officer merely makes an inventory of the articles found.

3100. The Chairman.—Would that be upon an allegation of fraudulent removal, or how would it come out?—It would come out upon an allegation of rent due.

3101. But suppose the goods had been removed by a transaction?—It would give the parties the same power as they have in the ordinary court.

3102. Then you don't limit it to fraudulent removals?—I would not limit it. It should be wherever the goods had been removed, from whatever cause.

3103. Dr. Barclay.—Then would you not give intimation to the person into whose custody the goods have come by sale, or to a new landlord?—The officer must leave a schedule with the person in whose custody the goods are.

3104. Mr. Webster.—Would you give notice to the proprietor of the house to which the goods had been removed?—He does not get notice at present. You might give him notice; but he would have the same remedies that he now has.

3105. Mr. Gordon.—What you want is an extension of the law of hypothec, to make it apply to goods which have been removed from the premises?—I don't wish an extension of the law of hypothec. I only wish an extension of summary process of making hypothecs effectual, so long as hypothec exists; but I would be very glad to see the right of hypothec abolished.

3106. Mr. Campbell.—You cannot sequestrate currente termino for rents between £12 and £50 in the Debts Recovery Court?—No.

3108. Dr. Barclay.—You would extend the Act to all claims falling under your general category?—Yes.

3109. Mr. Clark.—Your view is, that all cases, whatever the amount, if they are money claims, should begin in the Debts Recovery Act form?—Yes.

3110. And that the exceptions shall be those which the Sheriff thinks, after commencing in that way, ought to be sent to the ordinary roll?—Yes; and below £50 the Sheriff's decision should be final.

3111. The Chairman.—If above £50, you would give the party a right to have it sent to the ordinary roll; but if both parties agreed to retain it under the Debts Recovery Act, you would allow it to be retained?—Yes; but they would require to express their intention.

3112. Mr. Clark.—Do you think the Sheriff would be a good judge of the question whether the case should remain in the Sheriff Court or should be removed to the Court of Session?—I do.

3113. Of whether he should retain the cause or lose it?—The Sheriff has no interest in retaining the cause.

3114. Do you think he can fully appreciate the motives which might actuate either party in having the case removed?—Let them be stated to him, and I think he could appreciate them.

3115. Some Sheriffs might have a desire to retain all causes?—I don't think so.

3116. And others to get quit of them?—Every man is bound to do his duty, and the Sheriff generally does his duty.

3117. But if a defender has a claim of very large amount made against him, and he desires to have the record made up and the evidence taken in the Court of Session, unless he can satisfy the Sheriff as to that, he must submit to the decision of the Sheriff?—Yes.

3118. And take his chance upon an appeal?—Yes.

3119. The remedies are of a very different character there, are they not?—They are of a different nature, perhaps, but the result might not be different. I don't think the result, as a rule, would be different.

3120. Do you think an appeal gives the defender as good a remedy as if he had the record made up and the evidence taken in the Supreme Court?—I should say as good.

3121. You think a case cannot be lost by the evidence being badly taken, or the record being badly made up?—If the party who is to make up the record and take the evidence was utterly incompetent, that might be so; but I don't look on our Sheriffs as of that class.

3122. I don't speak of the Sheriffs?—But you must take into account the character of the person who takes the evidence and makes up the record.

3123. Do you think it is not often a matter on which cases are lost or won—the making up of the record, and the taking of the evidence?—It may be in a few cases; but that will be owing to the fault of the agents.

3124. But you force the defender to submit to that chance, if the stake is above £50, unless the Sheriff gives leave to go to the Court of Session?—Yes; because I think the Sheriff is quite competent to say whether a case should be remitted to the Court of Session or not.

3125. Dr. Barclay.—And when an appeal was ultimately taken, I presume you would allow the Court of Session to amend the record or have a new trial?—Yes, certainly.

3126. The Chairman.—Would you have civil cases tried by jury before the Sheriff?—No; I don't think that would be relished at all.

3127. Would you deprive parties of the power of removing causes into the Court of Session, where they can have them tried by jury?—Yes, except with the leave of the Sheriff.

3128. Then you would enable the pursuer to bring a cause of any amount before the Sheriff in the small debt form, and you would thereby exclude altogether the intervention of a jury?—Yes.

3129. Dr. Barclay.—I observe you are not friendly to jury trial?—No.

3130. Neither in the Supreme Court nor the Inferior Court?—No.

3131. The Chairman.—You think a jury is not a good tribunal for ascertaining facts?—I don't think so.

3132. Mr. Webster.—Is that the result of your coming in contact with mercantile people?—It is partly that. I cannot distinguish in my own mind how much of the opinion is attributable to that.

3133. Mr. Clark.—Among the mercantile community, with whom you are very largely associated, what is the prevailing opinion as to jury trial?—They do not like it at all.

3134. Is that from its expense or its uncertainty?—Both from its expense and its uncertainty.

3135. It is not the mere expense that they object to, but the element of uncertainty also?—Yes.

3136. The Chairman.—They would rather have the judgment of a single judge?—Yes; they can generally trust to a judge, while they cannot trust to a jury.

3137. Mr. Clark.—In a certain class of cases, such as slander, do they not see the propriety of having a jury?—That might be a very proper case for a jury.

3138. Do you know how the community with which you are associated feel on that matter?—It is more actions for resting-owing that I have been speaking of.

3139. Money claims?—Yes.

3140. Mr. Campbell.—And breach of contracts?—Yes, mercantile questions. Slander, injury by railway accidents, and such cases, might still be left to a jury. I am not speaking of that class of actions.

3141. Mr. Clark.—You are speaking of actions which properly fall under mercantile contracts?—Yes.

3142. Mr. Shand.—Even including actions of damages under mercantile contracts?—Yes.

3143. Dr. Barclay.—And yet you exclude trial by jury in the Sheriff Court in cases above £50?—Yes.

3144. In cases where you think jury trial is the proper mode of adjudication, would you not allow parties to go to the Court of Session without the leave of the Sheriff?—Yes. In fact, I was not alluding to that class of cases; and any observations I make are chiefly to be construed as bearing on proper mercantile claims.

3145. Mr. Shand.—Have you heard common complaints from parties engaged in conducting cases under the Debts Recovery Act in reference to the remuneration given?—No; I think the remuneration is quite adequate.

3146. You have not heard any complaints from any quarter on that subject?—I have heard that the Society of Solicitors in Ayr have resolved not to take up cases under the Act.

3147. Have you heard any complaint of that kind by agents in Edinburgh?—No.

3148. Or from any other quarter except Ayr?—No.

3149. Dr. Barclay.—Was the complaint in Ayr that the fees were not remunerative?—I think so. But I think the remuneration is quite adequate. In fact, people are kept back from the Sheriff Court at present on account of the cost of the actions. The opinion of the mercantile class is this: Here is an institution kept up by the Government for the settlement of disputes and for the recovery of debts, and we are debarred from taking the benefit of it by the enormous expense that we must undergo. People come to me every day with disputes of about £15 or £20; and the first question I ask is, 'Are you prepared to risk £10 a side upon it?' They say, 'No, we would risk £2 or £3 a side, but we would never think of running the risk of having to pay costs amounting to about as much as the sum in dispute.' I think something ought to be done to enable parties to get the benefit of the decision of the Sheriff upon questions of dispute, where the sum involved is small, at little expense.

3150. The Chairman.—The remuneration now under the Debts Recovery Act is by a certain fixed sum?—Yes.

3151. Not in proportion to the amount of labour or time spent on the case?—That must be received with certain limitations. For example, the first duty of the Sheriff in a case under the Debts Recovery Act, is to inquire if it is a proper cause to be tried in that summary manner. Now I would say it is an element in the Sheriff's judgment whether the cause is one of difficulty or not, or would require a great number of witnesses, and a great deal of time to elucidate the facts. That ought to be an element in his judgment, whether he should remit the cause to the ordinary roll or leave it to be tried in the summary form; and if he thinks it is a simple cause, which ought to be tried in the summary form, I think the remuneration is adequate.

3152. How does the Sheriff make that inquiry?—He hears the parties. There are generally agents, but sometimes the parties appear; and if they do, the question of costs does not come into play. An agent ought to know his case when he comes up with it; he should know whether it is difficult or not.

3153. Has any case occurred in your experience which was remitted to the ordinary roll for such reasons as you now state?—I do not know, but I have no doubt there have been such cases.

3154. Dr. Barclay.—You think it is an advantage that the parties should know exactly what a case is to cost them?—Yes, they know what they are doing when they go into court. Prudent people like to be able to count the cost before going to law.

3155. Mr. Baxter.—Would you pay an agent the same amount whether he has little or much trouble?—No; he ought to know his case when he comes before the Sheriff; and if he sees he is to have much trouble, he could state so, and the judge would remit the case to the ordinary roll.

3156. Dr. Barclay.—But suppose the case is not remitted?—I am supposing only a simple case.

3157. Mr. Clark.—Suppose the trouble the agent has had in preparing the case is very great, is he not to be remunerated for that trouble, though it may come to be a very simple and short case ultimately?—If the parties knew beforehand that it would cost much, they would rather not go into it.

3158. That is their option?—Yes, but in many instances people do not know what the expense may be.

3159. And therefore you are to give the procurators an inadequate remuneration, to enable parties to get their cases disposed of, because they don't choose to pay an adequate remuneration?—The procurator is not bound to take the case up.

3160. Mr. Harrison.—Do you consider that the advantage of the maximum expense being known is so great as to make these exceptional cases worth risking?—Yes. I know that the larger class of merchants, before the Debts Recovery Act was passed, would not go into the Sheriff Court on any consideration; they would rather submit to anything.

3161. Mr. Clark.—Do you think the Sheriff is a proper judge of whether the case has cost the procurator so much trouble as that he should remit it to the ordinary roll or keep it in the summary roll?—Yes, whether it is likely to cost him trouble.

3162. There may be considerable discussion as to whether the case is likely to be long or short; and suppose ultimately it is found the Sheriff is wrong in holding that there has been little trouble, the procurator gets no remuneration unless before the case begins he can satisfy the Sheriff that it is to be a long one. Is that reasonable?—I think that the remuneration provided under the Debts Recovery Act as it stands is quite adequate. You must take the Act as a whole.

3163. Mr. Baxter.—Then it must be more than adequate in short cases, and not adequate in long cases?—In any case the cost is smaller than before the passing of the Act. But I understand the Act does not contemplate long cases coming under it at all.

3164. Mr. Clark.—How can a Sheriff, who knows nothing about the case, decide whether it is to be a long or a short one? The one procurator says it is to be very short, and the other says it is to be very long; is the Sheriff to take evidence upon that matter?—The vast majority of cases brought under the Act are book debts.

3165. But you are proposing to extend it to all classes of cases?—If that was done, probably there might require to be a revised scale of fees.

3166. An ad valorem scale?—For the summary causes, I would certainly have an ad valorem scale.

3167. If a case is remitted to the ordinary roll, would you leave it on the present principle as to expenses?—Yes.

3168. You would leave it to the Sheriff at the commencement of the cause to decide whether it should be an ad valorem scale, or whether it should be the present scale of remuneration in ordinary cases?—Yes; causes above £50 the Sheriff would be bound to send to the ordinary roll.

3169. At the option of either party?—No, unless both consent to its remaining. In cases below £50 the Sheriff would have the power which you allude to.

3170. Above £50, both agents not agreeing to have the case disposed of in that way, it would, as a matter of course, go to the ordinary roll?—Yes.

3171. And as a matter of course, the remuneration of the agent would be paid according to the work done?—Yes.

3172. And so the ad valorem scale, in your view, should be limited to cases under £50?—Yes.

3173. Mr. Shand.—Would it not be a mistake to send cases away from the roll in which they may be disposed of in a summary mode, in order to give the agent a claim to a larger remuneration? Would it not be better to keep the case in the position in which it may be summarily and rapidly dealt with, and yet to give the agent somewhat more remuneration?—The object which I would have in remitting the case to the ordinary roll is, that cases above £50 are generally cases of more importance than cases under £50. I do not propose that with the view of anything concerning the procurators at all.

3174. Confining your attention to cases below £50, why do you propose to send one to the ordinary roll, and keep another in the summary roll?—Because one class of cases is more difficult to determine than another.

3175. Is it to create more procedure?—No; but to determine them by another mode of procedure.

3176. If you could get them determined in the summary roll satisfactorily enough, would you keep them there?—Yes.

3177. You would not send them to the ordinary roll in order to give the agent a claim for more remuneration?—No.

3178. If he has had more trouble than usually occurs in cases in the summary roll, should he not be remunerated for it?—I don't think he would have more trouble.

3179. You don't mean that all cases cause the same amount of trouble?—Very nearly. For conveyancing there is an ad valorem scale of fees.

3180. Don't some cases give a great deal of more trouble than others?—Not so much as would make much difference in the cost.

3181. Dr. Barclay.—May a case below £50 not be more nice and more difficult of solution than one above £50? Is it merely the sum that regulates the difficulty of the case?—No, not as a rule; and that is why I would give the Sheriff power to remit cases below £50 to the ordinary roll.

3182. Mr. Webster.—At present the fees are the same, whether there be or be not a counter claim?—Yes.

3183. So that there is no allowance for supporting a difficult and complicated counter claim?—No. At present there is no allowance; but if all counter claims were admitted, there might be provision made in the revised table for this.

3184. Mr. Baxter.—And it would be the same whether there is or is not a proof led?—Yes.

3185. The Chairman.—Did I understand you to say, that if the agent satisfied the Sheriff that it was a case which cost him more trouble than the fee was an adequate remuneration for, he might send it to the ordinary roll?—Yes.

3186. Although the case was in its own nature one very expedient to be settled in the summary form, would you, for the purpose of enabling the agent to get adequate remuneration in the case, he having had a great deal of trouble in taking precognitions and otherwise, have it transferred to the ordinary roll?—Not for that reason alone; but that might be an element.

3187. Do you think that in that case the procurator should not be properly remunerated?—I think the scale of fees provided by the Debts Recovery Act gives adequate remuneration. That is to say, it provides as much as parties would care to pay for the service rendered. Should it cost more, they would prefer to want it.

3188. For the greatest amount of trouble that can be had in such a case?—Yes; in the cases contemplated by the Act.

3189. And that they are too large where there is not much trouble?—The amount of trouble is very much the same in all these cases.

3190. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that a case is attended with the same trouble which does not require proof at all, as a case that does require proof?—No.

3191. Dr. Barclay.—Is there any reason for the Sheriff sending a case from the summary roll to a more tedious and expensive one, simply to give remuneration to the agent?—I don't say that. I merely say that would be an element.

3192. The Chairman.—But suppose that to be the only element?—Then the judge ought not to remit it to the ordinary roll upon that ground alone.

3193. Mr. Clark.—Would you allow the judge, in deciding to what roll it should be sent, to take into consideration the remuneration of the procurator?—I would allow him to take that as an element,—that the procurator could not carry it on according to the scale of fees allowed for cases to be tried in a summary manner.

3194. The Chairman.—What other element would you combine with that?—Justice to both parties.

3195. But supposing the justice to both parties to exist without that element, that would not be enough by itself?—Yes.

3196. Therefore he would not care for the remuneration of the agent; that would form no necessary element in the justice of the case?—The case would then be a simple case.

3197. And it would go to the ordinary roll?—No, it would remain in the summary roll.

3198. If the justice of the case required it to be sent elsewhere?—No; if the parties had not much trouble with it, it would be a simple case; and if they had much trouble, it would be a complicated case.

3200. And according to the representations which the agent gave to the Sheriff, the Sheriff is to decide whether it is to remain in the one roll or to be remitted to the other. Do you think all that satisfactory?—I think we might trust to the Sheriff keeping that right.

3201. But the parties interested in getting the case remitted to the ordinary roll are the agents; they are the only persons before the Sheriff, and they represent to the Sheriff the character of the cause. How is the Sheriff to decide?—The Sheriff will satisfy himself. He hears what they have to say; and if their statements convince him that the cause is likely to be complicated, he will then remit it at once.

3202. But it is statements made by the interested parties that he is to decide upon?—Yes.

3203. And he has nothing but the statements of the interested parties to enlighten him?—In many cases it is the statements of interested parties that decide the case altogether.

3204. With other evidence. But there is nothing here except the statements of the two parties who alone are interested?—No.

3205. The Chairman.—Do you think that this system of remuneration is all that could reasonably be desired for the agents in any cause?—I think it is the best that we could get for simple causes.

3206. On a balance of matters?—Yes. It practically comes to this, that cases for sums under £50, be they ever so simple or ever so complicated, are to be put through the same steps of process, and a fee become exigible on each, as is now the case in the ordinary court; or that an ad valorem scale be adopted which would be applicable to the simpler causes which form the vast majority, and allowing the more complicated to be sent to the ordinary roll.

3207. Do you think there may be grounds in certain cases for the agents complaining that they have not sufficient remuneration, but that in other cases it is made up to them by very handsome remuneration?—Yes.

3208. Do you think that is a good principle?—I think it is a principle that satisfies both parties; at least it satisfies the public.

3209. What do you call the public?—The clients.

3210. It satisfies the party who is to pay?—Yes. There is one thing to be considered, and that is that the agents have a monopoly. They surround the court, and they cannot be allowed to have the making of their own fees, lest justice be obstructed.

3211. Neither they have?—You must have some scale of fees; and what I say is, that for these simple causes the ad valorem principle is the best.

3212. Mr. Harrison.—It may operate as a hardship in certain cases?—Yes.

3213. But you think, on the whole, it works well?—Yes.

3214. Are you aware that in Ayr the procurators refuse to act under it?—Yes.

3215. Do you think that the fact of their possessing a monopoly of the right of practice imposed on them the duty of accepting the fees appointed by the Act, until they were altered by the proper authorities?—I do; and the procurators have power under the Act to apply to the Supreme Court; and if they can satisfy that court that they have cause for complaint, it has power to substitute another table of fees.

3216. Mr. Webster.—Is it your view, that each procurator before the Sheriff has a duty to conduct these cases for the fees specified in the Act?—I don't say that he is bound to take up any case that any person goes to him with; but I say that no body of solicitors ought to pass a resolution that they will not take up a certain class of cases for the fees provided by the Legislature, more especially seeing they have another remedy of which they do not avail themselves.

3218. Mr. Webster.—But you have no fault to find with individual members declining to accept these cases?—No.

3219. Mr. Gordon.—You think this system of remuneration is sufficient, looking to the simple nature of the causes which are covered by the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes.

3220. As a general rule, they are very simple cases?—Yes.

3221. Do you know that there is in the County Courts in England a similar provision with reference to debts under £20?—Yes, I do.

3222. And the utmost amount that can be claimed there for a debt not exceeding £20 is 15s.?—I know the fees are similar, but I think, on the whole, larger under the Debts Recovery Act than under the County Courts Acts.

3223. Under this Act it is 7s. 6d. where there is a decree in absence, and 30s. where there is opposition?—Yes.

3224. Do you think that the effect of the Act is to lead to a great many more actions being brought into court?—I do. Before the passing of the Debts Recovery Act, several parties have come to me and have said, 'A. B. is in difficulties, and I have a claim against him.' The first question I put is, 'What is its amount?'

Peter Morison.

The answer is £20. I said, 'I hesitate to send this case to our solicitors, because it appears quite evident that the debtor must become bankrupt; and if you go on with the cause, you may have heavy expenses to pay; the dividend you may get from the estate may not cover the expense.' Another person would come with a claim against the same individual, amounting to £11 or £12; and I would tell him to take out a summons in the Small Debt Court, and he may recover his money. That has been done; and the one has recovered his money; whereas the other was afraid to take his case to the ordinary court because of the expense; and he did not want to restrict it, because then he would only get a dividend on the smaller sum, and a creditor with a smaller claim might have acquired a preference, and carried off the greater part of the estate. I don't think that should be allowed.

3225. Mr. Clark.—What is your remedy for all that?—The remedy is to simplify the procedure, and lessen the cost as much as possible. The time consumed in the ordinary court in carrying through a sale is much larger than in the Small Debt Court; and where there are two creditors, it is very often a race which is first, and the man in whose favour the short time runs is the successful competitor. Now there should be nothing like that.

3226. The Chairman.—How would you remedy that?—By bringing all actions for debt in the manner provided for in the Small Debt Act; and if the case is undefended, I would allow judgment to pass at once. Most of these cases are undefended. The debtor does not pay, because he is embarrassed.

3228. The Chairman.—Have you any further remarks to make?—With reference to arrestments and poindings, I think that poindings under the Small Debt Act ought to be recorded.

3229. Dr. Barclay.—As is done under the General Diligence Act?—Yes. Then every decree should have a charge of payment. I think that very great oppression is committed by the power to arrest workmen's wages.

3230. On the dependence?—That is not competent under the Small Debt Act, and I am not aware that it is done in the county of Edinburgh; but I think that if a provision was made, such as I suggested with reference to judgment summonses, the arrestment of wages might be abolished. Poor people's wages are often arrested, and there may be arrestment after arrestment, till they are left next door to starvation, it may be for three months, till the pursuer chooses to bring an action of furthcoming. No doubt a workman might bring an action against his master, but that would amount to dismissal from employment. I think something should be done to remedy this.

3231. What?—What I would propose would be to abolish the arrestment of workmen's wages.

3232. The Chairman.—Entirely?—I would prefer it to be entirely abolished. If there was power given to the pursuer to bring the debtor before the judge, and to say, 'This debtor has means of paying my claim, but he does not do so,' it would be incumbent on the creditor to show that the debtor had the means of paying; and if the judge was satisfied, he might order a certain sum to be kept off the debtor's wages every week, or he might make a peremptory order on the debtor to pay a certain sum, or in default to be imprisoned.

3233. What class of persons do you call workmen?—Day labourers and artisans. People who earn weekly wages.

3234. Dr. Barclay.—Without any respect to the amount?—Yes.

3235. Mr. Clark.—But weekly wages reach pretty high?—Sometimes. I have known as much as £2 or £3 made by the higher class workmen. The difficulty is in drawing the line. I should say that about 15s. a week in towns is as little as could be allowed to support a family.

3236. The Chairman.—Where the wages amount to £2 or £3 a week, which are much more than the wages of many persons who are paid quarterly or half-yearly, would you except the one from the arrestment and subject the other?—No; but if there could be a provision framed which would also exempt those parties whose wages were to be paid quarterly, and leave the power of arrestment so as to attach other funds, such as merchants' accounts, and sums of money lying in the hands of third parties, that might be done.

3237. That is not wages?—No; but the difficulty would be, that unless it was specified that it was weekly wages, you might injure the power of arrestment. I would be disposed to recommend that even quarterly salaries should not be arrestable if they were below a certain amount, or of whatever amount, if I got the judgment summons.

3238. Mr. Clark.—There being a sort of summons under which you could get a decree which virtually assigned to the creditors a certain portion of the salary?—Yes, if the judge was satisfied that the debtor had the means of paying, and did not do so. I don't think it should be left with the creditors, as it is just now, to perpetrate any amount of cruelty.

3239. In short, you think there should be, as it were, cause shown to the judge before the creditor could get the remedy of arrestment, or some equivalent?—Yes.

3240. And the equivalent would be what you have stated?—Yes; that is the only thing that occurs to me.

3241. The Chairman.—You think the arrestment of small wages is a bad thing?—I do.

3242. It may have the effect of giving credit to the workmen; but perhaps that is not a good thing in itself?—No. In large towns there are a number of dealers known by the name of clubmen, who keep canvassers to go round to workmen's houses with their goods, which they tempt the workmen's wives to buy on credit, in the absence of their husbands. The wives too easily yield to the temptation, and the result is great oppression; whereas if they were left to go to shops, they would not take the things at all—they would not take credit so extravagantly. But these clubmen rely on the power of arrestment to recover their money.

3243. Wages are not paid in advance?—Not as a rule.

3244. The workman must have some little credit for the week?—He gets his wages at the end of the week.

3245. You think he would receive credit for that period, if he paid regularly at the end of the week?—Yes; but a workman ought not to require credit for a week, if he is a respectable man, and does not spend his money foolishly.

3246. How is he to live the first week?—He begins generally as a young man, and his father is bound to support him till he is able to support himself.

3247. Suppose he has no father?—The Parochial Board is bound to support him.

3248. Dr. Barclay.—But if he is an ablebodied man?—I was beginning at the beginning—when he is a young man.

3249. The Chairman.—Take the case of a man who has lost his means by misfortune, and has been some time out of employment from ill health: he gets employment on public works, or otherwise; how is he to support himself the first week?—If he is an honest man, he generally gets credit.

3250. And if he pays faithfully, he will get credit the next week too?—Yes; but he ought to lay by as much as would keep him the following week.

3251. Are there not some weeks in which his expenditure is necessarily greater than in others, being exceptional?—Yes. I am not for abolishing credit; but I am for abolishing the arrestment of wages. It would be a hardship to abolish credit, or the means of recovering these sums altogether.

3252. You mean that the party could get all the credit he should get without the remedy of arrestment?—Yes.

3253. Dr. Barclay.—Seeing the very summary nature of small debt claims, would you advise the abolition of arrestment on the dependence altogether?—No.

3254. Wages are not arrestable upon the dependence?—No. In the county of Edinburgh, every officer invariably asks if it is likely to be wages that are arrested, and he will not lay an arrestment in the hands of a master upon a summons. Sheriff Gordon put a stop to that in the county of Edinburgh; and it is never now done.

3255. The Chairman.—Apart from the debtor and creditor in such cases, are you aware whether it is obnoxious to the masters to have arrestments laid in their hands?—It is.

3256. It is attended with great trouble and inconvenience?—Often.

3257. Don't they sometimes dismiss a workman because they have been put to the trouble of receiving arrestments?—Yes.

3258. Dr. Barclay.—Would you not recommend that the schedule should say that the arrestment does not include wages?—Certainly I would; and in some counties I believe that is put in. In Glasgow, I think, 'wages excepted' is put in.

3259. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions to make?—The days of charge in all cases ought to be equalized. For example, a charge upon a bill is six days, upon a small debt or debts recovery decree ten days, and on a Sheriff Court decree fifteen days. These ought to be equalized, because the tendency is to give one creditor a preference over another. Either the charge on the bill ought to be extended to ten days, or they ought all to be brought down to six. I would recommend ten days for all. Then a small debt decree does not carry interest, which seems to be an omission in the statute.

3260. Dr. Barclay.—You may have interest up to the date of judgment?—Yes; but not beyond that. After the debt is constituted by decree, I think the debtor should pay interest.

3261. Might the pursuer not afterwards bring an action on a small debt decree for the interest accumulated?—I know in some counties that was tried, and held to be incompetent. The judge said the warrant should have been put in execution.

3262. The Chairman.—These small debt decrees are generally against very poor people?—Not always.

3263. Are they not generally?—Yes, the majority.

3264. And there is very summary power of execution?—Yes.

3265. Would it not be rather hard upon poor people to take interest on proper small debt cases under £12?—Well, yes, if the poverty continued.

3266. If the parties are at all able, the pursuer can recover his debt?—But in many cases the parties go away, though they are perfectly able to pay.

3268. Dr. Barclay.—Would you leave the rent unaltered?—I would have no objection to extend it. I think something should be done to equalize the work performed by Messengers-at-arms and Sheriff-officers. I know that in the Court of Session Act that is done to a certain extent, but I think Sheriff-officers should be empowered to do everything which Messengers-at-arms now can do in the way of process relating to debt.

3269. Mr. Gordon.—Is there not some difficulty arising from vested interests in the existing Messengers-at-arms?—The interest is vested in them for the public good; and if it is found to be more for the public good that it should be taken away, I would not hesitate to do so; but if it is necessary to give them compensation, let that be done. The same remark is applicable to procurators. I think something ought to be done to equalize the admission of procurators.

3270. The Chairman.—How do you mean?—A man may be a procurator before the Sheriff in Edinburgh, and he is not entitled to remove to Glasgow and practise there. Now, if he is a procurator before any one court in Scotland, I think he should be entitled to practise in any other.

3271. Dr. Barclay.—Always excepting the Supreme Court?—I would also say that an agent entitled to practise before the Supreme Court ought to be entitled to practise before the Sheriff Court.

3272. And vice versa?—Yes. I would have a general body of solicitors over the whole of Scotland.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.	JAMES ADAM, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

Alexander M'Neel-Caird.

ALEXANDER M'NEEL-CAIRD, Esq., examined.

3273. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner in the Sheriff Court of Wigtown?—I am. I appear here as Vice-President of the General Council of Procurators for Scotland; and I have been requested by the General Council to state their views to this Commission. With your Lordship's permission, I propose to read a paper containing the substance of their views, and then to undergo any examination you may think fit.

3274. Was that paper drawn up at a meeting of the Procurators?—No; the paper was not drawn up by the Council of Procurators, but we have taken means to ascertain the views of the whole of our body; and by discussion in the General Council we have arrived at certain unanimous conclusions, which, without having them formally drawn up at the meeting, I was directed to state in substance. I am exceedingly anxious that I should state neither more nor less than I was instructed; and therefore I would ask leave to read the paper.

3275. Then it is a paper containing your understanding of the sentiments of the Council of Procurators?—Yes, as ascertained after obtaining returns from all the faculties whom we represent.

3276. Did that opinion give effect to what was expressed in the returns sent to you?—In substance it does so, with certain corrections which were made by all parties unanimously after discussion.

3277. What do you mean by all parties?—All the representatives of these faculties.

3278. The General Council consists of representatives of these faculties?—The General Council represents about 1060 members of the profession.

3279. How do they represent them?—The members of the profession, being scattered all over the country, are formed into 23 faculties. The Deans of these faculties are members of the General Council; and the General Council assemble here, or wherever they think fit, and deliberate on behalf of their respective bodies;—this is in substance the result of their deliberations.

3280. It is the result of the deliberation of the Deans?—After having obtained returns from each faculty.

3281. Does that paper give effect to the opinions expressed in the returns?—The returns were not in every point agreed. The representatives of the faculties met, and after discussion came to agree; and this is the substance of what they came to.

3282. The representatives having considered the returns made to them from the different faculties, which returns did not in all respects agree, came to an opinion of their own?—After discussion they came to unanimous conclusions.

3283. They came to a conclusion of their own?—They did, being representatives of the local bodies, and coming direct to each consultation from among their respective bodies.

The whole legal profession in Scotland, including all branches, consists (according to the official lists) of 1998 members. Of these the General Council represents about 1060, who form 23 statutory faculties; and there are rather more than 100 country procurators who have not yet enrolled themselves in any faculty. These faculties have their headquarters at the principal towns, and each faculty is represented by its Dean in the General Council. Through this organization we have been at pains to ascertain the prevalent views of our branch of the profession, and I have been instructed to state them to this Commission. The Glasgow faculty has a limited but inadequate representation in the General Council. It contains about 213 of our members; and being a body of sufficient importance to take separate action, will no doubt use its own means of stating its views to the Commission. It will of course be understood that I in no respect imply the concurrence of that body in the views which I have to state.

Constitution of Sheriff Court, Local Appeals, etc.

There is a decided, and I may say almost unanimous, opinion in our body in favour of retaining a prompt and inexpensive appeal within the Sheriff Court. There is also a general opinion that the emoluments and status of the resident Sheriffs should be materially improved, in order to obtain superior men; and that the usefulness of the appeal Sheriffs might be greatly increased. A smaller number of appeal Sheriffs, adequately paid, with a better distribution of work, would render more efficient service, while the charge to the public might perhaps be diminished. The present annual charge for Sheriffs-principal is, I believe, about or nearly £17,000 or £18,000. A moderate number of Sheriffs, say at from £1500 to £2000 a year, could do the duties of appeal judges satisfactorily at a considerable reduction of cost; and the saving might be well employed towards improving the position of the resident Sheriffs.

It is desirable that the litigants should in in all cases have a right to be heard by the appeal judges in open court. It is not possible, when the pleadings are wholly written, to prevent occasional misunderstandings and miscarriages, which might be prevented by a few words of personal explanation.

The preponderant opinion in our body is in favour of appeal courts of two Sheriffs. Our General Council, after much discussion, came unanimously to the conclusion that such a court would be a great improvement on the present system. An appeal from a single judge to a single judge is not satisfactory where they differ. The decision of two judges, when the judgment of a resident Sheriff is altered, would have much greater weight. If they affirmed, the concurrence of three competent judges would terminate the great majority of Sheriff Court litigations. If, again, one appeal judge concurred and the other differed from the judgment of the resident Sheriff, the judgment would stand, with the advantage in the public mind of two opinions against one, unless altered by the Supreme Court.

We regard an appeal within the Sheriff Court as of the last importance. The great bulk of the litigations in the Sheriff Courts cannot afford the cost of Court of Session proceedings. However you attempt to reduce the costs in the Court of Session, a case cannot be carried on in that court without counsel and agents in actual attendance on the court; and if you take only two counsel on each side on an appeal from the Sheriff Court, you have thus six additional advisers to instruct and pay, whereas in the Sheriff Court the appeal would be discussed by the two agents who were already familiar with it, and at a trifling cost. Appeals in the Sheriff Court are so inexpensive, that nearly every case is at present finally determined by an appeal judge. To abolish the local appeal would, in a great majority of Sheriff Court cases, shut out appeal altogether.

The small proportion of cases advocated from the Sheriff Courts shows this; and it is also remarkably illustrated by the experience of the English County Courts. Though appeal is there allowed in all cases from £20 upwards, yet in 1866 there were only 15 appeals from the County Courts in the whole 59 circuits of England, out of more than 8000 cases which exceeded £20.

The abolition of caution in advocations, and the simple note of appeal now permitted to the Court of Session, will probably lead to the first step of appeal being frequently taken, for purposes of delay or negotiation. But, owing to the expense, the number of appeals prosecuted to judgment is not likely to be materially greater than in the past.

Therefore, as we have the good fortune to have in Scotland a cheap local appeal, we have come unanimously to the conclusion that we should endeavour to improve it, but that we should not lightly part with it.

In order to raise the status of the resident Sheriffs, and induce competent men to undertake the office, we think they should not only be adequately paid, but that distinguished service by eligible men in that position should be recognised as giving a claim to the post of appeal Sheriff; and similar service in the office of appeal Sheriff should also be recognised as a claim, on fit opportunities, to the place of judge in the Supreme Court.

Enlarging Jurisdiction of Sheriffs.

There is an entire concurrence of opinion in our body that the Sheriff Court should be made a court of first instance for all civil causes, and that this might safely be done without qualification. Cases of magnitude would naturally be taken at once to the Supreme Court. But if, contrary to our views, it should be thought prudent to fix a limit to the new jurisdiction, it might be provided that, wherever it is shown to the Sheriff that the action exceeds such limit of value, or wherever it is a question of status, either party should have a right to require that the action be at once transferred to the Court of Session.

Questions of Heritable Title.

In regard to questions of heritable title more particularly, an extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction is urgently called for. It seems unreasonable that a judge who is competent to determine all questions of personal estate, however intricate and great, should be regarded as unfit to judge of any question of heritable title, however insignificant the value involved. And as the procurators of the Sheriff Courts now conduct a great part of the conveyancing business of the country, and have thus from day to day to solve for themselves questions of heritable title, under a heavy personal responsibility, they may surely be regarded as competent to discuss the same questions in court. At present, with rare exceptions, the law is practically not available, and is not availed of, for questions affecting heritable title where the property is of small value. In most such cases the whole would be consumed in the Court of Session long before a judgment could be obtained. And this applies not merely to cases of dispute, but to cases of debt, as where a man dies in debt leaving a house worth perhaps £40 or £50, where the whole property would not pay the expense of a Court of Session adjudication and sale. Such cases bring no business to the Court of Session, and operate as a denial of justice.

Divorce, Marriage, Legitimacy.

Some of our faculties at first reported their opinion that questions of marriage, legitimacy, and divorce should be reserved for the Supreme Court. But in regard more particularly to divorce there is a decided preponderance of opinion (indeed, after discussion, the General Council came to be of one mind) that the restriction of that class of cases to the Supreme Court (which is by no means accessible when both parties are poor) operates with cruelty upon many of the humbler classes, and has promoted irregular connections and crimes of violence.

It is thought that if the husband should require a divorce case to be transferred to the Court of Session, he should be bound to provide his wife with the means of carrying on the case on a scale suited to Court of Session costs; and if, on the other hand, the wife made the like requisition, it should be in the discretion of the court, having in view the circumstances of the parties, to award only Sheriff Court expenses.

Protection of a Deserted Wife's Earnings.

We are unanimously of opinion that it is a most cruel and unjust state of the law which requires a woman deserted by her husband to seek protection for her earnings in the Court of Session exclusively. Cases continually arise in our experience of grievous hardship from this cause. In England such protection is promptly and inexpensively obtained in the County Courts.

Judicial Nomination of Arbiters, etc.

We are also agreed that it would be of great practical use if the Sheriff were permitted by law, when authorized by any agreement or deed, to nominate arbiters, valuators, or oversmen for lawful purposes, and with powers specified in the deed; and also to name arbiters under any agreement to arbitrate where the parties themselves fail to name the arbiters. The extrajudicial settlement of disputes is often prevented by the legal rules which make it incompetent for parties to delegate to a judge the power to nominate arbiters, and which make it incompetent for him to enforce an obligation to refer which does not name the arbiters. Proceedings akin to those suggested have been already introduced into Scotland to a limited extent in the Railway Clauses Acts; and the principle has been fully and beneficially adopted in England by the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, clause 344 and following clauses. Indeed, it has there been carried even further, for the courts have power to order arbitration, in fit cases, whether the parties choose or not.

Appointment of Curators Bonis, Trustees in Lapsed Trusts, etc.

A less expensive jurisdiction, than at present exists, is greatly required for appointing new trustees under lapsed trusts, and curators bonis, etc., where the property is of small value.

Guild Jurisdiction.

We are also of opinion that, except in the largest towns, the Sheriff should have a cumulative jurisdiction with the Dean of Guild, if the Guild Court should be continued.

Process Records.

The process records by condescendence and defences both in the Sheriff and in the Superior Courts, are frequently circumstantial and unnecessarily voluminous. We think that the system of pleading may be much simplified.

Simpler Writ of Summons.

If all actions in both the superior and inferior courts could be brought into court by a simple printed writ, having indorsed upon it the demand made, in the terms in which judgment is desired, decree for all undisputed claims, whatever their value, might be obtained in any of the courts at a very small cost. An option should perhaps be left, for a time, to resort to the present forms in any cases of peculiar difficulty. This suggestion also has obtained the cordial and unanimous assent of the General Council.

Citations through Post Office.

We think that much expense might be saved by permitting summonses and intimations to be served by registered letter through the Post Office, the officer's or clerk's certificate of service being verified by the Post Office receipt or stamp. Interdicts, sequestrations, inhibitions, and proceedings of that character, would require to be excepted. And the court should always have the power to direct personal service on seeing cause. Service through the Post Office has been sanctioned in regard to joint-stock companies by the Act 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89, secs. 62, 63, and also in regard to the citation of jurors by the late Justiciary Act.

Alexander M'Neel-Caird.

Warrants to arrest and inhibit.

We would recommend that all summonses should contain in brief formal terms, or should imply, a warrant to arrest and inhibit on the dependence.

Appeals during Progress of Cause.

We are also agreed that, in order to shorten litigations, no appeal should be allowed without leave of the court, during the progress of a cause, except when proof is ordered or a remit made, or an appeal taken by a witness on the ground of confidentiality.

Summary Jurisdiction for all Claims not exceeding £50.

The General Council have instructed me to state their unanimous recommendation that all claims, of whatever nature, not exceeding £50 in value, should be tried in a summary and inexpensive manner, subject to appeal. The Debts Recovery Act is objectionable, from its giving special privileges to mere open accounts, which are denied to other debts, and even to the same debts when established by bill or acknowledgment.

Appeals on Case stated.

An appeal on points of law on a case stated ought to be given with leave of the judge in all cases, and without leave if above a moderate value. We would extend this right to the Small Debt Courts, probably with conditions as to expenses or caution. Considerable evils and dissatisfaction grow out of the law being laid down differently, without remedy, in different districts, according to the individual and uncorrected views of the respective judges. The power of dealing absolutely with both law and fact is too great to be left without check in the hands of a single man. And the knowledge that the parties can appeal, always exercises a salutary influence on the mind of the judge, even when (as would probably be the case in small questions) the right to appeal is seldom exercised.

Failure of Causes by Lapse of Three and Six Months.

The provisions of the present Sheriff Court Act as to actions falling by lapse of three and six months, have been fertile in delays and expense; we are unanimously of opinion that they are mere pitfalls, and ought to be abolished.

Consolidation of Acts.

We also recommend that the Sheriff Court Acts should be consolidated, and the tables of fees revised.

Reciprocal Opening of Courts to all Practitioners.

We think it desirable that all law-agents should be subjected on admission to the same tests of qualification, and after admission should be equally entitled to practise in any court.

Jury Trial.

The general voice of our faculties is in condemnation of the Jury Court, and in favour of having evidence taken down by a shorthand writer, with proper precautions to guard against mistakes in his notes.

Most of the dissatisfaction which is felt with the Jury Court arises from the great expense which has hitherto attended it in Scotland, and from its being entirely confined to the Supreme Court in civil matters.

I am myself disposed to think, that if an option were given to have a small jury of five or seven for the settlement of facts in the Sheriff Courts, even if as an experiment it were confined to cases not exceeding £50, that mode of trial would become much more popular than our present cumbrous and expensive written proofs, which are generally far from satisfactory. If the facts were thus finally settled in the Sheriff Court, any further litigation in the Supreme Court would be limited to matters of law. But while here stating my own views, I am bound to say that the majority of our body is by no means favourable to jury trial in civil cases.

Jury of Sheriffs.

It might give satisfaction, and avoid written proofs, if the resident Sheriff and the two appeal Sheriffs were to sit together as a jury to settle the facts finally in all Sheriff Court causes, subject to appeal on points of law.

Eligibility of Procurators for Office of Local Judge.

According to the present law, Sheriff Court procurators are eligible to the office of Sheriff-substitute; but by an understanding which has been acted on by the principal Sheriffs in Edinburgh, with scarcely an exception, during many years, the procurators practising in the Sheriff Courts have been systematically excluded from their only channel of professional promotion. It can scarcely be doubted that many of them are by training and practice, and are shown by the test of professional success to be, better qualified to execute the duties of the office than some of the inexperienced young gentlemen who are occasionally sent from the lower ranks of the bar to administer justice in the provinces. And I am instructed by my professional brethren to take this opportunity of recording their respectful but unanimous protest against the continuance of this system.

3285. How many judges do you think the appeal court which you suggest should consist of?—Two.

3286. Two for all Scotland?—Two for each district.

3287. What should be the number of the districts?—We have not statistical information to form a correct judgment on that subject. We hope to get it through this Commission.

3288. You contemplate an appeal from that court to the Court of Session?—Certainly, in cases of any magnitude.

3289. Would you fix a limit of amount?—We think that in all cases there should be an appeal in point of law. In other respects, we would not object, I think, to a limit of amount.

3290. As I understand, you open an appeal to that appellate court for cases under £12?—We propose to open an appeal by leave of the court, and upon security being found or a deposit made. The appellant might have an option, on a point of law, to go either to the Sheriff's appeal court, or at once to the Supreme Court.

3291. Do you propose that there should be an appeal from that court to the Court of Session on points of law in cases under £12?—We don't think that would be essential, if you give an option.

3292. Is it not part of your proposal?—It is not necessarily a part of our proposal.

3293. Do you think it would be inexpedient?—Upon this point, of course, I must give my personal opinion. I think it is of immense importance that the law should be administered with uniformity all over the country. I don't know how that is to be absolutely secured without a central court of appeal.

3294. Would you allow an appeal to the Court of Session from the court of two Sheriffs upon points of law in cases under £12?—With security as to costs, I would myself be disposed to do so upon pure points of law; and I say so from the necessity which I have mentioned of bringing the administration of the law everywhere under one rule. I don't see how that can be secured absolutely without a common court of appeal.

3295. That is, the Court of Session?—Yes.

3296. What do you point at when you speak of security as to costs?—Of course I don't now presume to specify a particular limit; but speaking generally, in a small case, I don't think that an appeal by a defender against whom a judgment has been pronounced, should be allowed without his giving security that he will fulfil the ultimate judgment, and pay the costs.

3297. That is, in small cases?—Yes.

3298. Might that not be a hardship upon parties who are litigating small questions, and who are frequently persons of very limited means?—I don't know that it would, because if the party had no appeal he would have to put down the money. At present he has no appeal, and it is no hardship to say that you will give him an appeal if he finds security; when, if you give him no appeal, he would have to fulfil the judgment then and there.

3299. But a person appealing a case in which a larger sum is involved is not bound to find security?—

Not according to the late Court of Session Act; I confess I don't value that provision much.

3300. Do you think such persons should be required to find security?—I think all persons appealing against a final judgment to the Court of Session had better find security, but that is only my personal opinion. That matter has not been discussed in our body.

3301. Your opinion is, that in all cases an appeal to the Court of Session should be accompanied with security for costs?—Yes; and in small cases I think there should also be security found for fulfilling the decree; otherwise appeals would be taken in very small cases, in order to evade the decree.

3302. Do you think it is more likely that appeals would be taken in small cases?—Yes—sham appeals. I don't anticipate that under any form of appeal to the Court of Session which can ever be devised there would be a large number of appeals actually prosecuted to judgment. I rather refer to the controlling effect which arises from a judge having in his mind a knowledge that there may be an appeal.

3303. In regard to these small cases, do you think it would be expedient that the leave of the two Sheriffs, sitting as an appellate court, should be given to such appeal?—Certainly I think so, if the appeal was from their judgment.

3304. Even though it were a question of law?—I think so. If they saw that it was likely to be used for an improper purpose, I think they might interpose, or if they saw that it was really not a point of law of general interest. But many questions of law arise in our Small Debt Courts which are of the utmost possible importance in general practice. I may instance questions about the arrestment of a farm-servant's wages, where the present state of the law is really very loose. The wages are arrestable for all beyond what is necessary for the man's own subsistence; and the master, the arrestee, is bound to judge for himself, and determine how much he will give, and how much he will reserve for the arresting creditor. If he gives too much to the servant, the result is, that when he is brought up under the arrestment he is made to pay a second time; and if he gives too little, the servant strikes work. I have known the labour market of a district dislocated by a judgment on that subject in the Small Debt Court, which could not be reviewed.

3305. Then, do I understand that, in cases of small amount, you would require the party to have the sanction of the appeal Sheriffs to getting the review of the Court of Session?—I would be inclined either to require that, or to require that the appeal should be only in cases involving general principles of law. I am speaking of very small cases.

3306. Who is to determine that?—The local judge must determine it. I think it comes to what your Lordship puts, that it must be in the discretion of the judges.

3307. Do you think that check would sufficiently prevent appeals for the sake of delay, and so supersede the necessity of finding security?—I am not sure of that. A judge is not in a position to determine with certainty the objects of the party who asks the appeal. The party may be able to state ostensibly a very fair ground of appeal, while all he wishes is really to stave off payment, and the judge cannot know that. I think the requiring of security is an advisable thing; but I don't say it should be imperative if you require also the consent of the judge.

3308. The judge knows that there is a reasonable point of law to be considered; but he does not know the motive of the man in trying that point of law?—Quite so.

3309. Do you think the form in which an appeal is now taken, is a good form?—Yes; I think it is very desirable that it should only be an intimation of appeal.

3310. It is a cheap thing?—It is the cheapest possible thing.

3311. You think the new form an improvement?—I think it a very important improvement. I think the old advocation was a most unnecessary and expensive writ, of no practical use whatever.

3312. You think the pleadings before the appellate courts of Sheriffs ought to be entirely oral pleadings?—I think they should see the papers beforehand; but we as a body object very strongly to the determination of cases without the parties having the right to see their judge.

3313. Would you allow reclaiming petition and answers?—I think that undesirable.

3314. Would you allow the parties to have the assistance of counsel at the discussions?—We have no objections to having the assistance of counsel; but we would object very much to the attendance of counsel being made indispensable. We think it would destroy the value of the court as an appeal court of moderate expense, if it were a condition that the parties should be heard of necessity by counsel; but we would have no objection that they should have power to bring counsel if they thought fit.

3315. And that if it was a reasonable thing that counsel should be instructed to plead the case, the expense should be part of the costs of the action?—That ought to be in the discretion of the court, as it is under the existing system.

3316. You talked of a small jury of five or seven for hearing cases in the inferior court; what is your reason for limiting the number of the jury?—Because of the inconvenience (which is very much felt in criminal cases) of summoning large bodies of men, and taking them away unnecessarily from their employment; and I believe that a smaller number would have a greater feeling of personal responsibility.

3317. And there would be some saving of expense if they are to be paid for their attendance?—Yes. A jury of five is allowed in the County Court in England.

3318. Should their verdict necessarily be final?—Much would depend upon the constitution of the appeal court.

3319. How so?—I mean, that if we had a local appeal court of two judges of the highest class, I think that these two judges should be entitled to exercise the same powers with reference to verdicts that the Supreme Court at present does.

3320. That is, on a motion for a new trial, or an exception?—I don't mean to say that the particular forms of the procedure should be so; but in substance I think it would be right that there should be a revising power if there was an adequate court.

3321. Either on the ground that the verdict is contrary to evidence and the justice of the case, or on the ground of misdirection, or wrongous admission or rejection of evidence?—Yes; and in such a case it should be required that the judge who presided at the jury trial should take his seat on the bench with the appeal judges.

3322. In such a case, would you allow a motion to have the verdict set aside upon such grounds?—Yes; and if the judge was the resident judge of the district, I think he should be called on to sit with the other judges in considering that point.

3323. You would allow a proceeding for setting aside a verdict on these grounds?—I would be disposed to do that within the Sheriff Court.

3324. You wish to have it disposed of by the appeal court, the resident Sheriff being one of the judges in dealing with that matter?—Yes.

3325. If they set aside the verdict, you would give a new trial?—Precisely so.

3326. So that in one form or another the question of fact would be conclusively settled in the Sheriff Court?—I think that is extremely desirable. I think some of the greatest evils under which we suffer arise from the facts not being settled in the court where the evidence is taken. I have thus far been speaking of appeals from the resident Sheriff with a jury; but if the resident and appeal Sheriffs were to sit together as a jury, the review would of course be in the Supreme Court. In both cases it might be the right of either party, on paying the expense, to have the whole proceedings taken down in shorthand. Thus, I think, you would have superior materials for grounding complaint to a higher court than under the present system. The present mode of dealing with appeals on written proofs seems to me unsound in principle and hazardous in practice. The appeal judge, who has not seen or heard the witnesses, reads the notes of the judge who has, and dealing with them, not as in a jury case by cancelling the proceedings for gross error, is expected to form an original judgment on the facts for himself, and to vary or reverse the findings of fact as freely as if he had equal information with the judge who took the evidence,—and all this without assistance or explanation from that judge. In notes of evidence so taken, there are probably passages which were quite intelligible in their proper sense to the judge who wrote them, but which, when read by another who did not hear the witnesses, convey a different meaning. And wherever there is a direct conflict of evidence, many of the best tests of comparative truthfulness are totally superseded whenever the case passes by appeal to a judge who was not present when the evidence was given. I think that, except in extreme cases, or where there is error in law, the verdict or findings as to fact of those who have seen and heard the witnesses is more likely to be right than the judgment of more skilful men formed upon the same words without these aids. While on this subject, I must add that circumstantial records and written proofs are, in my judgment, twin roots of great delay and cost in the whole of our procedure. They are incompatible with reasonable despatch or moderate expense, and it is most desirable that a remedy should be found for them.

3327. If the objection to the verdict arises from a misdirection in point of law, would you allow any appeal to the Court of Session from the judgment of the appellate Sheriff Court on the point of law?—I think that is implied in what I said before, that there should be an appeal on points of law to the Supreme Court at all times.

3328. Do you think there is a hardship in not allowing the remedy of divorce in the Sheriff Court?—I think there is a great deal worse than hardship. It leads to a great amount of crime. There is no such thing known in practice as relief by divorce among the lower classes. They must find it practically in some other way.

3329. You suggested that there should be a power in the local judge to compel arbitration; he would name the arbiters?—Yes; I think the power to name arbiters in fulfilment of agreements to arbitrate would be well in the hands of all our courts, the Supreme Court as well as the local courts.

3331. Mr. Shand.—That is by recent enactment?—By enactment in 1854.

3332. The Chairman.—In such cases there is generally a clause in leases that the arbiters are to be appointed one by each party, and that they shall choose an oversman?—But if one refuses to nominate, what is the remedy? The common thing is that he does refuse. A very common case also is where parties have entered into a submission to two arbiters, with power to them to name an oversman, and the arbiters having disagreed in their judgment, disagree as to who shall be the oversman; in practice we sometimes try, but don't often succeed, to get the arbiters at the beginning to fix who the oversman shall be. That difficulty would be got over if the court had power to step in.

3333. Has the case ever occurred in your experience, that the arbiters, without going into the case, agreed to differ, and to name an oversman, leaving him to settle the whole matter?—I don't know any case of that kind, and I should doubt whether that would be valid. The usual terms of the submission are 'in case they shall disagree.' The condition of their power then is, that they shall first quarrel.

3334. Mr. Baxter.—Supposing one of the parties under the lease should refuse to name an arbiter, would you leave it to the court to name both arbiters?—The rule in England—and it is a very reasonable one in such a case—is, I understand, that if the one party gives notice to the other that a certain person is his arbiter, and the other fails within a certain time to name an arbiter, then the court may either authorize the one arbiter to proceed, or may appoint a second. I think that is a reasonable rule.

3335. The Chairman.—Would you give the court power to send cases to arbitration where there had been no agreement between the parties to arbitrate?—That principle also has been adopted in England, and I think it a sound principle.

3336. You approve of it?—There are cases of such a character that it is the interest of the parties, and sometimes even of the public, that there should be in the hands of the court a power of that description.

3337. What class of cases do you refer to?—A case occurred a few months ago in England which shows what I mean. An action was raised by a lady against a nobleman with whom she had lived for a great many years; and when it was brought before the court, the judge said it was not a fit case to go to a jury, and insisted on arbitration.

3338. Mr. Smythe.—You refer to Lord Willoughby's case?—Yes.

3339. I don't think it was compulsory there?—There is such compulsory power in the Act of Parliament. I rather think it was compulsory. There was pressure put on.

3340. I think the counsel had to give their consent?—I may have misunderstood what was done in that particular case, but I think I am correct in saying such a power exists in the courts of England. I think it is to be found in the Common Law Procedure Act of 1854.

3341. The Chairman.—Do you think that such a power should be given to the Sheriff?—I have doubts about giving it to the Sheriff. I think it would be better in the hands of the Supreme Court.

3342. There might be a risk of a judge wishing to get rid of a case by sending it to arbitration?—We cannot suppose that any judge would do such a thing.

3343. You would not entrust it to the Sheriff?—I think it is matter of such supreme discretion, that it should be in the hands of the highest judges.

3344. The other matter you alluded to was arbitration where there was an agreement to arbitrate, but that agreement was likely to be frustrated, either by accident or by the conduct of one of the parties. Do you think that that should be left with the Sheriff?—Most undoubtedly, because it is a difficulty which we experience continually, and it constantly brings arbitration to a dead-lock.

3345. And it indicates that the parties did not contemplate the decision of a court, but rather contemplated the decision of arbiters?—That is implied in the fact that they have agreed to arbitrate; and if they agreed to arbitrate in the knowledge that this was the law, of course they could not complain that the jurisdiction was exercised. The great difficulty is to get the parties to agree upon arbiters.

3347. This evil is not provided against by the lease?—In a lease which contemplates a transaction for nineteen years, it is impossible to name the arbiters with any confidence that they shall be available when required; and it is essential to the validity of the arrangement that they shall be named in the lease.

3348. Might not the lease contain a provision, that if the parties refuse to name an arbiter, the Sheriff should appoint one?—That would not be given effect to in law.

3349. Might it not be made part of the contract?—But in the present state of the law, as I understand it, that could not be carried out. The principle of the law is, that parties cannot delegate to a judge or to a third party the choice of an arbiter.

3350. Mr. Shand.—You say you think the Council as a body are satisfied that there should be an appeal within the Sheriff Court itself; what evils would you apprehend if justice were administered by a resident judge alone, with an appeal only to the Court of Session?—That practically, in the vast majority of cases, there would be no appeal at all; and in a country where, according to our practice, both law and fact are in the hands of the judge, that is a discretion undesirable to be left without a practical power of appeal. You can give a technical power of appeal which will be of no value, if the amount at stake will not pay the costs.

3351. You think that practically, without such intermediate appeal, there would be a denial of justice in a large number of cases?—In an enormous proportion. I conclude so, first, from the fact that, in our own experience, the advocations have been in such small proportion to the cases in the Sheriff Courts; and next, from the fact that in England the appeals in County Court cases, where appeal is open from £20 upwards, have been only 15 out of 8000 cases. Now we cannot suppose that, in the 7985 cases which were not appealed, the parties were necessarily satisfied with the judgment, or would not have sought an appeal if they could have got it. Although they were technically entitled to appeal, it was because practically the expense shut out the appeal that there were so few.

3352. Would you not be satisfied to have the judgment made final of such men as we now have as Sheriff-substitutes in the vast majority of cases?—I would think that a very great misfortune indeed, however much you may improve their position and qualifications.

3353. Do you think it is any advantage that there should be a power of appeal to judges who are not resident in the county?—There are advantages in that. You escape to a considerable extent the risk of local influences. We have not, as a body, come to any conclusion as to whether these appeal judges ought to be resident within certain districts, or whether they should be unattached to any particular district.

3354. What do you mean by local influences?—Social influences,—a man living in the county is necessarily meeting with the people on whom he may sit in judgment next day. I don't say that we find that mischievous. In my own experience I have never found it so. At the same time, a non-resident judge is likely to be more free from any suspicion of that kind of thing. I don't think it exists so much as that it may be suspected.

3355. Is it a subject of common remark that such influences exist?—I have heard remarks of that description made, in small debt cases more particularly (where there is no appeal), though I saw no ground for them. But the circumstance that the feeling may exist may fairly be taken into account.

3356. Does the circumstance that such a feeling exists, go to some extent to impair the value of the decision given?—I would not put it to that extent.

3357. There are at present five appeals competent during the progress of a case?—Yes.

3358. How many of these do you propose should be left?—My own feeling was rather against any appeal till the final issue of the case; but the general opinion of the body is that appeal might be allowed upon an order for proof, or what is tantamount to an order for proof—a remit to a reporter; and that when a witness pleads confidentiality, he should have the right of appeal, because that is a point that must be determined. They also propose that there should be an appeal at any stage by leave of the judge.

3359. Would you not add to these a right to appeal in any case where an interim decree for money is given, that being practically a decree which involves payment?—I think it extremely desirable to limit the number of stages at which a party may appeal. We have far too many of them; and I think also it is not enough to prescribe that appeal shall not be competent in any other stages, because you may have an appeal tendered to the Sheriff-clerk which is manifestly incompetent; but in practice the Sheriff-clerk says, 'I cannot judge, I must transmit it.' And you have the procedure stopped by an appeal which is not worth a farthing.

3360. What do you say to the point I am putting as to the propriety of allowing an appeal in the case of an interim decree for money?—It is a strong case.

3361. You have not considered it?—I have not fully considered it. I admit it is a very strong case for an appeal, if the party should be called on to pay down the money.

3362. Mr. Campbell.—It is disposing in part of the merits of the case?—I think it should be a condition of appeal in such a case, that he should deposit the money.

3363. Mr. Shand.—Do you see any necessity for so long a period as fifteen days elapsing between the date of an appeal, and the process being sent off to the Sheriff?—I don't see why it should not be sent off at once. The delay arises from the system of reclaiming petitions.

3364. There is a period of eight days allowed for the party to make up his mind whether he will appeal or not?—Yes; he has first time to consider; and after he has entered his appeal, he has another week to consider whether he will ask for an oral hearing or put in a reclaiming petition.

3365. Do you think the fifteen days might be diminished?—I think, if the system of oral hearings were adopted, it might be totally abrogated, and the moment the appeal is taken the process should go off.

3366. Supposing there were in some cases written argument ordered, don't you think fifteen days too long?—No. If you are to have a reclaiming petition, it requires some time to get it ready. You cannot expect the agent to throw aside everything else and buckle to it.

3367. Don't you think he could put in his paper within eight days?—I don't know. I should think it rather hard to shut him up so much; because if he omits to lodge it within the time, it is one of those papers that he cannot get in afterwards by leave. The agent may be ill or from home, and it would be extremely hard to shut out the party in such circumstances. If you are to retain written pleadings, you must allow a reasonable time to make the arrangements for them; but I am against allowing written pleadings.

3368. Under the system of allowing fewer appeals, and if possible shortening the time, as I have suggested, you would obtain an appeal at as small an expense and with as little delay as you possibly could from the local judge?—At present I think we have as cheap an appeal as can be conceived, if the party is content to send his case without a hearing; for he merely writes at the bottom of the interlocutor, 'I appeal against the above interlocutor.' Nothing can be shorter or simpler than that. But if a party wishes an oral hearing, that must stand till the court sits. In a bad case, it is sometimes the appellant's interest, under the present system, to ask no hearing, in order to shut his adversary's mouth, taking his chance of the appeal Sheriff starting some view of his own.

3369. Are there not now both delay and expense caused by the number of appeals allowed, and by the time which is occupied by each of these appeals?—I don't know in what part of a Sheriff Court process there is not delay at present. I would adhere to the simple form of appeal, and give oral hearings.

3370. And you would diminish the number of appeals?—Yes. I mean the stages at which appeal is permitted.

3371. How often do you contemplate that the appeal judges whom you suggest, should sit?—We are not possessed of statistics on which we could venture to form a distinct opinion as to that. We think the appeal judges should so arrange as to sit whenever there was business for them to do.

3372. I presume you propose that they should sit in your county town?—Not necessarily in the county town. It would be desirable that they should be in each county certainly, although I think it could be worked if the sittings were held at the circuit towns.

3373. What do you propose as to the places at which these two appeal judges should sit?—If we could have a sufficient number of judges to do it, I myself should like them to come to the counties to hear the cases in presence of the public, who had heard them before. There is a great advantage in having justice administered in presence of the people of the neighbourhood.

3374. How often would you expect that they should come to your county town?—That would depend on the amount of business to be done. I don't think it necessary that they should come very often.

3375. Mr. Baxter.—Once in six weeks or so?—It would be a very great relief to us if we could get our cases brought to a point in that time.

3376. Mr. Shand.—Then you contemplate once in six weeks?—We cannot judge of that till we get the statistics which we hope this Commission will procure.

3377. How often would it be necessary in your county?—I think once in six weeks would be quite enough.

3378. How long would you have them to sit in your county?—It is impossible to tell how long the cases would occupy.

3379. Mr. Clark.—How many cases would they have to hear every six weeks?—Very few indeed in my county.

3380. Mr. Shand.—How many would you expect that they would have to dispose of in your county once in six weeks?—I really am not prepared to say.

3381. Mr. Clark.—One?—I think sometimes there would not be any, and that there would not be a necessity for their coming so frequently. In my particular district I am not sure but that as good an arrangement as could be made, would be that the court should be held at the circuit town of Dumfries.

3382. Mr. Shand.—Coming there at intervals of about six weeks?—Yes. I am convinced that would be sufficient.

3383. Would that not create delay?—Nothing compared to what we have at present.

3384. How would you propose that an appeal in a summary case should be disposed of? Suppose the resident Sheriff grants an interim interdict, and the appeal court does not sit at Dumfries for six weeks, how would you propose that that should be dealt with?—If you have a local judge of sufficient standing, the parties must submit to that until they can procure its reversal by the next court that is held. I see no other remedy for it.

3385. Would that not to some extent be an evil?—That would to some extent be an evil, I admit; that is to say, that in an extreme case of interdict, if you could imagine an interdict granted without reasonable grounds, it would be a hardship that a party should remain for six weeks under the interdict; but I have known parties having to remain longer than that under an erroneous interdict by the present system.

3386. But that is by no means a necessary result of the present system?—I don't say that it is, but I have had my own experience of it.

3387. How would you propose that cases should be disposed of by the appeal court. Do you propose to have the papers printed?—I think it is most undesirable that there should be printing, and I think that might be avoided if there are only two judges.

3388. Then the process must first be taken home by one judge and then by the other?—Not necessarily. By the present rule, each agent is entitled to make a copy of the record and of the proof, and I see no reason why one of the agents—the agent for the party appealing, probably—should not transmit his copy of the record and proof along with the process, so that the process might go to one appeal judge, and the copy to the other.

3389. Do you propose that the judges should return to the county town to deliver their opinions?—I think that if they have met the parties face to face, and heard what they have to say, there should be no necessity for their returning. I may also state that it is not my own opinion only, but the opinion of our body, that it would be an advisable thing under such a system of appeal, that the Sheriffs, if resident in Edinburgh, should have a common office and a common clerk to receive and transmit the processes, and make the necessary communications.

3390. Do you contemplate that the Sheriffs should be resident in Edinburgh?—As a body, we discussed that question, and left it open. If you ask my opinion, it is that it would be desirable that they should be resident in Edinburgh.

3391. For what reason?—I don't think we could expect the best class of men absolutely to give up their practice at the bar, nor for my own part do I think it would be desirable.

3392. Do you think it an advantage that the Sheriffs are practising members of the bar at present?—That is my personal opinion, but I know that there is a great difference of opinion in our body on that subject. I think it is a great advantage that a man's mind is always abreast of the state of the law.

3393. Do you think it would be consistent with counsel remaining in practice, that they should occupy the office of one of these judges?—I doubt whether a man in leading practice would undertake the office.

3394. How many weeks of the year do you expect that his time would be occupied in going circuits?—If you will be kind enough to let me have the statistics, I could answer that question.

3395. But in any view, his time would be much broken in upon?—I think he ought to be handsomely paid. I think he should be of a rank only inferior to the supreme judges.

3396. Don't you think his time would be so much broken up and occupied by going circuit, that it would be impossible for him to remain in practice in the Supreme Court?—I think he probably could not remain in large practice in the Supreme Court.

3397. Do you think he could remain in practice at all?—I think he might, in moderate practice. But I think the essential thing is that he should be sufficiently paid, and placed in such a position in regard to prospects of promotion, that men of the first class could be got to undertake the office.

3398. The Chairman.—His ability to remain in practice would depend, in some degree, first, upon the number of appeal Sheriffs appointed, and second, upon the number of appeals brought before them?—No doubt it would very largely. On the other hand, the number of appeal Sheriffs goes, I am afraid, very much into the question of the salaries that you can give. If there is to be a large number, I don't suppose there is much prospect of getting a grant of public money to pay them; and therefore I fear that we are limited by the amount which is already allowed for this object; and that if you had a large number, you could not get the class of men whom we seek to get.

3399. Mr. Shand.—Do you contemplate that these judges should still retain the administrative duties of Sheriffs connected with all the counties in Scotland?—As a body we have not considered that question. I think the tendency of opinion rather is, that they should be relieved from that department of duty.

3400. That is the tendency of opinion in your body?—Yes.

3401. Have you yourself formed an opinion upon that?—I cannot say that I have formed a decided opinion upon it. I believe that the resident Sheriffs, especially if their position was improved in the way we suggest, are perfectly competent to do the administrative duties of their districts.

3402. Mr. Campbell.—To a large extent they perform these duties already?—To a very large extent.

3403. And in so far as they are liable to be interfered with by the advent of the Sheriff of the county, do you think that their influence in the administration which they actually exercise is diminished and impaired?—I don't think that, if things are working reasonably smooth. Difficulties might arise, but I don't think they should. At all events, that is not a necessary part of the present system. I have served under four Sheriffs-principal, and had much reason to be satisfied with their administration.

3405. Mr. Smythe.—Is not the Sheriff-substitute constantly in the habit of consulting with the Sheriff-principal in regard to any difficulties which he may have in the performance of his administrative duties?—I am not in a position to answer that question.

3406. Mr. Shand.—You are aware that under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, power is given to remove cases from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session for future progress?—I am aware of that. For jury trial.

3407. Do you propose to retain that power?—I never once saw it exercised. It applies to cases above £40. The expense of jury trial, as at present practised in Scotland, is so enormous, that few people would think of advocating a case of that amount for jury trial on the present system.

3408. Do you know whether the power which you stated is given to the judges in the County Courts in England to try cases with juries of five is used to any extent?—I am aware that the power of trial by jury in the County Courts in England is not used to any considerable extent; but I think it right, in making that answer, to give an explanation along with it. In the year 1866, the average amount sued for in each case in the County Courts was £2, 7s. 6d., and I don't think you can expect a jury to be called on to act about such a sum as that. But there were 8244 cases tried in the County Courts between £20 and £50 of value, and 879 were tried in that year by juries, or considerably more than 10 per cent. On the other hand, in Scotland the average number of civil cases tried by jury, taking the five years ending in 1867, was 28 in the year; on twelve years ending 1844 it was 41; while, taking the year 1866, the number tried at the superior common law courts and assizes in England was 2928, in addition to the 879 in the County Courts.

3409. Mr. Clark.—Do you think that is a fair comparison?—I don't mean it as a comparison. I mean it as indicating that jury trial has not itself had a fair trial in Scotland, owing to the enormous expense attendant upon our system.

3410. I suppose you are aware that in England, in order to get a decree in absence, you must have a jury?—I am not in the least aware of that.

3411. To prove your debt?—I rather think that is a mistake. I think that in the existing state of the law, the process for recovery of an undisputed debt is extremely simple. The party issues his writ; and if there is no appearance within a limited time, he may sign judgment and issue execution. I state this with some confidence, because, since I wrote a paper in which the subject of the record is treated of, I have had put into my hands an English common law cause which went to a jury.

3412. Mr. Baxter.—An actual record?—Yes; and I hold in my hand the whole case, including the bills of costs on each side, with all the writs, and even the citations of witnesses.

3413. The pleadings?—Yes; and everything else. When all put together, they would not make a corner of one of our commonest processes. Here is the original writ by which the party was called into court; and, as I understand, when a party sues out a writ of this description, he indorses on it the particulars of his demand, or files a declaration of the particulars afterwards.

3414. Would you read what these were in that case?—'Commission due to plaintiff from defendant, in respect of letting defendant's business at —— Street to Mr. ——, £100; also the like amount on accounts stated between the plaintiff and the defendant, and for work and labour done by plaintiff for defendant at his request.' That is £200 altogether. I am now speaking of what we would call a decree in absence. As I understand, their practice is, that when this writ is served, the party has a certain number of days within which he must appear; and this gives him notice that if he does not appear, the plaintiff will be at liberty to sign final judgment for any sum not exceeding the amount claimed. If he don't appear, the judgment is signed; if he does appear, they proceed with their pleadings.

3415. Did the party appear in that case?—Yes; and he fought it out to a jury trial and verdict. The costs, including counsel, witnesses, and all expenses, appear from the bills to have been under £50 a side. Now I think that shows that the great expense to which we are accustomed is not inherent in jury trial, and that if we had a fair trial of it upon such a system as this, the country would probably be better satisfied with it.

3416. The Chairman.—Did the defendant put in any plea?—Yes. But before going on with that, I was going to ask your Lordship to permit me to read a memorandum of the sort of pleading which I thought of suggesting.

3417. Mr. Shand.—For the Sheriff Court?—Yes; or it may be for the Supreme Court. I had noted this down before seeing that case from England to which I have referred. Two objects appear to be sought by our present records which might perhaps be separated with advantage: 1*st*, to prevent surprise, which I take to be the primary object of a record; and this might be secured by a few simple propositions fairly disclosing, without unnecessary detail, the grounds of action and defence. 2*d*, The second object is to procure admissions (which under the present system are not often made in very satisfactory terms); and this object, as it appears to me, more properly belongs to the department of evidence. The short form of record, which is occasionally used in the Sheriff Court by noting a minute of defence, might be much more frequently employed if the pursuer were to add a brief note in replication, and if the form itself were properly worked. It might tend to relieve our records from much redundant matter which obscures the issue, if both parties had a right, after the record was closed, to call for admissions of specific facts. It would not be necessary to compel answers. But if the required facts were not explicitly admitted, and were afterwards proved, the cost of proving them should be laid on the party who failed to make the admission called for. This rule to be enforced by the auditor without special directions from the court. In this manner admissions would probably be obtained, which are at present evaded, averments being frequently met by reference to something else. Undisputed facts and details would be eliminated from the record and oral proof, and the admissions only would require to be attended to or printed, as evidence, for the use of the court. A resort, after closing the record, to the old method of judicially examining the parties, might to some extent serve the same purposes; but it would in many cases cause inconvenience to the parties, and in others the parties would be unequally matched. That embodied my own views before I saw the papers in the English case. The whole pleading, according to their system, works itself: the court have nothing to do with it, the judge never sees it till it has been brought to an issue; and in this case the entire pleading in the cause for both parties is put upon a single page, brought to an issue, and then sent to a jury.

3418. The Chairman.—What was the plea in defence in that case?—'Defendant by his attorney says that he never was indebted as alleged.' The whole pleadings are on this half page of writing; and it is really not a digest; it seems to be a transcript of the pleadings of both parties. The plea in defence is probably more vague than would suit our notions of fair disclosure. But we might plead to such a case, Defender did not employ the pursuer; or, Pursuer acted contrary to his instructions; or, Pursuer was to be paid by commission on the rent, and his charge is excessive,—and go to trial at once.

3419. Mr. Gordon.—Was there no demand for particulars made in that case?—There is, I believe, a right in the party to call for particulars, and he gets access to them out of court.

3420. Mr. Shand.—I presume these particulars are equivalent to our condescendence?—No, they are as little as possible equivalent to our condescendence, because I think they have a provision in their rules that they shall not exceed three folios in length, in the cases in which they can be demanded.

3421. But these particulars aim at giving the information?—Yes, they are to give a substantial disclosure of the matter at issue, to prevent surprise.

3422. It is a condescendence briefly stated?—I don't wish to use the word condescendence because it is so misleading. We don't see condescendences of three folios.

Alexander M'Neel-Caird.

3423. You don't have it in name, but is not a schedule of particulars just a condescendence abridged?—It is what our condescendence, if you are to retain the name, might become. They call it a declaration of particulars.

3424. Mr. Clark.—Do you think that a convenient form for trying all cases?—I don't know that I have fully explained it; I don't pretend fully to understand the English system.

3425. But do you, as a Scotch lawyer, think that that is a convenient form for trying all cases which occur in Scotland?—I think it would be a vast improvement on our forms, and a great reduction of expense.

3426. And therefore a good form for trying all cases in Scotland?—I think it is plainly preferable to ours, in the cases to which it is applicable.

3427. Do you think it a good system?—I think it a good system in substance. I don't mean to say that I would transfer it to this country exactly as it is there, because our notions are different upon several points, more particularly with reference to specification; but I think in substance it is a good system. There is a form established for conveying the essence of every ground of action, and parties are bound to choose the form that is applicable to their case. These forms were prepared by the best lawyers—I believe by Mr. Justice Willes or the present Lord Chancellor. They have forms in which they have condensed the essence of nearly every ground of action. If the parties fail to use a correct form, they are met by a demurrer, and they take issue in law, and the matter is debated and decided. If there be no objection to the form of pleading, they come to issue at once on fact, and that goes to evidence.

3428. Do you think it an expedient thing to prescribe these fixed forms, so that if parties take the wrong form they will be turned out of court?—I would not turn them out of court; I would give power to amend on paying costs.

3429. Mr. Shand.—These forms are generally used in common law cases only?—Yes; we have no Chancery cases in the Sheriff Court.

3430. Are you aware that in Chancery or equity cases the English courts have adopted our system of pleading recently?—I have seen some of their pleadings in Chancery, and I certainly did not admire them.

3431. Are you aware that their bills have been adopted from our form of condescendence?—I am not aware of that. If they have come to us for a model, I think they have been unfortunate.

3432. Mr. Clark.—Is it not possible that we may go wrong by going to England for our forms?—I don't say we might not; but when we find the greatest lawyers of the day able to conduct every kind of question in such a simple form, and at so small an expense comparatively, I think we ought carefully to consider it. We are in great want of light, and in matters which have been recently legislated on in England, it is surely worth while to seek it there.

3433. Do the ablest lawyers of the day consider that a satisfactory system?—I have no knowledge of that.

3435. Are you describing the state of matters under the Court of Session Act?—I am describing a great many processes that I have had the misfortune to do with.

3436. Under the recent Court of Session Act?—There has not been enough of experience to judge of it.

3437. Do you know that it has practically abolished revised pleadings?—That is not the difficulty. It is the avoiding to meet one another fairly; so that in place of limiting themselves to the points on which they differ, each party builds his own edifice from the foundation, slipping in a stone here or there, different from what the other side has done. That system causes great confusion and expense.

3438. The Chairman.—Is that attributable to the manner in which the law is worked, or to the principle on which the rules for its working are constructed?—I think the mode of working has a vast deal to do with it.

3439. In the case you referred us to from England, could the party have pleaded under that defence, that in the employment he acted as agent, and did not bind himself?—I think they have a form of plea for that. At all events there seems no difficulty in devising one.

3440. Then you think he would not have been entitled to set that up under that defence?—I hope your Lordship will not ask me to solve a question of English law.

3441. What I want to know is, whether three, or four, or five different defences, resting on different propositions in law and fact, might not be set up under that?—I apprehend they would require to set up the defence appropriate to the class of case. If the party meant to plead that what he had done was by leave and licence, or that what he had done was as agent of another party, he should have a form of plea adapted to raising that question.

3442. That would apply only to a limited number of cases; they would still require that he should go into something more than merely denying the liability?—Yes, I apprehend so.

3443. Well, that case you put before us scarcely gives us an idea of what would be required as the statement of the defender in the great majority of cases?—No; but your Lordship will find in the Common Law Procedure Act of 1852 a mass of forms of pleading adapted to a great variety of cases.

3444. Mr. Shand.—Do you know how far that system would be suitable to cases which are not to be tried by jury?—I don't think there is any essential difference in principle, so far as the pleading is concerned, whether you try it by jury or by judge.

3445. You think these forms would be equally suitable for proof before a judge?—I cannot see why they should not. When you go to proof, you go to proof on facts.

3446. You have stated that you think there should be a considerable extension of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff: would you extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to all classes of reductions and suspensions?—These are mere forms of action; they don't involve the substance of jurisdiction. Therefore when I said, on behalf of the body whom I represent, that we thought the Sheriff should have jurisdiction in all civil cases, I of course intended to include all forms of action that were necessary to expiscate his jurisdiction.

3447. Do you think the Sheriff ought to have jurisdiction in regard to reductions of deeds of settlement, whatever might be the sum involved?—I have no doubt that if a reduction of a deed of settlement, where the property was of sufficient value to justify incurring the costs of the Supreme Court, were brought in the Sheriff Court, it would be instantly removed by the parties to Edinburgh.

3448. You have not made up your mind whether that power should remain in the party?—If the Legislature should fix a limit to the Sheriff's new jurisdiction, I think the power of either party to carry the case at once to the Supreme Court should be reserved. That is on the assumption that, contrary to the opinion of our body, you choose to limit the jurisdiction. But indeed there is no use for an arbitrary limit under the new jurisdiction, any more than under the present unlimited jurisdiction as to personal estate. There is a natural limit, arising out of the interest and objects of the parties, and in general it will work itself, sufficiently at all events for practical purposes. The pursuer, when he selects his court, will naturally take that which gives him the best prospect of having his demand soon satisfied. And if the case is of such importance that it is not likely to take end in the Sheriff Court, his interest is to begin in the court of ultimate judgment. He would only waste his time and money by doing otherwise. If there were added to that interest of the pursuer, a right in the defender to require a case of magnitude to be removed to the higher court at once, you would have a self-acting principle sufficient to guard against wrong cases being tried in the Sheriff Court, if you really apprehend danger from that cause.

3449. If the jurisdiction is extended, is there any case in which you think the power to remove the case to the Court of Session should be taken away?—I am now speaking not of the power of taking the case after judgment of the Sheriff for review to the Court of Session, but of the right of the parties to carry it there before judgment in the Sheriff Court.

3450. Well, is there any case in which you think that power should be taken away?—In a case involving the validity of a settlement of considerable amount, adequate to meet the expenses, I think it might be desirable to remove it at once to the Supreme Court for jury trial.

3451. Mr. Baxter.—That is, if the parties wished it?—Yes; I would not compel them to go to the Court of Session if both chose to remain in the inferior court.

3452. Mr. Shand.—In such a case as I have put, you would give the Sheriff the same power as the Court of Session to reduce all settlements?—Certainly, if the parties were willing to submit themselves to his judgment, but subject to review.

3453. And leaving either party to carry it to the Court of Session, if the value was how much?—We don't think there should be a limit to the review.

3454. The Chairman.—Suppose the jurisdiction of the Sheriff were extended, would you still apply the 40th section of the Judicature Act?—I don't think that the 40th section of the Judicature Act ought to be applicable to cases of such small value as £40. I think a remit to a jury trial in the Supreme Court for £40, or anything like it, could take place only for purposes of oppression, where the one party was rich and the other poor. I don't think it likely to be done for any legitimate purpose.

3455. Mr. Shand.—What sum would you say?—If I were under the necessity of naming a sum, I would say £500; but we have not deliberated upon that.

3456. Mr. Clark.—So that the pursuer might raise an action in the Sheriff Court in regard to a subject worth £500, and compel the defender to take the judgment of the Sheriff in the first instance, without the defender having any power to remove it to the Court of Session?—I have no objection to the Sheriff having power to remove to the Court of Session all cases in which he saw any cause for doing so; but we were talking of a right in the party to demand it.

3457. That is what I was speaking of?—If you are to fix a limit, I think that is the right way.

3458. You say that a pursuer may select the tribunal, and he may select the Sheriff as the first judge in all cases under the value of £500, and the defender must submit to the judgment of the Sheriff in the first instance?—If you determine that the Sheriff's jurisdiction shall be limited, the defender should have the right to require the case at any stage of it to pass to the Court of Session if that limit be exceeded. If, on the other hand, the Sheriff is to have an unlimited jurisdiction, I don't see why the Sheriff should not go on to deliver judgment, and then let the case be taken to appeal.

3459. If the Sheriff's jurisdiction is limited, you think the defender should be entitled in all cases to remove the case to the Court of Session?—Upon showing that it was a case above that limit.

3460. Mr. Shand.—£500?—Whatever limit you fix.

3461. But if the jurisdiction is unlimited?—If the Sheriff is to have an unlimited jurisdiction, he will exercise it.

3462. But suppose the Sheriff has an unlimited jurisdiction, and a pursuer raises an action involving many thousands of pounds, would you not give the defender the power of removing that action to the Court of Session when an order for proof is pronounced?—That involves the other question. If you come to the conclusion that the Sheriff ought to have an unlimited jurisdiction, I don't see why he should be interrupted in exercising that jurisdiction. If, on the contrary, you wish to fix a limit to the Sheriff's jurisdiction, then we suggest this mode of preventing cases above that limit going on in his court. But if the question reaches only to cases where there is an order for proof, I have already suggested £500 as a limit beyond which parties might claim jury trial in the Supreme Court.

3463. Mr. Clark.—Who is to judge?—The Sheriff. It must be shown to him that the value exceeds the limit, or that it is a question of status.

3464. If that is shown, then he is no longer to have any jurisdiction?—I think that is an objectionable mode of putting it. I think that, where an objection to jurisdiction is taken, whether upon such a ground as that, or upon the ground that the action has been brought in the wrong Sheriff Court, it is quite wrong that the action should be dismissed. I see no use of turning the parties out of court, and compelling them to begin again; in place of dismissing the case, according to the present practice, it should be simply transferred to the judge who has jurisdiction. You avoid delay and expense by that, and you put an end to captious pleas.

3465. Mr. Shand.—Are you of opinion that the Sheriff should have jurisdiction in questions of status, apart from questions of divorce?—If you lay aside the question of divorce, I think there is a broad distinction betwixt questions of legitimacy and marriage on the one hand, and almost any other class of questions that can be brought before a court.

3466. Does that lead you to think it is very doubtful whether these should be competent in the Sheriff Court?—I am more doubtful on that point than any other of the suggestions made.

3467. Are you of opinion that in that class of cases the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be excluded?—I don't feel warranted in saying that I think it ought to be excluded, but I think it may much more reasonably be excluded in regard to these cases than almost any others.

3468. The Chairman.—You are not prepared to give an opinion that such cases should be competent before the Sheriff?—I am not prepared to urge that matter. It is very different from any of the other branches of jurisdiction spoken of.

3469. Mr. Shand.—I think you said you thought the Sheriff and Dean of Guild ought to have a cumulative jurisdiction?—If the Dean of Guild Court is kept up.

3470. Do you not think that that would be apt to produce considerable confusion in large cities?—I excepted large cities.

3471. Then you don't think that in these cases it would be desirable to give the Sheriff cumulative jurisdiction with the Dean of Guild?—No, because in all probability you have in large towns an officer much superior to the Sheriff for cases of that class.

3472. You have stated that your body is of opinion that the power of agents to practise should be enlarged. To what extent do you mean that?—That all law-agents should be free to practise equally in any court,—that, if all admitted on equal trials and found qualified, Writers to the Signet and Solicitors before the Supreme Courts should have a right to come into any of our courts and practise freely if they choose; and that members of our body, found qualified on the same trials, should be at liberty to practise in their courts. We wish full reciprocity.

3473. The practice you allude to is practice as agents?—Yes. I may explain that we don't think that this involves any idea of country agents generally seeking personally to conduct business before the Supreme Court; but we feel that, although the great responsibility in the majority of Court of Session cases rests on the country agent, and he has the chief trouble in getting up and guiding the cause, yet he is not recognised by the court or by the auditor as a party to be paid for his trouble, while at the same time the law condemns any transaction betwixt him and the town agent for sharing the expenses that are allowed. We think that either that rule of law should be altered, or that the court should be thrown open to us, in order by that means to get quit of the difficulty.

3474. Do you think any benefit would accrue to the public from such an arrangement as you propose?—The present arrangement is unfair to the public. A litigant, whether successful or not, has always to pay his country agent out of his own pocket. And we think it has a good deal to do with the starving of the Court of Session. Every country agent has the deepest interest in diminishing the business of the Court of Session as much as he can; because, if he undertakes it, he has an enormous amount of anxiety, trouble, and responsibility: he gets no pay except at the cost of his client, and he is not recognised at all in the court; he is further under a very unfair liability to the town agent for the client. The town agent considers the country agent personally responsible to him on behalf of the client.

3475. Mr Baxter.—And he is so?—I believe he is held to be so in law, unless there be some special transaction to the contrary. Now, it is surely a reasonable thing that the country agent should not be made responsible for the mutual client unless he gives a written undertaking that he shall be responsible. We ask to have the present presumption altered; because it is a most unpleasant thing to go to your town agent before you begin a case, and say, 'Now, remember, I am not to be responsible to you for these expenses.'

3476. Mr. Shand.—If the present system were altered, do you think the Court of Session would be resorted to in a great number of cases in which it is not now resorted to?—If the points which I have referred to received reasonable attention, and if the work and responsibility of country agents were fairly provided for, I have no doubt that, in place of the pressure which we must of necessity exercise at present for our own sakes, to prevent cases going to the Court of Session, a considerable number of cases would come which don't come at present. A man in such a position as that cannot help feeling that he has no interest in encouraging, but a very strong interest in discouraging, litigation in the Court of Session; and, in many cases, a man is justified in saying that he will not put himself in the position of being surety for a client.

3477. Mr. Smythe.—All attorneys in England are officers of the Supreme Court?—Yes; that is the principle we aim at.

3478. Notwithstanding that, there are always town agents and country agents?—Yes; but in England the town agent and the country agent act as partners, and divide the fees, which is a thing we cannot do.

3479. The Chairman.—That is one of the alternatives you put?—Yes.

3480. Would it not be some inconvenience to an agent settled in the country to be attending to processes in Edinburgh? He must have somebody there responsible for the processes?—Certainly. It is in practice impossible that a man living at a distance in the country can be in attendance at Edinburgh to conduct cases of that kind personally. They must be conducted by parties within reach of the court.

3481. Then the removal of the obstruction to agreement for the division of profits would go very far to bring about the result you aim at?—To a considerable extent; but we think it would be a better arrangement altogether, that all law-agents should be put upon one footing, as in England.

3482. Mr. Baxter.—Although that were done, I suppose you don't anticipate that country agents would come to Edinburgh to practise?—I don't at all. Some might choose to come to Edinburgh to settle, and practise in the Supreme Court; but that would be a small number, and I think it would be more than compensated by the number of town agents who would go to the country. Be that as it might, I don't at all see why particular bodies should have a right of property, or an exclusive right to the public business of the courts, if means are taken to secure the qualifications of all practitioners.

3483. Do you think a party admitted in the inferior court should have right to practise in all courts?—Yes, understanding the question to apply to all Sheriff Courts. We have now an examination by a central body to determine whether a man is qualified to practise at all; and after he has been admitted by that central body, upon an equal examination with others, I think it very absurd that there is not an interchange among our courts, and that a man admitted into one court should not be able to go and practise in another without being admitted there.

3484. The Chairman.—Would that entitle them to be admitted into the several faculties which you have mentioned?—I cannot on this subject give anything except my own opinion, because it has not been matter of discussion; but my belief is, that there is a very general feeling throughout our branch of the profession in favour of throwing all these things perfectly open.

3485. Mr. Baxter.—You are aware that in Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Aberdeen, the faculties have exclusive privileges?—I think I saw a report of the Glasgow Faculty some time ago, in which views in favour of throwing open their own faculty, of course upon principles of reciprocity, were advocated.

3486. But at present they have exclusive privileges?—They have.

3487. Do you think these should exist?—I am opposed to exclusive privileges.

3488. The Chairman.—Some of the faculties have a hall and libraries; do you think it reasonable that a person coming to settle in a place where these are, should pay a certain sum as his contribution, in order to obtain the privileges of those halls and libraries?—I think that is perfectly reasonable; but I don't think it inconsistent with what I have been saying. I think these faculties might remain, and the admission to their benefits might depend upon adequate payments; but that the absolute right to practise should be thrown open to all who have been admitted and found qualified on an equal examination.

3489. Mr. Shand.—Did you get returns from any number of societies in answer to the note of points which was issued by your body?—We got returns expressing their views of first impression. These views have been reconsidered by us all, and I don't suppose there is any member of our body who has not upon discussion modified his views. I confess that I myself have very largely modified my views after discussion with my brethren.

3490. From how many societies did you get returns?—I cannot say.

3491. How many are there?—Twenty-three.

3492. Did you get returns from the whole of them?—I think from the bulk of them; but I am not prepared to state.

3493. The discussions you refer to took place at a meeting of representatives?—At a variety of meetings.

3494. Of representatives?—Yes; repeated after they had returned to their districts, and had an opportunity of testing the state of opinion among their own bodies.

3495. How many representatives were present at these meetings?—They varied very much.

3496. How many bodies might be represented at them?—I should think at some of the meetings there must have been representatives of fourteen or fifteen bodies.

3497. Are the returns you speak of contained in writing, or are they printed?—Some are printed, and some written.

3498. Do they contain the opinions that were expressed by these bodies about the constitution of the courts?—They express the first impressions of these bodies.

3499. When were these reports furnished?—Some months ago, in anticipation of this Commission sitting.

3500. Would you rather not give us these returns?—We don't think they are in such a state that it would be desirable to put them in. They are in the rough state in which they were drawn up before discussion. I think it better to give the result after discussion.

3501. The Chairman.—I think you stated that the opinions communicated to you in that way represented the prevailing opinions in the different faculties or societies?—So I think I am justified in saying. These results were arrived at by careful collation of the returns made from the different faculties, and then meeting and discussing the points of difference; and the result of that was, that we came to one mind upon all the points I have touched upon in the paper I read at the opening of my examination, except the question of jury trial.

3502. That was the prevailing opinion of the faculties, but you cannot say that it was the unanimous opinion?—I can say that it was the unanimous opinion of the representatives who came up,—after full discussion. Of course I don't pretend to say that there was unanimity throughout the whole profession.

3503. You don't say that each representative represented the opinion of the whole of his faculty?—No, that would be absurd; but I think it was a fair way of ascertaining the prevalent opinion of the whole body.

3504. Mr. Gordon.—The English case to which you referred us claimed £100?—£200.

3505. Do you know whether it was not a random sum which was claimed?—I cannot tell that. It seems to have been one half for a general fee for trouble taken in the letting of a house, and one half for a sum due on an account stated.

3506. Can you tell me whether these were two separate claims, or two separate modes of stating the same claim?—I understand them to be two separate claims; but there are several counts to cover the various modes in which a jury might be disposed to look at the claim.

3507. You read it as implying that there were two separate claims of £100?—Yes, I understand it so. The sum sued for is £200.

3508. The sum recovered was only £35?—Yes.

3509. And the costs on one side were £48, and on the other side £45?—Yes.

3510. In the plaintiff's account there is an entry, 'Copy particulars in defendant's set-off.' Was there any set-off?—I cannot say. I observed that there was a charge of that description, and my impression rather was that it was a mistake in the account, because there is nothing in the pleadings to show a set-off.

3511. Although you may take decree in absence by default where appearance is not entered, is it not the rule in England that when appearance has been entered, and the pleading given in for the defendant, the case must be disposed of by a jury?—I think that extremely probable.

3512. Whether the defendant continues his defence or not?—I am not myself aware of that; but if it is so, the empannelling of a jury would be like our old system of empannelling a jury to receive a prisoner's plea of guilty.

3513. You mentioned that 2928 cases were tried in England in 1866. These represented all litigated cases in the common law courts?—They do not represent cases in which the court decided upon points of law by demurrer.

3514. With the exception of causes disposed of by demurrer?—I should think the cases involving pure points of law must have been a large number. However, the return I have is limited to the jury trials.

3515. The system of the common law courts in England is, that you can get your case tried only by going before a jury, unless it is disposed of by demurrer?—If there be a defence, I understand it is so.

3516. The 2928 cases represent, therefore, all the litigated cases other than those disposed of by demurrer?—They may, for anything that appears in the return. My reference to them was to show the enormous difference between the number of jury trials in Scotland and in England, where the system is better understood.

3517. Do you not know that it is the subject of regret on the part of the English public, that they must always go before a jury in these cases?—I don't know that. If the English public regretted it much, I should think they would amend it. I think if they went through one of our long written proofs, they would be thankful to go before any jury.

3518. But do you know that it is so?—I do not.

3519. Mr. Smythe.—There are a great many suits decided in Scotland without a jury, which in England would go to a jury?—There are a great many cases decided in Scotland on pure points of law. The same cases would be decided on points of law in England.

3520. But there are a great many cases decided by the courts in Scotland which go to a jury in England?—Yes, in all our courts we proceed upon written proofs, taken in the local courts by the Sheriff-substitute, and taken in the Supreme Court by a short-hand writer, which, if you are to have written proofs, is the best mode of doing it.

3521. Supposing the 2928 cases which were tried in England by jury had been in Scotland, a great many of them would have been decided in England without a jury?—I don't know that; I should think they all involved questions of fact. If they had not, they would not have been sent to a jury. If they had involved questions of disputed fact in Scotland, they would have gone to a proof.

3522. Mr. Baxter.—Not necessarily to a jury?—No.

3524. On the pleadings, in respect of the admissions of parties, or after proof had been led?—The admissions of parties in England are given.

3525. But they are given in evidence before the jury. In Scotland you may dispose of a case on the admissions of parties as contained in the pleadings. In England, in common law cases, as I understand it, you must go before a jury to have effect given to the admissions?—I have not suggested the pure and simple adoption of the English practice. I mentioned it as suggestive of something worth consideration. If it has the defects to which you point, we might improve upon it. I have suggested a means of getting admissions after the record is closed, but I think there is no necessity for going to a jury for that purpose. If these defects exist, they are not essential to the jury system.

3526. The Chairman.—I do not understand how you propose to compel parties upon the subject of admissions. At present parties are required to admit or deny; you say they evade that, but the principle of our pleading is that they are to admit or deny the propositions stated?—But we have a cumbrous record about that, which is of no practical use. My proposition is, that, the record being closed, it shall be open to either party to call on the other party to admit specific facts. The other party need not answer unless he chooses; but if he fails to admit the facts, and if these facts are afterwards proved, the entire cost of proving them should be laid on the party who failed to make the admission, whatever the issue of the cause, and that should be invariably done without any order of court.

3527. You would put these propositions into a written paper?—Yes.

3528. And the party would be asked to admit or deny each separately?—Precisely so.

3529. Would you require him to admit or deny matters that were not properly within his own knowledge?—I think, if he failed to make the admission, he ought to have made the inquiry; and if he necessitated proof wrongfully, he ought to bear the expense of that.

3530. If he fails to admit facts, though not within his own knowledge, you think he should be responsible for the expenses?—Of proving these facts.

3531. Mr. Clark.—Though he gained his cause?—Yes, I think that is one way in which you may possibly get admissions. The advantage of that would be, that if you did not get the admission, you would not cumber the record with it.

Alexander M'Neel-Caird.

3532. The Chairman.—With what?—With anything about it. It would not be part of the record. It is a portion of the evidence. You put a specific fact to your antagonist, and ask him to say ay or no, do you admit that. If he admits it, it is good evidence to be taken into account by the court, along with the other evidence, and must be put before the court either by copying the portion which is admitted, or by printing it; but all that is not admitted would pass out of the case, and never come under consideration except by the auditor.

3533. Is there not some risk that that paper would be a repetition of the pursuer's averment in point of fact?—If the party did not admit implicitly, and the averment were afterwards proved, he would have to pay for proving it. That would discourage evasion.

3534. Does it not come to this, that it is a more proper kind of record than the one we have now?—It would not be matter of record unless it be admitted.

3535. But the purpose of a record is to get the allegation of the one party and of the other, and their admissions or denials; and if the record is made as it ought to be, should it not contain these things?—I think these are not essential. I think they rather belong to the department of evidence. We are using our records for the purpose of obtaining admissions before the record is closed, and we thereby cumber what we call our record with a vast amount of matter of no practical use.

3536. Then what is the use of the record?—To give warning of the case which is to be set up. There must be a sufficient record to disclose fairly the case which is meant to be tried.

3537. To disclose it in point of fact, and with pleas in law?—Yes; but what I mean to suggest is, that the substance of the case may be sufficiently disclosed without all that averment, and circumstance, and detail which we have so much of at present, for the purpose of getting admissions; and that these averments of circumstance and detail would not form part of the record, but those of the averments which were admitted would become part of the evidence, and would not require to be printed for the court unless they were admitted. There would be no necessity to refer to them on the part of the court in the discussions, except to particular points of fact that were admitted; but the auditor would look at it on the question of expenses. The object of the suggestion is to eliminate from the record and from the proof those points on which parties are agreed, and to bring the proof to the narrowest limits you possibly can, without cumbering the record with it.

3538. Have you any further observations to make upon the civil jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—On the subject of divorce, I think it would be well if the Sheriff is to have jurisdiction in such cases; and, indeed, I don't know that it would not be well in all our courts, that in every case of divorce there should be an inquiry and report under the direction of the judge as to whether there was collusion or not. I would submit also, that in divorce cases the decree should be suspended for a limited time after it was pronounced, in order that any party who felt an interest might be entitled to bring up the question of collusion. The precaution of inquiry is to a certain extent recognised in England by the right of the Queen's Proctor to intervene; but that intervention, I understand, is not invariable, but only occasional upon special cause. I think it would be well if the Sheriff had the power to make a remit to some public officer, possibly the Procurator-fiscal, to inquire whether he saw any reason to suspect collusion. I also think we should adopt the principle which is adopted in England, where a decree of divorce is made a rule nisi—that it shall not take effect unless it remains unchallenged on the ground of collusion for a limited time.

3540. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think there would be more danger of collusion if the Sheriff had jurisdiction than there is at present?—I think there would, because the Sheriff would be dealing with a much lower class of people. I think also, when you are going to extend an institution of this description to facilitate divorce, you are bound to use all reasonable precaution that it shall not be abused.

3541. The Chairman.—And the precaution you would suggest is what you have now mentioned?—Yes. I may also state that I think it would be well to adopt in Scotland the suit to perpetuate testimony which they have in England. They have not actions of declarator, and therefore they found such a suit to be necessary. But I would suggest that the Commission should consider whether we should not have that suit as a separate proceeding, independent of declarator or any other action.

3542. Mr. Baxter.—You mean before any action is brought?—Yes; that without a process being raised for the purpose of determining the question, the parties should have a right to bring a suit to perpetuate testimony.

3543. Mr. Clark.—To perpetuate that which in some circumstances may become useful for them?—Yes.

3544. Mr Gordon.—That would apply chiefly to questions of descent or propinquity?—It would, of course.

3545. We can raise the question by declarator in our courts?—A declarator will do it if the question of right is once stirred; but a declarator often forces a question into court that might never otherwise be brought.

3546. The Chairman.—Who would you make the respondent in such a suit?—I would follow the practice in England.

3547. Whatever it be?—Yes.

3548. Do you know what it is?—No.

3550. Have you anything further to suggest?—I would submit for the consideration of the Commission, that in any table of fees which may be established, more particularly if it were of the character of that in the Debts Recovery Act—namely, a slump fee in full of all that an agent can ask for his work, from his client as well as from the opposite party—there should be reserved a right to parties to retain agents, and to give them a retaining fee, or for agents to stipulate by written agreement for a reasonable fee. That is allowed in the English County Courts. The provision there is, that the fee allowed shall be in full of all that an attorney can claim, unless he has a written agreement for more; and I think that is a reasonable thing, because if the fee be inadequate, and the agent has more lucrative employment, he declines the case. I believe that mercantile men at this moment are making complaints that, under the Debts Recovery Act, they cannot get professional men to undertake the duty; the reason of which simply is, that a law has been passed by which a professional man is to sell his goods at a statutory price, and is not to be entitled to bargain for more.

3551. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would that not be a dangerous practice in the interest of the client?—They don't seem to find it so in England; and I don't know any practice that could be worse for the client than that he should have a nominal right to the services of a man for a fee so inadequate that no one will undertake the duty.

3552. Mr. Shand.—Supposing a proprietor were in embarrassed circumstances, and that his estate had been very much under the management of a law-agent for many years, would you not, by an enactment of that kind, put such a man entirely within the power of his agent?—I think that would not be desirable, certainly. I am afraid, however, that the principle would reach counsel as well as agents. We are proposing a change, merely because what we think an unreasonable law has been recently enacted, by which an agent is to be entitled to a fixed fee, and to no more, even from his own client, however great his labour. I think the agreement of the parties should be limited in this way, that an agent should not be entitled to stipulate absolutely for a fee, whatever amount of work he should do; but that he should be entitled to agree with his client that the actual amount of labour which he has should be taken into consideration in fixing the fee, or that his fee should be so much, unless it were in excess of his labour.

3553. Is your proposal merely to procure a remedy for an existing evil with reference to the Debts Recovery Act?—Quite so; it is pointed at that.

3554. Then it is not a general measure you propose?—No; we don't care for it as a general measure, unless we are further put under a system of that description. We propose it as a means of getting out of a difficulty. Parliament has said that the fee shall not be more than a certain sum, whatever labour the agent may have; and it has also said that, if he takes an appeal, he shall be bound to conduct the appeal to the end, without getting anything more; so that he has an improper interest to advise his client not to appeal.

3555. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Would it not be better to get that law amended?—Certainly. I think it would be much better to amend that law in some reasonable way.

3556. And you would rather recommend an amendment of it?—Yes; I am merely suggesting that, if it is thought desirable to have a rule of that kind, it is desirable that there should be some mode of getting out of the difficulty.

3557. You mean a mode of defeating the law?—I don't think that is desirable. It would be better to get quit of a bad law, but I am only suggesting this in case the law should not be altered.

3558. The Chairman.—Do you object to the principle of a fixed payment?—I believe the bodies whom I represent have that feeling. My own feeling is not adverse to the principle of a cumulo fee. I drafted the Parliamentary Bill of 1861, which proposed that principle; and I have not any objection to a cumulo fee being fixed for remuneration, if it be not so absolute that a party cannot stipulate for relief in exceptional circumstances.

3559. Mr. Orr Ewing.—Do you think it right that a body of procurators should pass rules preventing members of their body from carrying out an Act of Parliament?—I should think that a very objectionable step.

3560. That has been done?—I have heard it said, but I am not aware of it. I certainly think it would be an objectionable proceeding.

3561. The Chairman.—You think that would be wrong?—I think so. Every man should be left free to act for himself. I think a combination on the subject would be wrong.

3562. There is a power in the Debts Recovery Act to alter the fees?—Yes, that power is given to the Court of Session.

3563. Without the necessity of going to Parliament?—Yes; and I think it would remove the practical difficulty if that power were exercised, for that Act has come nearly to a dead-lock.

3564. In what district?—I believe pretty generally.

3565. Has it become so in your district?—I have never seen a case under that Act, and I have never been asked to conduct one. I don't think there has been one in my county.

3566. What do you mean by saying that the Act has come to a dead-lock?—I mean inoperative.

3567. The Chairman.—If it has been stated to the Commission by Sheriffs resident in extensive districts that it is a valuable Act, and is much worked in their districts, I suppose you would change your opinion?—Certainly I would as to their districts. But the point can be settled by a return of the cases litigated under the Act. I would remind your Lordship that what I have said on this subject cannot arise from any objection to the principle of trying summarily cases of the kind referred to in that Act, because we have come here to-day to recommend that all claims of every class up to £50 should be tried in the most summary way.

3568. Mr. Baxter.—Do you approve of the appeal to the Sheriff under the Debts Recovery Act?—I think it is very objectionable to have an appeal without a hearing.

3569. The Chairman.—If your view were followed out, you would abolish to a great extent the distinction between small debt procedure, and procedure under the Debts Recovery Act, and make all cases of that kind appealable to the Sheriffs?—Up to £50 we are extremely anxious that all classes of debts should be placed on the same footing. It is very objectionable that one particular class of debts should be dealt with differently from others, and it is most objectionable that a man having a £50 account shall have priority over another man who has a £50 bill. There is also a provision in the Debts Recovery Act which seems to me very difficult to work, by which all counter-claims, and all claims in multiplepoindings brought under that Act, shall be of the same nature and value as those contemplated by the Act. Suppose a bankrupt owes me £100 upon a bond, or against whom I have a decree of court, sues me for a £30 open account, am I to be foreclosed from producing my bond or founding on my decree because he has brought his action under the Debts Recovery Act?

3570. But if you would extend the class of cases which might be brought under the Debts Recovery Act, of course the counter-claims would expand in a similar way?—Yes. There is a provision of the Act, that in such a case the Sheriff shall have discretion to send the case to the ordinary court; but as there is no provision giving radical jurisdiction under the Act as to any but its own kind of debts, I don't see how in the ordinary court the Sheriff could take in counter-claims of a different character from those contemplated, or in a competition of creditors how he could take in bill debts as against open accounts, in an action raised under that Act.

3571. Have you anything further to state in regard to civil matters?—No.

3572. Do you think the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended in criminal matters to classes of cases that he does not now try?—I don't think there is any grievance on that subject. Possibly the Sheriff might get the power of pronouncing a sentence of penal servitude; and in some cases that would save a little expense. I don't know that anything more is necessary.

3573. My question was as to the class of cases that he could try?—I don't think any change is necessary in regard to that.

3574. Mr. Baxter.—Would you not make him competent to try robbery?—I don't see any reason for doing so. Robbery is a very serious crime.

3575. Is it not sometimes very near theft?—There is the essential distinction that there is violence.

3576. Mr. Shand.—Is it not sometimes so close as to be undistinguishable?—I can conceive of it being very narrow.

3577. Would it not be very desirable that Crown counsel should have the power of remitting such cases, although they bear the name of robbery, to be tried by the Sheriff?—I don't at all object to that, but I don't see any clamant necessity for it. I don't think it would do much good or harm to give such a discretion.

3578. Mr. Campbell.—You are yourself a Procurator-fiscal?—I am. I have been so for thirty-three years.

3579. Mr. Baxter.—Are not these cases of robbery very often punished by imprisonment?—Yes.

3580. The Chairman.—What is your view as to extending the Sheriff's power of sentencing prisoners?—I think it might be occasionally useful if the Sheriff had power to pronounce a sentence of penal servitude. For example, in a case of petty theft of an article worth half-a-crown, if there were a dozen previous convictions, I don't see why the Sheriff should not have power to pass a sentence of penal servitude.

3581. Mr. Campbell.—Such cases are frequently tried by the Sheriff and a jury now?—Yes.

3582. And if the same cases had been tried before the Circuit Court, they would probably have been punished with penal servitude?—I should think that in cases where there was a large number of previous convictions, it would be so. There is no difficulty in dealing with the cases, and the Sheriff is just as competent to deal with them as with those he actually tries.

3583. The Chairman.—And there is the control of the public prosecutor as to what court they shall be tried in?—Of course.

3584. Mr. Baxter.—Have you considered whether you would give the Sheriff power of amending a criminal libel in such particulars as would not prejudice the interests of the prisoner?—There is a power of that kind in the Summary Procedure Act; but with reference to more solemn proceedings, I doubt very much if such a power should be given.

3585. Mr. Shand.—Suppose a correction as to the locus, which is not material in itself, or suppose the property has been stated as belonging to A, B., while it should have been to A. B. & Co. or the like, the panel having sufficient notice of the general charge, is there any reason why that should not be corrected at a jury trial as well as at a summary trial?—Our criminals are a very ignorant class, and I think a power of that kind might be used to their prejudice.

3586. Do you think it would be abused?—Not on the part of the Crown intentionally; but I think there is a reasonable jealousy for the liberty of poor people of that class, and I would not hastily recommend the introduction of such a change.

3587. Supposing it were left to the discretion of the Sheriff, would that not be sufficient protection?—It is one of the safeguards of the prisoner.

3588. Mr. Campbell.—Don't you think the power of alteration might be extended without danger thus far, that if there be anything superfluous in which there is an error, it should be in the power of the judge to strike out the superfluity?—He has that power already.

3589. Suppose it is stated that an assault was committed at a particular point on the high road, beside a particular church in the parish of A., but that it is really in the parish of B., would you not allow the name of the parish to be struck out?—But then you don't give the poor man fair play. A man of that class generally comes up without agent or counsel.

3590. Mr. Shand.—Would you not be giving him more fair play by making a slight correction of that kind, and sending the case rapidly to trial, in place of sending him to prison for a month till a new indictment is served?—I am not prepared to say that that should be done in cases of a serious character. I see no reason why the Crown should commit blunders in serious cases.

3591. Mr. Baxter.—Are you aware of a case in Fifeshire where a man's own house was described as being in a wrong parish, and the prisoner got off in consequence. Should there not have been power to amend such a mistake as that?—I think the Procurator-fiscal must have been to blame. He ought to have taken care that that blunder did not happen.

3592. The Chairman.—Do you think that the effect of giving such a power might be to lead to laxity in the preparation of the libels?—I have no doubt it might lead officers in my own position to take advantage of that power of amendment, and not to be so careful in the preparation of cases as we ought to be. We have been brought up in a school of severe accuracy, and I think it well that we should remain so.

3593. Mr. Shand.—Where there is to be no prejudice to the prisoner, why should not that power of amendment be allowed?—I think it is not enough, in a matter of this kind, that the prisoner is not to suffer actual prejudice. It is of great importance that people of that class should not suspect anything of that kind. I think if they had it in their power to say that an alteration was made in an indictment while the trial was in progress, it might give rise to a feeling on the part of persons of that class that they were not fairly treated. I don't say that I have any deliberately formed opinion on this subject, because I was not prepared to speak to it. I am merely stating my views on the spur of the moment.

3594. The Chairman.—Do you think that Procurators-fiscal should be prevented from taking any other business?—I can only say, that if that condition had been put to me when I was appointed to the office, I would have very respectfully declined to undertake it.

3595. Do you think there are certain localities where you could not get persons to undertake the office, and relinquish all chance of other business?—Yes, unless the office were made a much more valuable one than it has hitherto been. The best class of men could not be expected to undertake it upon that condition.

3596. And in districts where there is a small amount of business it would be unreasonable to tie up the whole time of a man?—It would be ridiculous in many districts. I presume I may speak without the slightest personal prejudice on the subject, because I have no doubt that if an alteration of that kind were made in my time, I should receive full compensation for the sacrifice. But I think it is very doubtful whether it would be an improvement. I think there is a good deal in this, that a man who is engaged in the active practice of his profession, and coming into daily contact, in business of every description, with his professional brethren, is likely to have a mind better informed and better fitted for the peculiar duties with which a Procurator-fiscal has to deal, because no man can tell what new description of offence may come under his consideration from day to day; and I think it desirable that the Procurator-fiscal should be, if possible, on all subjects quite abreast of the best man in his district.

3597. In large cities, and places of that kind, the time of the Fiscal would probably be so much occupied as to exclude him from taking private business?—That is an exceptional case. In large towns, where the emoluments are of course made correspondingly large, a first-class man will be induced to abandon every other prospect in order to take a position of that description. He has there usually access to the best assistance and advice; but a Procurator-fiscal in the country must be self-reliant in every emergency. At the same time, I must remind your Lordship that originally—indeed, at the time I was myself appointed, and for long after—the appointment was neither more nor less than the employment of an agent to act on behalf of the Crown in criminal cases, being paid according to what he did; and that he was therefore removeable at the mere will of the person who gave him his appointment, and he remains so to this day. Now, I think it perfectly clear that no man in good practice—and that is the class of men likely to be most useful as Procurators-fiscal—is likely to throw up his whole livelihood and chance of getting forward, for the sake of taking an office out of which he may be turned the next day at the mere will of an individual. This question involves a great deal more than the mere question of the Procurator-fiscal not continuing to transact private business. It also involves the tenure of his office, and it involves the necessity for retiring allowances; because, if a Procurator-fiscal is deprived of the privilege which he has always had of taking private business, he must be placed like every other public officer, on the same footing, and have a retiring allowance provided for him.—Then, again, crime is peculiarly intermittent, and when it occurs must be dealt with instantly, and with vigour, under pain of clamant failure. No man can dawdle with it in safety. We have no people less reticent than those who have suffered from crime. They know their right to have proceedings taken promptly at the public expense, and they are not slow to claim the right. The Procurator-fiscal consequently has to keep a staff up to the maximum requirements of his duties. And if he were restricted from other employment, he might in many districts have hard work for a week or a fortnight, alternating with considerable intervals, during which he and his clerks might have absolutely nothing to do. That would be very bad for the office, very bad for the man; it would promote indolent habits in his whole establishment, and would be wastefully expensive for the public.

3598. Mr. Smythe.—Would you recommend that the same reduction should be made in the number of the jury in criminal cases as you have suggested should be done in civil cases?—I am going to propose a reduction of the number of jurors summoned; but I don't think anybody would like to see a change as to the number of jurors empannelled, because it has worked very well, and given great satisfaction to the public. That is one of the grounds of my opinion that the same mode of trial for civil cases would be very popular in Scotland, if it got a fair trial. But it is the practice, even where only a single case is to be tried, to summon forty-five jurymen. At many periods of the year that is a grievous hardship; to take 45 farmers away from their harvests, while only 15 are required, seems quite unnecessary. I therefore think that the number summoned might very well be reduced. Whether it could be reduced to a very small number more than the 15 who must be empannelled, would depend on whether it was thought safe to limit the time at which a panel or the Crown can make peremptory challenges. If the panel or the Crown were required to exhaust all their peremptory challenges, except one or two, at the first diet for pleading in a criminal cause, before the jury were summoned, you would not require to summon for the trial more than probably 20 or 25; but if you are to retain till the day of trial the right both of the Crown and the criminal to state peremptory challenges to any persons they please, without cause assigned, then of course you must have a larger number in attendance to provide for that.

3599. Then your suggestion is, that they should be required to state their peremptory challenges at the first diet?—I would require the Crown absolutely to do that. The Crown rarely exercises the right of peremptory challenge in a jury trial; and I think the panel might be required to exhaust them all but one or two.

3600. Mr. Baxter.—When you serve the libel, do you serve a list of the entire jury?—Yes, according to the present practice.

3601. The Chairman.—The challenges being taken, the number might be reduced to thirty?—You would avoid summoning those who were challenged.

3602. Would you avoid anything more?—Yes; you would then no longer be under the necessity of bringing up men to provide for the chance of the exercise of the peremptory challenge. You would require only to provide the fifteen men who are to go into the box, and such a number as might fairly be supposed would be challenged on good cause shown; and you would be able certainly to reduce the number to 25 with perfect safety; that is, if the Sheriff-clerk had his jury list in a proper state. If it was full of dead men, that would not do.

3603. That might answer very well if there was only one trial; but supposing there were two trials for the day, and the first jury retire, and having a difficulty in the case, are enclosed for a length of time, would you not require the number of jurors to make up a second panel?—That is not the case for which I sought to provide. The case of hardship which is most felt is where a single trial only is to take place. I remember not very long ago, a representation being addressed by a jury to the Lord Advocate on the extreme hardship of their having been summoned to the number of forty-five to try one case.

3604. Then you would apply your remedy only where there was one case to try?—I think that is the only case in which you can with perfect safety do it.

3605. Mr Smythe.—Would you still retain the number of jurors at fifteen?—It may be prejudice—I daresay it is—but I would not like to see the number of the jury in criminal cases changed. It has worked remarkably well.

3606. Mr. Baxter.—Does it not frequently happen that, though there are a number of cases at the first diet, they all plead guilty except one?—That happens very often.

3607. The Chairman.—Have you anything more to suggest on this subject?—Under the present system, a prisoner, when he petitions for bail, has to pay a fee, considerable in his circumstances, to the Sheriff-clerk for the use of the Crown, upon his petition and upon his bond of caution. I submit that that fee should be abolished. I think it is a great hardship on a prisoner lying in prison that he should be under the necessity of making such a payment, which is to pass into the exchequer. And I would submit that the same principle ought to be applied to poor prisoners applying for aliment under the Act of Grace.

3608. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that the law of bail is on a proper footing just now?—I think the whole rules as to bail might be very well reconsidered.

3609. Do you think it would be an improvement to leave both the amount of the bail and the question as to whether bail should be granted or not, to the discretion of the bailing magistrate?—There are cases besides those that are capital, in which I think it would be well that the consent of the Crown should be given before bail was taken.

3610. Such as fraudulent bankruptcy?—I think that is a fair case for bail.

3611. Reset of theft to a large amount?—If it was to a very large amount, I think the consent of the Lord Advocate should be required. I think the whole subject might very well be considered.—There is another matter to which I would ask attention, and that is the necessity for a prisoner incurring the expense of running his letters if he wishes to obtain the benefit of our Scotch habeas corpus. I think something should be done on that subject—either to simplify the process very much, and reduce the cost of it, or possibly (and I don't see much objection to this) that a prisoner should have the right without application,—that his letters, or something equivalent to his letters, should run from the day he is committed for trial. Considering the rapidity of communication all over the country now, I think there would be no great danger if that were conceded.

3612. The Chairman.—Would you not require the party to give some sort of notice, simple and cheap?—That might be done by a simple notice transmitted to the Procurator-fiscal or to the Lord Advocate. I think that would be a good enough way to do it; but I don't see much objection to allowing the statutory time to run ipso facto from the day on which the man is committed for trial. Of course the prosecutor knows it. But a very inexpensive mode of doing it would be by causing the governor of the prison to deliver a letter to the Procurator-fiscal, or to transmit it by post to the Lord Advocate. Either of these would be a great relief to prisoners. If a notification of that description were adopted, notice would require to be preserved of the date at which it was given.

3613. That could be done in the jail books?—Yes, or by the certificate of an officer.

3614. Mr. Smythe.—What is the expense of running letters?—It used to be from £4 to £5.

3615. Mr. Gordon.—It consists chiefly of fees to the Sheriff-clerk?—It may be done by petition to the Sheriff. In the greater number of cases it is done by application to Edinburgh. In pleas of the Crown it must be in Edinburgh.

3616. Are you aware that the fees are passed from with regard to the poorer class of prisoners?—I am not aware; but I know that practically they prevent the thing from being done in the great majority of cases. I have not seen an instance of letters being run for many years, and I attribute that to nothing else than the cost being such that the prisoners cannot pay it.

3617. Mr. Smythe.—They have to employ an agent to do it?—Yes; but I don't see the least necessity for that.

3618. Mr. Gordon.—The effect of such a power being readily available to a prisoner, would be that almost every prisoner would force his trial to be brought on in Edinburgh?—Yes.

3619. And that would involve the expense of taking witnesses from remote districts to Edinburgh?—With the facilities of communication that we now have, I think it better that that expense should be incurred, than that prisoners should be kept in prison untried for five or six months.

3620. But that would involve a considerable addition to the cost of trial to the public?—In some cases it might.

3621. Would it in most cases add considerably to the costs?—Unless the Lord Advocate should think fit to let the case be tried in the local court.

3622. That could only be done in a case which could be competently tried before the Sheriff?—Precisely. But in a very grave case the element of expense is not so important,—a case of murder, for example.

3623. I suppose you are aware that, according to our Scottish system, the number of acquittals is very small indeed in proportion to the number of convictions?—On that subject I happen to have written a letter to a friend stating my views of it, which will show as briefly as I can state it how the matter stands.

3624. What is the date of it?—June last. It was written with the view of being used before a committee on which your Lordship sat in London. In that letter I said, 'In England the number of acquittals in proportion to prosecutions is more than double what it is in Scotland; and the excess indicates that either an undue number of guilty persons escape, or that an undue number of innocent persons are put unnecessarily to trial, for want of a public prosecutor.' I made that calculation from the returns of 1866 or 1867.

3625. I suppose your experience is, that the few prisoners who escape with verdicts of acquittal, escape from defects of proof rather than from their not being guilty?—I think our system affords most valuable protections to the innocent. A man must be first of all shown to be guilty by reasonable evidence to the satisfaction of the Procurator-fiscal; the Procurator-fiscal must satisfy the Sheriff or committing magistrate that there is sufficient evidence to afford a reasonable probability of conviction. The case must then be considered by the Crown counsel, and they must be satisfied also that there is strong probability of a conviction upon that evidence, otherwise the case will not be ordered for trial; and finally we have the trial itself.

3626. When a man is detained in prison for a couple of months, I suppose that is generally taken into account in awarding punishment; is it not?—No doubt it is; but that is no relief to the man who is found not to have been guilty.

3627. Mr. Smythe.—Where a man is guilty, he is not so apt to be desirous of forcing on his trial?—Unless he sees that he may as well have his punishment at once. I should think that, unless it were a capital case, he would be extremely anxious to get himself tried. When the sentence is pronounced, they seldom get full compensation for the time they have been in prison. If they get a sentence of penal servitude, it is impossible that it can be adequately taken into account.

3628. The Chairman.—Do you find any difficulty in working with the police?—I find it extremely simple. The police execute the instructions they get with great punctuality and attention. I have always regarded the police, and I believe in my county they regard themselves, as executive officers, and that I, as Procurator-fiscal representing the Lord Advocate, am the proper party to direct them in getting up evidence, and in all the proceedings to be taken in criminal matters. That has been acted upon on both sides, and has worked very well.

3629. Mr. Smythe.—Is there any delay in the reports by the Chief Constable to you?—All reports come to me immediately. I cannot say that there are no instances of delay, because inferior officers sometimes do make delays, but that is not systematic; on the contrary, I have every reason to be satisfied.

3630. Supposing a crime takes place in a distant part of the county, does the officer there report immediately to you, or does his report first go to the Superintendent of Police?—It goes to the Superintendent of Police, and then comes to me, unless it be a case of magnitude, and in such a case the officer in the district has instructions to communicate with me immediately. If the rule were established that every report must pass through the hands of the Chief Constable before coming to me, the system would be totally unworkable, because the Chief Constable lives at a distance of twenty-seven miles from my office.

3631. Have you an Inspector where you reside?—I have a Superintendent.

3632. Mr. Gordon.—Are serious cases reported first to the Superintendent?—The instructions are, in very serious cases, such as fire-raising or suspicion of murder, or any crime of that class, to report to me, and also to the Superintendent. I have had no reason to complain of any delay, and certainly nothing like collision or difficulty. There has been no attempt on the part of the police either to refuse to obey the instructions I had to give them, or to work with unnecessary friction. Everything has gone on pleasantly.

3633. Mr. Smythe.—A subordinate officer might make a mistake in not reporting to you a case which he should have reported to you?—In that case it would come to me immediately from the Superintendent.

3634. The Chairman.—The Sheriff is the superior authority in reference to the police of the county, is he not?—I take it to be so, and I think he ought to remain so, being the highest judicial officer in the county. When he is present, his order must necessarily supersede every other; if he were not present, and another magistrate were present, then, in case of riot, the order of the magistrate on the spot would be obeyed. But if the Sheriff were present, I have no doubt the duty of the police would be to attend to his instructions, and I think it desirable that it should remain so.

3635. Mr. Smythe.—You think the control and disposition of the force ought to be with the Sheriff?—I don't say exactly the disposition of the force. I mean the duty to be done and the general order to be given; but I think, in distributing the force, the Chief Constable must to some extent exercise a judgment. He gets his order to accomplish a certain duty, and should be left as to the details very much to his own judgment.

3636. The Chairman.—If the Sheriff desires certain assistance to be given to you in the investigation of crime, you consider it the duty of the police to fulfil that?—Yes; and the Sheriff in my county made a general order upon the police to attend to all instructions which they should receive from the Procurator-fiscal. There is a defect in the Police Act. The Police Act of Scotland appears to have been copied very much from the Police Act of England, and to have been prepared without attention to the difference between a country where there is a public prosecutor, and a country where there is none. But that has been the mode in which it has practically worked. Where there is a public prosecutor, his functions require that he should direct the executive in his department.

3637. Under that authority of the Sheriff, though he is not there at the time, you are his representative, and may demand that your instructions shall be fulfilled?—I would give to the highest officer of police who was there the instructions which I thought necessary.

3638. And you find no clashing between you and the police in the investigation of crime?—I have found my instructions faithfully attended to in general.

3639. Have you anything further to state?—There is a very small matter which I would like to mention. It is small in amount, but it is an important matter to the poorer class of litigants. The fee on a small debt summons is 2s., actually higher than the fee upon an ordinary summons of the largest amount. That is a very unfair thing for poor people. A servant seeking to raise a small debt summons has to pay a higher fee than a person bringing an action for £1000 into court.

3640. Would you raise the fee on the ordinary summons?—No; it is the clerk's fee I speak of. I think the fee on the small debt summons ought to be very much reduced.

3641. You think that fee is too large?—Yes: these fees are now received by the Sheriff-clerks, and accounted for to the Crown.

3642. You say that if the smaller fee is enough for the great case, a still smaller fee would be enough for the small case?—Precisely.

3643. Mr. Orr Ewing.—What is your opinion as to the Justice of Peace Courts?—I do not practise in the Justice of Peace Courts.

3644. Would you take away the licensing power of the Justices of the Peace?—I think it would be a great improvement if the Justice of Peace Courts did not exercise a jurisdiction in cases of poaching. I think it would be well that that should pass into the hands of a paid officer. With reference to licensing, I don't see where you are to put a discretion of that character, unless you put it into the hands of the Justices of the Peace. It is not a judicial function at all. If there is to be a discretionary selection of houses for licence, I don't see where you can leave the power better than in the hands of the Justices.

3645. Mr. Baxter.—Would you give them the power of reviewing the magistrates?—That I think is much more objectionable. I think the magistrates of a town ought to be the judges in that matter. They are elective, and they are best acquainted with what passes in the town, and everything that affects the question; and I do think it an objection that country magistrates should be entitled to overturn the judgments of town magistrates in questions of that description.

3646. Mr. Orr Ewing.—What would you suggest instead of the review of the magistrates?—I don't know that there should be a review.

3647. Mr. Smythe.—Are you referring to the Quarter Sessions?—The question put to me, as I understood, was as to the review by country Justices of a judgment of burgh magistrates.

3648. Mr. Baxter.—I meant the Quarter Sessions?—The Quarter Sessions is a court composed, with very few exceptions, of Justices of the Peace not immediately connected with the burgh. The magistrates have a seat, but of course they are in a miserable minority. The town magistrates going to a court of that kind cannot be on a par in point of numbers with the whole Justices of the county, and therefore they are practically overruled.

3649. Mr. Smythe.—But where you have Petty Sessions, the Quarter Sessions overrule them?—The Quarter Sessions are a body of Justices of the same class, and with the same knowledge of country districts that the original magistrates have; but when country Justices come in and upset the acts of town magistrates, they overturn the acts of the supreme authority of the town, and I think that somewhat objectionable.

3650. My experience has been that the town Justices have sometimes upset the decisions of the county Justices?—I think that is equally objectionable. I think the town magistrates, being appointed by their fellow-citizens from their special interest in and knowledge of their own town, ought to be entitled to exercise their discretion within their own limits; but on the other hand, I think they ought to be confined to their own limits.

3651. Would you have no court of appeal?—I don't see the absolute necessity for a court of appeal. The only reason for a court of appeal is, that you cannot have the whole Justices of a county assembled in the first instance; but you have the whole magistrates in the town assembled, and a majority of them may fairly rule. If the first meeting was a meeting of all the magistrates of the county, I don't see why there should be an appeal.

3652. The Chairman.—Would your view apply equally to all towns? Take such a place as Inverkeithing. Would you allow the magistrates' decisions to be conclusive there?—I must apologize for speaking on this subject, because I had not the slightest idea that such a question would be put, and therefore I had not considered these details.

3653. Mr. Smythe.—Is it not difficult to speak of districts and towns, because there are large villages and towns in the west country as to which the magistrates in the district, knowing more of the circumstances, may be better qualified to decide than local parties?—I don't think there should be much difficulty in distinguishing between town magistrates, who are elected by their fellow-citizens, and country magistrates, who hold their offices on a different tenure. I think the character of the office makes the distinction. But all I have said on this subject is the thought of the moment.

3654. The Chairman.—What is your opinion as to the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace in small debt actions?—I am rather favourable to its remaining. I think the Act as to the Justice of Peace jurisdiction should be carefully reconsidered. It is a very old statute now, I suppose forty years old, and there are many of its provisions which require amendment; but I am not sure that in cases up to £5 there is not some advantage in enabling people to go before a court of common sense rather than a court of law; and though they don't uniformly get common sense from the Justices, still that is the principle on which they try to go.

3655. The Chairman.—Do you consider it an advantage that country gentlemen should be induced to take an interest in such matters?—I think it is useful for themselves. I think also there are a great many cases of that amount which are better settled upon plain common-sense principles, such as an ordinary man unlearned in the law would apply to them, than by bringing in the technical rules of law for their decision. I think up to £5 there is a good deal in that view.

3656. Country Justices have probably some influence personally in inducing parties in their district to settle their claims?—That influence they could exercise without sitting as magistrates.

3657. If the parties came to them?—Yes. I am afraid, when they get into court, it seldom ends in an amicable arrangement. But if that jurisdiction were taken away from the Justices, I don't know what Justices would remain for. Their duties would then be limited to granting occasionally a criminal warrant, and to sitting upon questions of licence. I don't think it is a jurisdiction that I would be prepared to abolish, but I certainly would not extend it. I think a revisal of the Act would be productive of considerable advantage.

3658. Do you think that it is expedient to continue the jurisdiction of Burgh Courts in civil matters?—It is very little used in civil matters; in my experience, very little indeed.

3659. Then the abolition of it would not be attended with inconvenience to the community?—I don't think so.

3660. Mr. Baxter.—They have very cumbrous forms of process?—For sums of 40s. they have a quick enough process.

3661. But I mean the ordinary court?—It is practically out of use for that purpose, so far as my experience goes, and I have seen very few of the 40s. cases even.

3662. The Chairman.—Do cases of removing come before them?—I don't think these cases are well disposed of in that court. It becomes the court of an irresponsible officer, and I don't think it desirable that that should continue; but I think the police jurisdiction of the magistrates ought to remain. It is a useful jurisdiction in petty crimes.

3663. That is, under their police authority?—Yes.

3664. Are there any burghs of barony in your district?—There are several burghs of barony, but I never knew a court held in them.

3665. Any burghs of regality?—There is no burgh of regality in my neighbourhood.

3666. Do you see any practical advantage in continuing the jurisdiction of baron bailies?—I think it is a most objectionable kind of jurisdiction.

3667. They decide, if they decide at all, between the landlord, who appointed them, and his tenants; do they?—I think it is a very wrong thing that a landlord should appoint a man to pronounce judgment in his own favour, but it really does not practically exist in our part of the country.

3668. Have you anything further to suggest?—No; but I was instructed to say, on behalf of the General Council, that as they understood the inquiry at its present stage to be with regard to the Sheriff Courts, they trust that, at a later stage of the inquiry, when the Supreme Court comes under consideration, they may be allowed an opportunity of submitting anything they have to say on that subject; and also, that as we understand the Commission has agreed that the evidence should be from time to time made public, if we should find in the evidence anything which we can explain or make clearer, we may have an opportunity of doing so.

TUESDAY, 29TH DECEMBER 1868.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.	A. B. SHAND, Esq.

GEO. HARRISON, Esq.	J. B. BAXTER, Esq.
JAMES CAMPBELL, Esq.	ADAM PATERSON, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

John William Thomson.

JOHN WILLIAM THOMSON, Esq., examined.

3669. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner in the Sheriff Court of Forfarshire at Dundee?—I am.

3670. How long have you been so?—For about thirty-six years.

3671. Do you hold any official appointments?—I hold the office of an Honorary Sheriff-substitute for Forfarshire; and I am also Vice-Preses of our Faculty, of which Mr. Baxter is President.

3672. As Honorary Sheriff-substitute, do you make formal orders and grant warrants, if necessary, during the absence of the Sheriff-substitute?—Yes, during his necessary absence.

3673. You do not in that capacity advise causes and decide them?—No, except with regard to the appointment of trustees in sequestrations; and I have also decided in cases as to service of heirs in his necessary absence, but not often.

3674. Mr. Baxter.—You do not decide ordinary causes?—No.

3675. The Chairman.—Have you anything to suggest to the Commission as to the constitution of the Sheriff Courts, as consisting of a Sheriff and his substitutes?—It occurs to me that our present system of Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute is one that ought not to be done away with. There may be improvement with regard to the mode of appeal from the Sheriff-substitute; but I think, from what I have seen in practice, and from what I have heard from my brethren in the profession, that it is most desirable that we should have a court of appeal within our own jurisdiction. It has been found to be a ready mode of obtaining an appeal; and, generally speaking, it has been a very satisfactory one both to the profession and to the public. We find that the Sheriff, while he has of course all the qualifications of, and we perhaps would hope more than, the substitute, has also in oral hearing the same advantage that the Sheriff-substitute has had in hearing the statements of parties. He has also the advantage of the Sheriff-substitute's views; and we find, generally speaking, that the judgment we get from the Sheriff-principal is very satisfactory in most cases—indeed, in the majority of cases; for there are a great many cases that are never thought of being taken beyond the appeal of the Sheriff-principal. It has occurred to us that there might probably be some arrangement made so as to discourage vexatious appeals to the Sheriff, by allowing him or enjoining him to dispose of the matter of expense of the appeal when he disposes of the appeal itself. It is the practice just now to allow that to go as a part of the general expense of the process; but in my view there might be a proper check upon useless appeals if the Sheriff were, when disposing of them, to lay upon the unsuccessful appellant such small amount of expenses as might serve the purpose in view. With regard to the different positions of Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff-principal, it occurs to me that it would be a good thing to lay upon the Sheriff-substitute all the ministerial duties of the office, so as to make the appellate Sheriff or Sheriffs—as that may be resolved upon—more completely devoted to their duties as judges of appeal. That has also occurred to us.

3677. I do not speak so much of the name; but if you charge him with all the ministerial duties, and make him the necessary judge in the first instance in all causes brought into the Sheriff Court, would you not restrict the functions of the Sheriff to those of a judge of appeal, and would you not then change altogether the character of the office of Sheriff-substitute as it exists in the theory of the law at present?—In very few particulars would there be a change, because just now almost all the ministerial duties are performed by the Sheriff-substitute. In fact, with the exception of only a few of what you may call formal duties, he does all.

3678. But does he not do them for the Sheriff, and in respect of the absence of the Sheriff?—Of course the Sheriff, were he present, might do these duties, and he does them occasionally. Our Sheriff-principal sometimes hears cases in person which the Sheriff-substitute might take up in his absence, and does take up in his absence generally. I understand he sometimes tries cases summarily in the criminal court; but I do not attend it. He also in other matters does the duty which is usually performed by the Sheriff-substitute, but at present the main duties of the office of Sheriff are performed by the Sheriff-substitute.

3679. The Chairman.—Would you state further what views you have to submit on the matter you had begun to explain?—It has also occurred to me that it would be very desirable to extend the limit of the finality of the judgments of the Sheriff—that is to say, that the Sheriff's judgment should in the ordinary case be final up to £100. It is so up to £25 just now; but the expense of appeal is so disproportionate to small sums, that I think the ends of justice would be served by extending the limit of finality to £100. Perhaps it might be useful were that extension to take place with, say in cases above £50, a power to the Sheriff to certify to the Supreme Court any case of difficulty, as I understand is done in the Justiciary Courts sometimes. With such an exception, say in cases above £50, I think that with all safety the Sheriff's judgment in cases up to £100 might be final. It has also occurred to myself that it might be desirable to allow the Sheriff's jurisdiction to be extended to the case of defenders living in different counties—at all events within that limit which I have taken the liberty of mentioning; that where there are several defenders living in different counties, they might be taken in any one county, with the usual powers of calling the others, and also with power to any of the defenders to represent to the court any special circumstances which would make it specially injurious to any of them to have the case tried in that jurisdiction, and then with power to the Sheriff to remit to another Sheriffdom where that objection would not apply. We think it a hardship in some cases that we are obliged to go to the Court of Session in small cases, from the simple circumstance that the defenders live in different jurisdictions.

3680. Mr. Campbell.—Would you also be disposed to allow a foreigner, whose funds had been arrested for the purpose of founding jurisdiction, to be sued in the Sheriff Court where the jurisdiction had been founded?

—I would decidedly say so. I think it would be a very great improvement indeed.

3681. Mr. Baxter.—Did you ever know any case of hardship arising from being obliged to sue a foreigner in the Court of Session?—I know an instance of very great hardship in a case where a client of mine was sued. It was a very striking case indeed.

3682. What were the circumstances?—An English vessel belonging to Sunderland came to Dundee, and the master had on board of her a small quantity of dunnage wood, which he had had from a West India voyage. A person who had been his mate, but who had been discharged as mate before the proper officer, took it upon him to sell, or it was said he had sold, this small quantity of dunnage wood, which was said to be of the value of £17 altogether. The master did not approve of the sale, and refused to implement it. The party who said he had made this trifling purchase took the step you have referred to. He applied for and got a warrant to arrest, to found a jurisdiction. This was passed de plano by the Sheriff, and he then raised an action. The warrant of arrestment was taken out against the owners of the ship, who were English people belonging to Sunderland. Under this warrant the ship was arrested; and then this individual, upon a statement that the vessel was about to leave the port, got a warrant to dismantle her, and they set to work and stripped the sails off the ship, and took them ashore. When matters had got this length, I was applied to, to see what was to be done. The first thing was to get the arrestment removed, and the sails restored to the ship; and we obtained authority to have this done upon consigning the £17 which was said to be the value of the wood in dispute, and £10 as contemplated damages for the alleged breach of bargain, or £27 in all. We consigned that sum, and so got the first arrestment loosed. The vessel was then got to sea immediately, for the purpose of avoiding the second arrestment, which was in prospect on the dependence. The pursuer pressed the matter, and carried it into the Court of Session, for the £17 as the value of the wood, and £10 of damages, which raised the amount to what I suppose he thought necessary to allow him to get into the Court of Session. Of course he was obliged by the forms of process to go to the Court of Session, seeing he was seeking a remedy from English people, that is, from foreigners. When the summons was served, the English shipowners were very indignant, and did not suppose it was possible that any court would recognise proceedings of that kind for so simple an object, and they insisted upon defending the case. The action went on; it was tried before a Lord Ordinary without a jury, and the result was a judgment against the owners, upon the ground that the master had sanctioned the sale. Judgment went out for the £27, with £120 of taxed expenses. If that case could have been brought before the Sheriff, we would have got quit of it much more summarily, and with much less expense. There is another matter which I wish to mention with regard to Sheriff Court practice and jurisdiction. We think that a domicile might be allowed at the place of business of a defender as well as at his dwelling-place. I would of course make the exception that that place of business must be the defender's own place of business, and not his employer's, because mistakes might otherwise take place; but we think it would be desirable for both parties, both pursuer and defender in many cases, that the domicile of the place of business should be added to the domicile of the place of residence. In Dundee, for example, we are on the verge of two counties besides our own. We have the county of Fife directly opposite, about two or two and a half miles from us,—at some places only about a mile; and we have also the county of Perth about four miles from us. In Fife, more especially, there are a number of our respectable Dundee merchants and others who have their places of business in Dundee, and reside in Fife. Now, it has been felt to be very inconvenient, both for pursuer and defender in a case of that kind, that they are obliged, when they reside in Fife, to go to Cupar instead of the case being tried in the town where they themselves are daily present for business, where their business connections are, and where the witnesses are generally found. I think, therefore, that no harm could ensue from such an alteration as to domicile, with this qualification, of course, that it should be the defender's own place of business. It would not do, if he were a servant, to serve a citation on him at his master's place of business; in that case, they would require to serve it at his dwelling-place.

3683. Mr. Baxter.—Would you protest bills at the place of business also?—I would. I would hold that to be the domicile; and now you have mentioned that, I may also state that, from the extension of banking transactions, I have found it myself on various occasions, and I have no doubt that men of business have often found it also, that there arises a difficulty where there are different places at which the business of one bank is carried on in the same town, and parties at a distance are not aware of that, but make bills payable simply at this bank by name—for example, at the Bank of Scotland of Edinburgh—which has branches in different parts of a town. That raises a matter of difficulty and doubt as to where you have to protest. That is also a matter—the domicile of a bill—which should be fixed in some way or other. Probably presentment at one of these branches should be sufficient to meet the requirements of the law.

3684. The Chairman.—Have you been perplexed by that difficulty?—I have, several times.

3685. I am taking it in the case of Edinburgh, as you put it. Would you not think it a very simple thing to go to the head office?—We trust nothing in the case of a simple diligence that we can help. It is a dangerous instrument, and therefore in these cases I invariably send round to every branch office.

3686. Even though the head office is in your town?—No. We have no head office in Dundee now.

3687. But the case you put was the case of the Bank of Scotland, Edinburgh, which has its head office here. Would you be perplexed in that case?—No. Undoubtedly in that case you would be safe enough at the head office; but it is very different with us, where the large establishments have taken up our native ones. We have only branches of them all.

3688. Mr. Baxter.—Would you not think it a convenient thing if you could protest a bill at a party's place of business as a domicile?—I think it certainly would.

3689. Would that get rid of a good deal of trouble and expense?—It would.

3691. But what I mean is this: Where parties make a bill, do they not have it in their power to arrange and insert in the bill the place of payment? Suppose they elect the Royal Bank of Scotland, which means at Edinburgh, as the place of payment, and that the acceptor has money there to meet the bill when it is presented, could that bill be presented with justice anywhere else than in Edinburgh?—Certainly not. If they simply say 'the Royal Bank of Scotland,' that must mean the head office in Edinburgh; but if they simply say 'the Royal Bank in Dundee,' which I have frequently seen, then the difficulty I have stated arises.

3692. The Chairman.—What would be your remedy in that case?—Presentment at any one of these branches, because I say that if a party will accept a bill payable in that loose general way, he must take his chance of the consequences.

3693. You say that in that case presentation at any one of them will be sufficient, because he has not been specific?—Yes; and the reason is this,—A notary may not know the opening of any of these branches. It may be done in a day without notice, and there is no special notice required, so that the negotiation may fail.

3694. Mr. Baxter.—Is not the difficulty always greater where there is no domicile in the bill—where it is not payable anywhere?—That is a very difficult thing to reach.

3695. In such a case, don't you think the domicile might be held to be the place of business of the party?—I think so, if it could be got.

3696. Where there is a domicile, there is not so much difficulty?—No.

3697. Mr. Paterson.—Then all you point to is, that in a place like Dundee, where there are several branches, presentation at any one of them should be sufficient?—Yes.

3698. The Chairman.—You mean, that when it is 'the Bank of Scotland, Dundee,' without saying which branch, any branch will do?—Yes. Then, as a sort of corollary, so to speak, from my suggestion as to the finality of the Sheriff Court jurisdiction being extended to about £100, the Court of Session should not be the court in the first instance in which to bring actions within the £100; or if brought there, inferior court expenses only should be allowed.

3699. Mr. Baxter.—Unless, I suppose, the court should be satisfied that there was something peculiar in the case that made it fitting to bring it there?—There could be no harm in that, and I think it might be fair. I think there should be in all cases power to remit. It is a great pity that, if an action is for a proper object, it should be thrown out, and cannot be saved by simply remitting it to the proper jurisdiction. It might serve the purpose to allow either party to move that the case should be remitted, and then the question would arise whether there was any cause why it should not be considered where it was; and if it be remitted—unless the court see fit to order otherwise—the inferior court expenses should be allowed to the successful party. Then it has occurred to me as well as to others, that the system of short records might be extended not only in the inferior courts, but also in the Supreme Court. It is thought that it might be possible so to simplify the procedure as to do away with the necessity for lengthy records which we still—I do not say frequently, but which we still—do find in use. We think that probably the substance of the action might be put into a much shorter space than it is at present; in short, that the principle of our last improvement in Sheriff Court practice, of a short minute of defence, might be extended to other cases with beneficial effects. It has been thought to be possible to bring parties into court by a mere writ, stating what might be the pursuer's conclusions, and what he would expect to get judgment for if they were not opposed. We think the minute of defence which we have, when it is properly made, is such a statement as could embrace the defender's statement and pleas; and that there should be not only permission, but an injunction upon the pursuer, to give in a brief reply. The defender is left at a disadvantage when he has only the present very unsatisfactory statement in the summons, while he is bound to state his grounds of defence. We think he is entitled to the advantage of seeing what the pursuer's statement is, however brief, and the grounds on which he is to put his action; and if that could be carried out by proper forms, we think that the writ and short minute of defence with its pleas, and the short reply with its pleas, might form the record. It also appears to me that there would be a great advantage in consolidating our forms of process. We have got too many now. I reckon we have five different kinds of process. We have the small debt jurisdiction under the original Small Debt Sheriff Court Act, 1 & 2 Vict., up to £8, 6s. 8d. We have the extension of that jurisdiction to £12 under our Sheriff Court Act, 16 & 17 Vict., with an additional privilege to a defender, if imprisonment takes place, that he can appeal, but not till imprisonment takes place; that is another form. We have then the Debts Recovery Act up to £50. We have the ordinary court procedure of ordinary actions and summary actions.

3700. The Chairman.—These two are not identical?—No; they are not identical.

3701. Mr. Baxter.—Then there is the Commissary Court?—Yes; there is the Commissary Court also. Now if we could get a summary jurisdiction up to £50, such as the Debts Recovery Act contemplated in a limited sense, we might include in it all the smaller actions of £8, 6s. 8d. and £12. My feeling would be to repeal that Debts Recovery Act altogether, because if it is a good thing it ought to be extended; but we do not find that it works well in practice. I do not speak so much for myself, because I have not gone into that court. I have had only one case in it, a case in absence.

3702. Would you extend the Sheriff small debt form of process to £50? Is that what you mean?—I think we might have just the same sort of writ now provided in the Debts Recovery Act to apply to all cases of £50 and under. There is a dubiety as to the cases to which that Act applies, which you would get quit of in that way; and it seems to be a somewhat absurd thing, that the remedy, if it is a remedy, should be confined to a very limited class of cases: that if an account stands open, you may have this summary remedy; but if you put it into the shape of a bill, you lose your remedy.

3703. The Chairman.—You lose the remedy of that particular Act?—Yes.

3704. Mr. Baxter.—And you lose the remedy of pleading compensatory claims if vouched by bill?—Quite so. I think, therefore, that a consolidating Act would be a very useful thing, consolidating our different procedures under the Acts of Sederunt which have been made with regard to each, and applying to the tables of fees also, which are very perplexing and multiplied. For example, we have fees applicable to the first two classes of cases, where no agent's fees are allowed at all, that is, the £8, 6s. 8d. and the £12 cases. There is one set of fees for them. Then you have another set of fees with regard to the Debts Recovery Act, which are utterly unremunerative; and then you have still another set of fees applicable to ordinary and summary causes in the ordinary court; and also another set of fees applicable to the Commissary Courts. Now I think it is very desirable that some general rule should be adopted so as to simplify these diversities.

3705. The Chairman.—Do you mean by that, that the fees in all classes of cases should be assimilated?—Yes, made something in proportion to the work required. I think the agent should be paid for his labours—certainly not overpaid; but he should be paid, and according also in some measure to the scale of the causes to which his labours are directed. I think also that some expense might be saved in the ordinary court, where decreet in absence passes, in consequence of no appearance by the defender. I see nothing to prevent the clerk of court issuing an extract of the decreet at once, without the necessity of going to the court at all. I see no necessity either for a pursuer in that case going before an auditor, putting in an account of expenses, and getting it taxed, because up to that stage there is no difficulty in fixing what the expense ought to be, where there is no appearance and merely a summons. I think the clerk of court might be authorized to issue an extract where there is no appearance for the defender, and insert in that extract the fees which he knows to be right. I think that would save some unnecessary expense.

3706. Mr. Shand.—Would that not imply the clerk of court granting a decree of some kind in the first instance?—There must be a decree of some kind for an extract. In the Small Debt Courts there is nothing but that.

3707. There the Sheriff signs the book and grants the decree?—Yes.

3708. But in some shape you must have a decree before you can have an extract of it?—You might have it declared in your statute that no appearance should operate as a decree in favour of the pursuer.

3709. Mr. Baxter.—Then in the vacation time the clerk could give out a decree also?—Yes.

3710. Mr. Shand.—That purpose would be served by allowing the clerk to write a formal decree, and to sign it in place of the Sheriff?—Yes.

3711. Do you think there is really any loss of time by the Sheriff signing these decrees in absence?—You would get your decrees in vacation.

3712. Mr. Baxter.—Does it not cause an additional expense?—There is the giving in of the account, the taxing of the account, and the judgment for expenses. You would save all that.

3713. Mr. Shand.—Do you think the agent should get no fee for the step you would have in lieu of all this?—We have one fee up to decreet, where there is one in absence now.

3714. Do you think the agent's fee for that step should be diminished from what it is now?—I am not disposed to say that, because he has all the responsibility of the summons. It may be a defended cause, for anything he knows. I think the fee at the beginning should probably remain as it is.

3715. But that the trouble should not exist?—There would be the same trouble to begin with.

3716. Mr. Baxter.—But the expense would be diminished?—It would be diminished, of course, by the cost of all these steps—the preparing of an account, the lodging of an account, the fees of lodging, and the judgment conform. You have the enrolling to get decreet for your taxed account, and a fee for attending to get decreet.

3717. And for getting the auditor's account approved of?—Yes, and the expense of auditing. It would save you the cost of a number of little steps.

3718. Mr. Paterson.—Is the practice of having the auditor to tax fees in absence invariably observed in Forfarshire?—Yes.

3719. Have you reason to know whether it is so in other counties?—I am not aware.

3720. Mr. Shand.—Is it not the case that in some other counties the Sheriff-clerk just fills in the sum?—I am not aware.

3721. The Chairman.—What is the purpose of remitting to the auditor in these decrees in absence?—There is not, properly speaking, a remit. You put in your account. The purpose of remitting is, of course, to tax the account.

3722. What is the use of doing so?—I do not see any use for it.

3723. Is there a fee for taxation?—Yes, both to the auditor and to the agent.

3724. If there is a necessity for a check, you say that the clerk would be a sufficient check on the charge made?—Yes, I think so.

3725. If it is an expense to be paid by the defender, you think the clerk is a sufficient protection for the defender, because the matter is so simple and so clear upon the table?—That is my opinion. Then it occurs to me that the days of charge might be shortened. We have now fifteen days' charge upon a Sheriff Court decree; while we have six days' charge upon protests. I think these might be assimilated, and that six days' charge is quite sufficient in these days of rapid communication; and if, as I would take the liberty of suggesting either now or afterwards, there were a power of suspension given to the Sheriff, there would be no danger of any injury accruing from so short a charge. Then it has also occurred to me, as well as to others, that we might save at all events one appeal in the course of an ordinary action. We think that the right of appeal which we have just now, when a dilatory defence is disposed of either by sustaining it or rejecting it, might be reserved until the next stage for appealing, which would come to be when proof is allowed. I know that some think there should be no appeal even at the time when proof is allowed. I do not agree with them, because there may be and there are cases where there is a pure question of law started which ought to be disposed of at once before parties are put to the expense of, it may be, a lengthy and expensive proof. But I do not see any harm there would be in reserving the right to rest upon dilatory pleas until that stage. There is no great expense incurred up to the point of allowing proof. I think, however, that there ought to be not only this privilege of appeal on allowing a proof in the ordinary sense of the word, but that we ought to have also the same privilege where a remit is made to a man of skill and an accountant. We often find that the expense of such remits is more than the expense of the proof; and we think that is a very fair stage where we could get our dilatory pleas and our objections to the necessity of such a remit brought before the principal Sheriff.

3726. Mr. Campbell.—Don't you think that a considerable number of appeals and considerable inconvenience might be obviated by allowing the Sheriff-substitute the power, which he does not now possess, of opening up the record on such conditions as to expenses as he might think proper?—I think so. I would give very broad powers indeed to the Sheriff-substitute with regard to the management and amending of the records. I think it is a great pity that actions should be thrown out of court on such grounds, when they can be remedied with anything like fairness to the parties. That with me would be a matter of expense. If any injury is caused or expense occasioned to the other side, let them get what is necessary to recompense them; but I think it is a great pity to destroy a cause upon more formal points, if this can be avoided.

3727. The Chairman.—In these appeals you would allow at the stages you allude to, would you think it safe to give a discretionary power to the Sheriff-substitute to allow them or not at that stage?—No; I would make it absolute. I would give the parties the power.

3728. Mr. Shand.—In any case, there cannot by possibility be much expense until the point when a proof or a remit is allowed?—I think not. If you get to a system of short records, there should not be much expense.

3729. Mr. Paterson.—In what you say about suspending the right of appeal, are you assuming that a shorter form of record than by condescendence and answers is adopted?—I would take it with either form; but, of course, there would be less objection to it if there was less expense incurred in the meantime. Then we find great objection to the provision in our existing Sheriff Court Act, with regard to the dismissal of an action at the three and the six months' end. We do not see that that has done any good. It has caused a great deal of expense, and I think it is wrong in principle. I do not see why—if, as I have seen on various occasions, the parties and their agents find it would be beneficial to allow the case to stand over, probably without reasons that would satisfy a judge,—the case must be kept constantly in motion in order to meet the provisions of the statute. We think, therefore, that without any disadvantage the provisions of the Act with regard to the three months' and the six months' dismissal might be safely repealed. Cases have arisen where it has been thought to be doubtful whether the provisions applied or not, so that a case may have fallen that way when it was not so intended.

3730. Mr. Campbell.—I suppose you refer particularly to sequestrations for rent, where that is the remedy which is sought, and where nothing can be done to any effect during the six months?—Quite so. You may have your sequestration the day after the term, and the rent not due till the following term, so that of necessity you must get the case continued. It has also been doubted whether, if the court sists a case, it continues in existence. I had an instance of that myself, where a party raised an action, and the other party raised a counter action, in order to get the whole matter brought forward; and because the counter claim was larger than the original claim, the Sheriff-substitute thought it would be better to take the second action first, and sisted the first action. The parties did not see fit to go on with the second action; and after it went to a certain stage, it was allowed to fall. But in the meantime more than two years had elapsed from the time of the sist, and nothing had been done in the first action. The question now stands, whether that first action is dead or alive. The Sheriff-substitute thinks it is alive, but the Sheriff-principal thinks it is dead. We think that these questions may very well be saved altogether, and that it may be left to the parties to arrange as to proceeding with their actions as they see fit; because it need never happen that a case falls asleep, unless both parties are willing that it should do so.

3731. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think it should sleep at all?—I don't think it should.

3732. Mr. Shand.—Do you think the court should have no power to compel the parties either to go on with the case, or to take it out of court?—If both parties are agreeable to let it stand, I think I would let it stand.

3733. Don't you think that clients frequently blame the law's delay in cases where the delay has arisen from arrangements between the agents themselves?—In that case they should change their agent, and get an agent who would do their work.

3734. Is that the remedy you would propose to meet that evil?—I think so. He may ask his agent to use diligence in the action, and then, if that fails, he has the remedy I have pointed at of getting another. A client should not be a sufferer through the fault of his agent.

3735. Is it not the case that a client is frequently in ignorance that the delay is being caused in that way?—It may be so.

3736. Have you no other remedy for that, except that he must change his agent?—I see no other remedy for that. He should complain; and if his complaints are not listened to, he can then employ another.

3737. Do you know that that was the purpose of the enactment we have been referring to?—I am aware. It is said that it was intended to reach the judge as well as the agents.

3738. Mr. Baxter.—But you think it has produced harm instead of good?—I think it has caused great expense without corresponding benefit.

3739. Mr. Webster.—Where an action has fallen by force of the statute, and the pursuer ultimately wishes to press on his claim, he has to be at the expense of new proceedings?—Yes.

3740. And the defender has to be at the expense of new proceedings also?—Yes.

3741. Is any one benefited but the agents?—No; and the pursuer may have lost an arrestment or an inhibition on the dependence.

3742. Mr. Shand.—Do you think agents have a claim for expenses in cases that they have allowed to lapse in that way?—I don't think they should have a claim. If they are to blame, they should not be paid for their remissness. I think I have now gone over the chief points which occur to me.

3743. The Chairman.—One of your suggestions was, that actions for debt for sums not exceeding £100 should be final in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

3744. And not subject to appeal to the Court of Session?—Yes, except in the limited case which I took the liberty of mentioning, with power to the Sheriff, in cases say between £50 and £100, to certify and take the opinion of the Supreme Court, if he found the case to be one of difficulty, and in which he thought such an appeal to be necessary.

3745. Do you mean that the case should be remitted to the Supreme Court, and should then become a case in the Supreme Court?—No; that it should come up in the shape of a report.

3746. You think that the Sheriff should consult the Supreme Court?—Yes, if that could be managed. I understand that sometimes a Lord Ordinary may report and take advice in the Inner House, or something of that nature.

3747. Mr. Paterson.—Might not the Supreme Court in such a case not just as easily decide the case at once?—They would in effect decide it by giving their opinion, according to which the Sheriff would act.

3748. Mr. Webster.—Would it not be cheaper, when a case is before the Supreme Court, that that court should do what is actually requisite, and finish it, in place of it going back to the Sheriff to do something in carrying out the opinion of the Supreme Court?—I am not fond of removing a case out of its original jurisdiction.

3749. The Chairman.—What is the advantage of retaining it in its original jurisdiction?—The saving of expense. I hold that the expense of the Court of Session is, in comparatively small cases, disproportionate to the amount of the sums in dispute.

3750. When a case prepared by record and ready for consideration is brought before the Supreme Court, what is it that causes the expense?—In the inferior court we have no counsel; we have counsel and agent in the same person. We would thus save the expense of counsel.

3751. Do you mean that the Supreme Court should decide it without hearing counsel? Should they give their opinion without hearing counsel?—Is your Lordship referring to a special case?

3752. I am talking of a remit. What is it that would cause the expense in the Supreme Court?—Of course you would require counsel to state and plead the case there were it carried there, and then to be made a Court of Session cause.

3753. But if it were sent there for the opinion of the court is the case I am putting. You propose a remit by the Sheriff to the Court of Session for its opinion; what would be the expense that would arise in that case?—Unless counsel were to be heard, the Sheriff might, for his own information and guidance, state a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court. If he stated the matter in a case, I think counsel need not be heard at all, but that the judges might sum that up and consider it. But I do not press that part of my suggestion. My main intention is to state that, in my opinion, the finality of the Sheriff's judgment should be made £100 instead of what it is at present.

3754. There is a power to courts in England to obtain the opinion of the court in Scotland upon certain questions regarding Scotch law. A case is prepared and sent down for the opinion of the court in Scotland; but in such cases the court in Scotland has been in use to hear counsel fully. Would not the same be necessary here, in order to enable the court to form an opinion, and to do justice between the parties?—It might. Of course, if the court thought that were necessary, I would say you are better without the reference to the Court of Session. I would rather take the Sheriff's judgment, such as he would give it.

3755. Then you do not feel strongly the advisability of obtaining that power of reference which you have suggested, if it were to add to the expense?—I am not strongly in favour of it in that case.

3756. How do you think it could be worked out without expense?—I am not familiar with the practice of the Court of Session, but I have seen a Lord Ordinary come into the Inner House, and take a case verbally to the court, and get the court's opinion upon that, and then retire.

3757. Are there not often counsel there also to state their views?—There may be, but your Lordship is much more familiar with these things than I am.

3759. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think many cases must occur in Scotland, where the amount in dispute is under £100, in which the party would desire to have a decision of the court of last resort?—There may be such cases; but then that depends altogether upon the views of the parties. You will find people just as greatly wedded to their own views in an £8, 6s. 8d. case as in a £50 case, and they would desire it just as much in the one as in the other.

3760. Assuming that to be so, do you think it a reasonable thing to make the jurisdiction of the Sheriff

Court privative up to such an amount?—I would not make it so much privative. If causes of that amount were brought into the Court of Session originally, then I would only give them inferior court expenses, unless the court, as Mr. Baxter suggested a little while ago, saw that in any particular case it was a fair case to try before the Supreme Court; but I would say in the ordinary case, that if parties will go to the Court of Session to get the benefit of its superior experience and judgment, they should not lay upon their opponents more than what would be the expense of getting an inferior court judgment.

3761. Would you still allow the power of initiating such cases in the Court of Session, subject to the power of striking down the expenses to those that would have been incurred in the Sheriff Court?—I would give the power to a party to call a case that might afterwards be taken to the Sheriff Court.

3762. But would you still allow the parties to originate a case in the Court of Session, subject to that power in the court to disallow the expenses if they thought it was a case that should have been brought in the Sheriff Court?—I do not see so much objection to that. It is more a matter of expense I have been looking to.

3763. Have you seen advantage taken very much of the power to advocate cases to the Court of Session under sec. 40 of the Judicature Act?—I have very few advocations now.

3764. Are you aware that a power exists, and is used, of transferring causes from the Sheriff Courts to the Court of Session, immediately upon an order for proof being pronounced, where the value is above £40?—Yes.

3765. Would you still leave that power to any extent?—I would not, because the object there is to get it tried by a jury. That is the power that is given.

3766. But you know that, when a case comes to the Court of Session, it is just taken up in its ordinary course, and the interlocutors are reviewed in the ordinary way?—Yes.

3767. In cases where the value is above £100, would you still allow that power?—I should think so.

3768. Mr. Paterson.—As I understand you, you draw the line of finality at £100, with this qualification only, that in cases above £50 you would give the Sheriff power where he thinks proper to certify a case on a point of law to the Supreme Court?—Yes.

3769. Is not that virtually making the appeal dependent upon the leave of the Sheriff, and in a limited class of cases?—It is.

3770. Do you think that is a power that the Sheriff-principal would wish to have?—I don't know whether he would wish to have it or not. Of course that is not a thing I would insist upon. As I have said before, my main object is the extension of the finality of the Sheriff, so as to get within his jurisdiction and keep within his jurisdiction as much as possible cases of a moderate amount.

3771. May not many people reckon £100 a considerable sum?—If it costs £50 or £60 to try the right to £100, then I say that is disproportionable.

3772. But suppose they felt themselves aggrieved, should they not have that right? Should they be dependent, in exercising that right, upon the will of the Sheriff who has already given a judgment against them?—Perhaps I would not interfere with people indulging in the luxury of litigation, if they are prepared to pay for it; but then their unfortunate opponent may have to pay.

3773. Supposing you were a Sheriff-principal, and that you esteemed your own law to be quite good, and one of the parties felt himself, on the other hand, greatly aggrieved, would you insist that you should have the right to force that judgment upon him, although he is quite willing and able to have a judgment of the Supreme Court?—It of course goes further than that, because the same principle would apply to cases of smaller amount. I don't see where you are going to draw your line, and there must be a line drawn somewhere. I don't see any great hardship in a case up to £100, of saying that you must be satisfied with the judgment of two such Sheriffs as we have, for example. I think you have got a very fair trial of your case, and should be satisfied with it. If you are the pursuer, it is a great hardship to your opponent that he should be dragged away to a more expensive jurisdiction; and if you have had a fair opportunity of stating your case, and getting the opinion upon it of two eminent judges, I think there is injustice done to no one.

3774. Is it in consideration for the parties that you would let it stand there?—It is.

3775. Mr. Harrison.—Is there not an inducement to the Sheriff-principal to be more careful in his judgment when he knows there is an appeal?—I have no doubt that every judge does his duty better under the fear of an appeal; and that, when a man is irresponsible, he is apt to get careless.

3776. But you are willing to sacrifice that advantage in order to save expense and to get rapid decisions?—Yes; but there must be a limit somewhere. You may say the House of Peers has no proper feeling of responsibility, because there is nothing beyond it. There must, as I say, be a limit somewhere; and I think, in simple cases, the limit should be within the Sheriff himself.

3777. The Chairman.—What is the limit in the House of Peers?—I am not aware of any limit there.

3778. Mr. Shand.—You think there must be a limit somewhere; and the question is between £25 as at present, and £100 as you suggest?—I do not mean a limit with regard to the amount of money; I mean to say with regard to appeals. There must be an end to appealing.

3779. But I think you said you propose to limit that power according to the amount at stake?—Quite so.

3780. And the question just is, whether it should be £25 as at present, or £100 as you suggest, or between these sums?—Yes.

3781. You said the present system of appeal was in your opinion valuable because it was cheap and satisfactory. In your experience, do you find there are few advocations from Forfarshire to the Court of Session?—I should say there are comparatively very few. Speaking for myself, they are very few indeed.

3782. To what do you attribute that?—Well, we have a great dread of the cost of the Court of Session, and we have a great dread of getting into a jury trial.

3783. As a rule, are you satisfied with the administration of justice as at present under the appeal you have now?—Do you mean under the last Court of Session Act?

3784. I mean having the appeal to the Sheriff of the county, without finding it necessary to go further?—Yes, in almost every case we find the parties are satisfied.

3785. Is it quite an exceptional case where it is otherwise?—It is indeed. In my own experience, it is entirely exceptional.

3786. Suppose it were found that an appeal or advocation to the Court of Session could be obtained at an expense, in many cases say of £10 a side, would that affect your opinion as to the propriety of retaining the appeal within the Sheriff Court itself?—I would say, in the first place, that I doubt extremely if such an appeal could be carried through at that expense. I think it would cost more. I do not see how you could manage it with that expense. Still, though it could, that would not affect my opinion that it is desirable to keep an appellate jurisdiction within the Sheriff Court.

3787. Why would that not affect your opinion?—I find that parties are generally quite content with their local judges, and have no desire to go any further. They have got substantial justice near at hand, and within a reasonable time and at a reasonable expense, and they have no desire merely for litigation's sake to go beyond it.

3788. Do you find that justice is obtained at much less expense in that way than in the way I have put before you even at the expense of £10 a side?—I would say so.

3789. The Chairman.—Would you contemplate giving a power of appeal from the local judge as you call him, or the resident judge, to the appellate Sheriff, in cases under the Small Debt Act?—My own personal feeling is rather against that. I know that some members of our faculty think that might be done by the statement of a case if required; but I am not myself very favourably disposed towards it.

3790. Mr. Baxter.—Do you mean in cases on points of law?—Yes, on points of law.

3791. Mr. Shand.—You said that you would be disposed to lay all the ministerial or administrative duties upon the resident Sheriff, so as to enable the Sheriffs to devote their time completely to appeals. Don't you find that the Sheriffs, as the office at present exists, do devote sufficient time to appeals?—I have never had reason to complain. We have no ground for complaint in our Sheriffdom. We get every justice done to us.

3792. And, in point of fact, is it not the case that generally throughout Scotland there is no complaint of that kind?—I cannot speak beyond my own county.

3793. Do you think there is any necessity for giving Sheriffs more time, or that that is a good reason for relieving them at all from those ministerial or administrative duties which they have been in the practice of performing?—I am looking forward to the possibility of there being a diminution in the number of appellate Sheriffs, and that they will require all the time they can get for the performance of their appellate functions.

3794. Then it is in the view of their whole time being required by their appeals that you make that suggestion?—Yes.

3795. Mr. Baxter.—Do I understand you to mean that there is a desire in the profession that the appeal court should be strengthened?—There is.

3796. In what way?—It has been thought desirable to get, at all events, two appellate Sheriffs.

3798. Do you mean more deliberative?—Yes; that you would get the two judges to state their opinions to one another with more chance of their agreeing than you would get three to do so. Then, with two appellate judges, suppose they were to differ, you would always have the opinion of two upon one side. Suppose the resident Sheriff gives a judgment, and the two appellate judges do not agree upon that judgment, but one agrees with the resident Sheriff, then you have two minds against one, which I say is a very fair verdict.

3799. Do you think that if there were two appellate judges, that would give great satisfaction to the country?—I think it would.

3800. The Chairman.—I think you said you had no cause to be dissatisfied with the judgments you obtained from your Sheriff-principal?—No.

3801. Then what would be the advantage you would derive from two judges if you have no cause to be dissatisfied now?—Two heads are better than one.

3802. But if the one does the thing satisfactorily, what more do you desire?—If you would always give us a good single Sheriff, that might do; but we may not always have the same advantage, and therefore I think we have a better chance of always having a good appellate court by having two judges in it.

3803. You think you have been fortunate?—Well, we have certainly had no reason to be dissatisfied.

3804. Suppose you had two appellate judges, whom you take from among persons who are supposed to be superior lawyers, and suppose they differ upon a case, do you think the party who has lost that case, where there is a division of opinion between the persons who are considered to be the best judges, will be satisfied with that being final under £100?—I think he ought to be satisfied, because he has got first of all the opinion of the resident Sheriff, and he has got that opinion confirmed just as good as we have at present by one other mind, as your Lordship has said, it may be of higher capacity.

3805. Do you think he would be confirmed as much as he is now, when another judge of an equal mind sitting with him is of an opposite opinion?—But we have got two minds in that case.

3806. But at present there is no dissenting voice, while in the other case there would be one half of the higher court against the judgment?—Still the dissenting judge is in a minority of mind. We have got two minds against one; and I have more confidence in the two against the one, than in the one against the two.

3807. Do you think that would be a more satisfactory judgment than if there was only the one?—I would say so. It would be equally satisfactory, at any rate.

3808. You think the antagonism of the other would in no respect detract from the weight of the judgment?—I don't think it.

3809. You say that sometimes there may not be very satisfactory Sheriffs. Might that not happen in the case of appellate judges too?—I have only spoken about our own Sheriff. I am very well satisfied with him, and I cannot speak about others.

3810. Suppose the appellate court were constituted as you have suggested, and that the satisfactory judge should be the refractory one against the judgment, and that the other who was not so satisfactory should concur in it, what would be the result?—It would be a pity that that should be so, but it would not alter my opinion.

3811. Mr. Shand.—Would there not be the same risk of unsatisfactory appointments in the case you put as there is at present?—Yes, there would be the same. Humanum est errare—we cannot get perfection.

3812. Mr. Baxter.—Would you not contemplate increasing the salaries of these appellate judges, and if possible getting superior men?—I would certainly contemplate that. You should get first-class men, and give them first-class salaries; so that you would have less risk of getting inferior men.

3813. At present you appeal from the Sheriff-substitute, who is now a good man, who has made up the record and taken all the proof. Do you think he has a superior opportunity of judging of the case from the one man to whom you appeal at present?—I always thought there was an advantage in that, and it cannot be denied.

3814. And you would like to strengthen the appeal court by having two men instead of one?—Yes. The judge who sees the witnesses has of course an advantage which the other cannot have.

3815. Mr. Shand.—Would you have the same system throughout Scotland that you have spoken of, or are you speaking only with reference to Dundee?—I think the principle applies universally.

3816. Would you propose that these judges should sit in every one of the towns where the Sheriffs now sit, or only at the Circuit towns?—I have a strong feeling that they should not be made resident. If it were possible, I would have them all resident in Edinburgh, but that may not be possible.

3817. For what reason?—I think they ought to be kept up to the daily knowledge of their profession by coming in contact with practising barristers in the courts, whether they had business there themselves or not. I think they should be at the seat of the Supreme Court if it be possible.

3818. Would you contemplate that they should be practising members of the bar?—Well, they would not have much time for that.

3819. Do you think that such judges should sit in all the towns where the Sheriffs now hold sittings, or that they would hold circuits?—I rather think they should hold circuits.

3820. Probably in the leading towns in Scotland where the circuits are now held?—That might be tried to begin with. If it was found not to answer, and if they required to extend their circuits, that might be done; but probably it might be sufficient as a trial in the first place to take the Circuit towns.

3821. With the suggestions you have now made, how many appeals do you contemplate might be made in the course of a case?—There would be no appeal until a proof was allowed, or a remit made. That is one. Then on disposing of the merits there would require to be an appeal.

3822. And if an interim decree were given for money?—That of course is the merits.

3823. But suppose an interim decree given in the course of a case, would you allow an appeal there?—Of course.

3824. Suppose a witness objected to a production on the ground of confidentiality, would you allow an appeal to remain there?—I think so.

3825. So that there might be four or five appeals in the course of a case?—Yes.

3826. Suppose a case should be appealable five times to judges coming round upon circuit, how do you think that would work with respect to delay?—Of course you would require to make the periods frequent at which the judges were to come round; and you would get your remedy in that way.

3827. Have you formed any idea how often you would expect these judges to go round upon circuit?—I would like them to come round once a month at least. Of course that must depend upon how the thing is found to work, because it is a new thing; but I think probably once a month might do.

3828. So that in that way, if such a number of appeals as you have suggested were taken, there might be delays of three weeks or a month between the taking of the appeals and the hearing of them?—There might.

3829. Don't you think there would also be greater delay in giving decisions upon questions of principle, when these two judges have each to form his opinion and to give a judgment?—That might perhaps be checked by requiring that a judgment should be issued within a certain period after the hearing.

3830. Whether the judge had had time to make up his mind upon it or not?—I suppose he would not find much difficulty in making up his mind within the period they would allow him.

3831. Would not each judge require to see the process?—It would not do for the two judges to be living at different places.

3832. Assuming that they both lived in Edinburgh, each would require to have the process?—Yes, of course he would.

3833. Would that not take up more time than the giving of a single judgment?—I think not. You would not have more delay in that way than you have now.

3834. Then with regard to expense, suppose these courts were held at the Circuit towns, are there not many procurators who would have to travel from four to five hours in order to reach the court where their cases were to be heard, such as in Banffshire, Ross-shire, Caithness-shire, and Sutherlandshire?—We have something like that just now in our present system in Forfarshire. The procurators of Brechin, and Montrose, and Arbroath require to go to Forfar. Now it would not be much more trouble to them to go to Dundee, and so I suppose it would be in other cases.

3835. Does not that evil exist now to a much more limited extent than it would under the system you propose?—I do not think it would be greater.

3836. As matters now stand, does the Sheriff not go to the parties' own doors to hear the cases in Banffshire, and Ross-shire, and Sutherlandshire, and in all the northern counties?—I do not know as to other counties. I do not speak beyond my own.

3837. But you know that the Sheriffs of all these northern counties go to the leading county towns?—Yes.

3838. Under the system you are proposing, he is not to go to the county towns; and assuming that the procurators have to travel four or five hours in order to get to the Circuit town, does not that imply that they must leave the day before in order to be present at the appeal court?—It would certainly put them to more inconvenience; but if it was found in practice that that was a crying evil, you could then make your perambulatory court of appeal meet the case by going to all large towns.

3839. But in the view you have put of their going to the Circuit towns only, do you not think that the expense would be considerably increased beyond what it is at present?—Well, it might be so with procurators at a distance from the towns.

3840. On the other hand, do you think it would be right that an appeal court, consisting of two judges of such standing as you have mentioned, should go down to all the smaller county towns, where there might be only one case waiting them?—You must not despise small things. They must attend to the cases if they undertake to do so.

3841. Do you think that would be a reasonable arrangement, that such a court should go to towns where there are often only one or two cases at the most?—Decidedly; it would be reasonable. If the judges undertake the office, they must perform its duties if they are paid for it. If there is only one case, I say they ought to be there to try it.

3842. Therefore you rather think the court should go to all these smaller places?—Yes; always under the explanation I gave before, that you should first try the Circuit towns. If that will serve the purpose without giving any cause of complaint, then keep by it. If, on the other hand, you find that there really is good ground for complaint, by procurators having to come from a great distance, you must just suit the court to these circumstances, and relieve them, because these gentlemen whom you are to make the court of appeal will have a duty to perform, and it ought to be performed by them at the least possible trouble and expense to the public.

3843. Would it not be a hardship in summary cases that there should be no appeal, it might be for a month or six weeks, until these judges came round?—That is probably one of the points that I have not quite seen through. It would be a question whether in a summary case of that kind a written reclaiming petition should not be allowed. That is certainly the remedy that occurred to me.

3844. Do you think it would be possible to make an arrangement for a written reclaiming petition to be well disposed of by two judges, and possibly two judges who are away upon a circuit?—Of course you cannot meet every case to the best advantage. If a party who wishes to get their opinion thinks that cannot be done, then he must wait for the circuit.

3845. Would that not create a great hardship in a class of cases which are now only summary cases?—Just now there is very little distinction made in hearing appeals betwixt ordinary cases and summary cases.

3846. Have you not many cases in Dundee in which interim interdict is imposed, and ought to be immediately recalled, where you ought to have a summary appeal?—There are many of these cases.

3847. Would the evil that has been suggested not be a very pressing one in that class of cases with a court of two perambulatory judges?—I don't see that it would be more so than we are exposed to just now.

3848. Can you not at present put in an appeal and a reclaiming petition to the Sheriff within twenty-four hours, if you wish it?—You may, and so you might in the case supposed. I don't see that your remedy would be changed.

3849. Do you mean you might have such a petition with two perambulatory judges?—If they are perambulating, you are sure to get them together.

3850. Where and how do you propose that such petitions should be disposed of under the new system?—Of course they would be considered by the two judges. They would simply be advising a reclaiming petition, and they would advise that on circuit as well as at home.

3851. Do you think it would require to be sent to them wherever they happened to be, and read by them there, and advised in that way?—Surely, if promptitude is wanted in the disposal of the case.

3852. Would there not be a great difficulty in working all that out?—As I mentioned to you, the alternative is just what we have now—to wait for the Circuit.

3853. Do I not understand that at present you may get a judgment immediately upon a summary matter by at once putting in a written argument, to be disposed of by a single judge?—Yes; but I fail to see the distinction between the one judge and the two; because, if the two are together, they are one in a sense.

3854. Then, in any proposal of that kind, you are satisfied that it would be of importance to keep the power of written argument?—In summary questions. That is certainly a point on which I have not seen my way to anything else. Probably some one else may suggest a remedy.

3855. But it has not occurred to you?—No other remedy has occurred to me but that power of putting in a written petition.

3856. Mr. Baxter.—You assume that these judges shall hold their courts in large towns?—Yes.

3858. Would you extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to questions of heritable right?—I certainly would. We find that a very keen discussion generally takes place with regard to possessory questions as to heritage, and that the whole energies of the parties are exhausted in trying the question of possession; and we find that very seldom such questions go beyond the local courts, because beyond the possessory question nothing is tried in them. Now, it occurs to me that it would be much better that the heritable question, which is the true one at issue, the real right of property, should be allowed to be tried to begin with; and, of course, if the right of appeal is open, no harm can accrue to either party from a judgment upon the heritable right being pronounced by the inferior court; so that I think the jurisdiction with regard to heritable rights might be given with safety to the Sheriffs, under the usual power of appeal.

3859. The Chairman.—Would you give that power to any amount of money?—I have always a feeling that cases within £100 of value should be kept within the local jurisdiction; and if that can be ascertained, which I think it could be, I would say that within £100 the Sheriff's jurisdiction in heritable rights should be final also.

3860. What I asked was, whether you would extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to heritable estate of any amount?—Yes.

3861. Including the titles to land?—Yes.

3862. And to decide the right to any estate in the country?—Yes.

3863. Mr. Baxter.—Do you not think that, when the estate is very valuable, the case would find its way to the Court of Session?—Yes. I think that practically all the important cases would be brought in the first instance in the Court of Session, and that it would only be cases of smaller value that would be tried in the country at all.

3864. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think it desirable that a defender should have the protection of having the Court of Session to try very important questions of heritable right, such as questions of entail law and the like?—I don't know that I would shut them out; but then it comes to be to me a matter of expense.

3865. But would you leave it in the power of the pursuer absolutely to choose the Sheriff Court as his tribunal in such very important cases, and allow the defender no remedy against that?—I would allow a pursuer to choose his court; but I would allow a defender a power to move to get the case remitted to the Court of Session, with this qualification, that if it is really a case within £100 value, inferior court expenses only should be allowed.

3866. I am speaking of more important cases?—I would certainly give a power to move that the case should be remitted; but if the defender agrees to go on in the Sheriff Court, I do not see why they should not do so.

3867. Would you not give him a right to have such cases as I have alluded to tried by the Court of Session?—By a power I mean a right.

3868. Then you would not leave it merely discretionary in the Sheriff, but would give the defender in such cases an absolute right to have the case remitted at once to the Court of Session?—Yes.

3869. You mean where the cases are above £100 value?—Yes.

3870. Mr. Baxter.—Would you allow reductions and suspensions of charges to be competent to the Sheriff?—I would. Just now there is a jurisdiction in the Sheriff to the extent of £25 in a certain class of suspensions. I don't see any reason why that should not be extended, and also include reductions. Of course these would be, if exceeding £100 value, always under a right of appeal. According to my view of these things, I look upon every summons as in a sense a declarator; and I look upon every successful defence as in a sense a reduction. That may go to any extent just now in moveable cases in the Sheriff Court. If we succeed in our defence, we have reduced the pursuer's claim—we have set it aside to that extent; and why the distinction should be drawn betwixt a house, and it may be 100 tons of flax, I fail to see.

3871. The Chairman.—But we are talking technically of reductions. Your description would not apply to a reduction as we understand it under that name?—No.

3872. A successful defence against an open account is not a reduction?—It is a reduction of the pursuer's claim really, although not technically.

3873. But it is not a reduction in the sense which Mr. Baxter means?—No.

3874. Mr. Baxter.—Have you had any experience of the expense of appointment of factors loco tutoris, curators bonis, and such like?—I have not had many of them, but I have had a few; and I find it comes to be very expensive in small matters. You cannot get an appointment of a judicial factor at less than somewhere about £15 to £20. Now that comes to be pretty heavy in small matters; and it is worse getting quit of them—I mean the discharge.

3875. Have you had any experience of what the expense of discharge of a factor is in any case?—There are two cases before my mind just now in which there was a very heavy expense indeed. There was one which, before we got quit of it, cost somewhere about £150.

3876. Do you mean the discharge alone?—Not merely the discharge itself, but the investigation that took place in the Court of Session.

3877. I mean the proceedings connected with the discharge?—Yes, quite so.

3878. Mr. Webster.—Does that include the expense of a remit to a professional accountant, to make up a state of the factor's intromissions?—Yes.

3879. Mr. Gordon.—What was the value of the property?—It was a small property, worth about £30 or £40 a year.

3880. Mr. Paterson.—Was there any specialty in the case?—There was this specialty in the first one I am referring to, that the judicial factor was a law-agent, and there was some discussion as to what would fall under the proper expenses of the factory. That would take up some of the cost.

3881. Mr. Gordon.—Do you recollect the name of the case?—I think Thornton was the name of the deceased, and his family were the beneficiaries.

3882. Mr. Shand.—Was there not some litigation where the expense was so much?—It was partly incurred from the cause I have mentioned. But there was another case I came across accidentally the other day. I happened to be agent for one of the parties in Mr. Tawse's succession. There was a judicial factor on his estate, and I was told by Messrs. Shiell and Small that the expenses there had been upwards of £100.

3883. What was the amount of that estate?—It was a pretty good estate; perhaps about £3000, at any rate.

3884. Was much of that expense composed of the judicial factor's fee?—No; it was more incurred in the discussion before the accountant.

3885. You mean discussions between him and the Accountant of Court?—Yes; and the objections to his account from the other side.

3886. Litigated questions between him and the parties interested?—Yes; but I cannot speak to the details.

3887. Mr. Paterson.—Were they both cases in which objections were taken to the discharge of the factors?—Yes.

3889. Mr. Shand.—Do you think that in small trusts such a power would be of great value to poor people?—Yes.

3890. Mr. Webster.—Would there be any difficulty in the Sheriff Court, or how would you get over the difficulty in the Sheriff Court and adjust the matter of dealing with a factor resident beyond the Sheriffdom, and with the matter of caution? At present you know that the bond of caution for the judicial factor in the Supreme Court has to be approved of by one of the Principal Clerks of Session before it can be accepted?—Yes.

3891. How would you deal with these two matters—the matter of the factor being resident beyond the jurisdiction, and the matter of caution—if you were to give the Sheriff the power which you are proposing?—I think if the Sheriff were to see cause to approve of the factor's accounts, and to find that he was entitled to his discharge, the discharge should receive effect.

3892. But it is at the appointing. I asked you first, how would the Sheriff deal with appointing a factor, if the appropriate person were resident beyond his jurisdiction; and secondly, how would you deal with the matter of caution—to whom would you delegate the duty of judging of the caution?—Of course, if the Sheriff is to have power to appoint a factor, and that factor is not within his jurisdiction, you must give him jurisdiction over him. You must extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction over the party, as I said before.

3893. Mr. Shand.—Wherever he may reside?—Yes, wherever he may reside; and if the Sheriff finds that a discharge should be given, that discharge must receive effect in any part of the country.

3894. Mr. Webster.—As to caution, who would judge of caution in the Sheriff Court, which in the Court of Session is judged of by one of the Principal Clerks of Session?—The Sheriff-clerk judges of caution in our county.

3895. Is it the Sheriff-clerk, or one of the deputes, who practically does that?—It is one of the deputes; but I say that the Sheriff-clerk should do his own duty.

3896. With the Sheriff-clerks as they are, would you devolve the duty of judging of caution on large estates upon the person who is acting as Sheriff-clerk in the particular jurisdiction, or how would you provide for that?—I think you ought to have such a person as Sheriff-clerk who would be qualified and quite able to judge in such a matter; but I quite agree with what you are hinting at, that this should not be entrusted to a mere depute.

3897. Mr. Baxter.—You think the Sheriff-clerk should reside at the seat of the Sheriffdom, and attend to his duties?—Yes, as he is paid for them.

3898. Mr. Paterson.—You assume, I suppose, that he would follow the same plan as the clerk of court, and have an attestor?—Yes, he would take means to satisfy himself of the sufficiency of the caution.

3899. You proceed on the assumption that the Sheriff-clerk would do all that?—Yes. In Commissary cases just now we always have an attestation of knowledge and belief by a Justice of Peace.

3900. The Chairman.—You said you would give jurisdiction to the Sheriff over the factor: I suppose you would equally give jurisdiction to him over the cautioners, wherever they resided?—Yes, within Scotland.

3902. Mr. Paterson.—Supposing the subject of the factory to be large landed properties in the particular county, would he have any difficulty in finding a suitable factor for them?—In certain cases he might probably find a difficulty within his own county; but if he has his jurisdiction extended, he might choose a proper party elsewhere as factor.

3903. Mr. Baxter.—And I suppose you assume that, in the case of very large estates, the appointment would go elsewhere?—Yes; I think the case would never arise.

3904. The Chairman.—Suppose a motion for appointment of a factor on the estates of Breadalbane, for instance?—I don't think that would ever come to be tried in Perthshire.

3905. Mr. Paterson.—Do you put any limit to the value of the estates where you would allow the Sheriff to appoint the factor?—No, I would put no limit.

3906. Mr. Shand.—I presume you would leave a power of review of the appointment, if parties appeared as respondents and litigated it?—I should think, on good cause shown, there should certainly be such a power.

3907. But do you mean that you would not give a power of review in those cases?—I would give a power of review.

3908. That is, to the Court of Session?—Yes, to the Court of Session, always provided the estate exceeds £100 in value.

3909. Mr. Baxter.—Then, as to questions under the Conjugal Rights Act, with regard to protection for a wife's earnings, and provision for her husband's desertion; do you think these questions should be within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—I have only had two cases of that kind in my own practice. One of them passed in absence, unopposed; and in the other the husband unfortunately made his appearance.

3910. Of course you went to the Court of Session?—Yes; and it comes to be a very great burden.

3911. Is it not almost a prohibition?—Yes, it is virtually a prohibition. If there is to be opposition at all, it is a prohibition. In the unopposed case, I think it cost from £14 to £20. The other, which was a very hard case, was that of a poor woman, a widow with a family, who was married to a widower with a family, and she had a family to him. There were thus three families; and the man deserted her, and went to California. He was twelve years absent, and all he sent home to her during that period was a little bit of gold to make a ring. That was all the support he gave her. She in the meantime took up a little shop, and saved a few hundreds of pounds; and as it accumulated, she began to get afraid that he might make his appearance. She applied for the benefit of the Conjugal Rights Act, and while the case was in court the husband made his appearance. He came home all the way from California, and, as a woman will, she took him in. The Court held that they could not grant her any remedy; and the case cost the poor woman about £70.

3912. Mr. Shand.—That was a litigation which does not seem to be a good illustration of the probable expense?—Of course there are just the two classes of cases, either unopposed or opposed. In the unopposed case I think it cost under £20.

3913. Do you think it would be a great advantage that these things should be done by the Sheriff at a less expense?—Yes.

3914. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the Sheriff's jurisdiction should be extended to questions of divorce and declarator of marriage?—At first I had some hesitation upon these points; but I think now that that jurisdiction should be given more especially in cases of divorce. I think the expense of divorce, according to our present system, is most prejudicial to morals; and it is a great inducement to concubinage and bigamy. I had an illustration of that within the last few months. A seaman came to me about a small share of a succession, and he took the opportunity to put a question to me about the expense of divorce; he let out what I believe is rather too common—that he was living with another man's wife. I spoke to him seriously about his position, both in a moral and legal point of view; but he said, 'Well, the woman is as good as divorced already, and we cannot afford to be at the expense of getting it legally done.' The husband had deserted her for many years.

3915. Mr. Shand.—Are you satisfied that the cases are numerous in which parties have not the means of obtaining a divorce in the Court of Session, and yet where good grounds for divorce exist?—There are not many cases of that kind that come under my own personal observation, but I can very well suppose that they are numerous. I have only had two cases of divorce in my own practice, and the expense was considerable. The least expense, I think, is somewhere between £40 and £50. They do not pass, as a matter of course, without proof. You must get proof; and the expense of that is quite deterring to poor people.

3916. The Chairman.—Are you satisfied with the manner in which facts are inquired into in the court at present?—I think there might be an improvement in this respect,—that the introduction of shorthand writing might in many instances shorten the time occupied in taking proofs; but in that case, as well as in ordinary proofs taken in the ordinary way, I think we ought to have the Sheriff to dictate to a clerk or a shorthand writer, rather than that he should write his notes by himself. In the course of a proof there is no other means of ascertaining that the words of the witness are properly taken down. I think, therefore, there should be dictation orally and distinctly by the Sheriff to the person who takes down the evidence; that as each answer is given, there should be an opportunity of observing whether or not what is taken down is the answer of the witness.

3917. Then with regard to the judgment of the resident Sheriff upon a matter of fact, would you have his judgment on that matter of fact appealable to the appeal Sheriffs, as well as upon matters of law?—I think so. I would carry the whole case before them.

3918. Do you think there would be any expediency in trying questions of fact by a jury?—I do not; decidedly not. I have a very strong feeling on that point.

3919. What is your objection to investigation by a jury?—It is manifold. I think the general class of jurymen are not fitted by their education and training to perform the office, and to judge of evidence. I think it requires more than what we find in the general class of men to discriminate betwixt different kinds of evidence, and the value to be given to one testimony more than another. I think that a juryman is a judge, and very often most valuable and important causes are committed to him, while he has not opportunities which a judge ought to possess to enable him to come to a sound opinion. He is called in, I say, without proper training of mind to perform a very difficult duty, and he is introduced suddenly into the midst of a case which he has had no opportunity of studying, so that he has not the foundation for a judgment. The thing is done hastily; he is brought into the court, and he is asked to consider what may have puzzled the most acute intellects—the discrimination of facts, and the bearing of facts, and the value of evidence; and he is called upon to do this at once, although he is a man quite unaccustomed to that kind of work. Now I think you cannot have a satisfactory result from these premises. I have much more confidence in an educated judge than I would have in any jury.

3920. Mr. Baxter.—Have you had any jury cases?—Fortunately not many. I have had two or three.

3921. Have you lost them all?—No; I have not lost a jury case; but all I have seen of them has certainly gone to confirm my opinion of the unsatisfactory nature of jury trial.

3922. Mr. Webster.—Is there any objection to jury trial on the ground of expense?—That is a very serious objection to it; but I say also that the system is not a good one. A juryman is taken out of the mass, and he goes back to the mass. He is not like a judge who stands before the public, and is answerable to public opinion. After he gives his opinion, he goes away and mixes with the public, and there is no responsibility. Then he is not called upon to give any reason for his judgment, and yet it may be he decides matters involving thousands of pounds. Besides, the expense of the system is enormous, and quite deterring to us in the country. I know clients who have sacrificed large sums rather than venture to undergo the risk of a jury trial, and certainly I am not one of those who would advise people to face that risk if it could be helped. I find, from looking into two or three cases I had, that you cannot try a case with less risk than £400 a side. Now that is not justice. There is one case in particular that I have in my mind, where the actual amount put before the judge and the jury at the time of the trial was only £95. They did not know what I knew, that that case was put forward as a representative case, and that we had about £1500 or £1600 of similar claims behind it. Well, that case of £95 cost somewhere about £400 or £450 a side.

3923. Mr. Gordon.—What was the nature of that case?—There was a ship building in Dundee, and a ship chandler gave furnishings to the vessel. While the vessel was in the course of being finished, by a cleverness the builders' certificate was passed into other hands, and the vessel was registered in the name of parties who then denied employment. The ship was built at the expense of Dundee people, and these strangers came and said, 'This is our ship; and we will not pay you. We were not your employers.' The parties who came forward as the apparent employers to begin with, admitted the responsibility; but they became bankrupt. Well, this of course was very provoking to the furnishers. There was nearly £2000 worth of property lying before their eyes which they had made, and they could not get payment for it, and they determined to try the matter. One of the best cases was picked out for trial, and £95 was the amount of it.

3924. How many days did the trial last?—I think it was two days; but I am not quite sure.

3925. Was it a difficult case?—There was a good deal of evidence led, and there was a good deal of correspondence put in, which was one of the causes of the large cost. The jury gave us a unanimous verdict in the face of a charge by the judge against us. I considered at that time that it was a very unfit case for a jury. A perfect volume of printed correspondence was put before them, which it was impossible they could have studied, and which indeed they would not see.

3926. Was there any attempt to upset the verdict?—No; they threatened to do so; but they compromised by giving us a sum of money, which we took rather than go further.

3928. Does that remark apply to that case?—It would have applied to that case decidedly. It was more a case for a judge than for a jury.

3929. Do you think the judgment of the judge there was more to be relied upon than that of the jury?—I confess it was a very narrow case, and I could not have said the judge was wrong. I must say that his statement of the law against us was rather convincing.

3930. Do you think there is a good deal of chance and hazard in the verdict of a jury?—I do think so; and there are cases brought before them, which I think these men are not at all qualified to judge of, such as cases where questions of collision and seamanship or capacity to test, and such like, arise. Now the class of jurymen brought forward are not fit to look at these cases: they are not fit to grapple with them. They do not understand them.

3931. You said, about founding jurisdiction, that you think where a party has founded jurisdiction against a foreigner, that might be tried, or ought to be tried, in the Sheriff Court?—I think so. It could be done quite satisfactorily there, and at much less expense than at present.

3932. Do you see any objection to the system of founding jurisdiction by arrestment? Have you known any practical evil arising from that?—No, I have seen no practical evil; but I have seen sometimes that it comes to be a very shadowy arrestment. We hold that it is not necessary to be of any great amount—that any amount, in short, founding jurisdiction is sufficient to create it; so that it is a mere form—it is not reality.

3933. Do you think that that kind of jurisdiction, being given to an inferior judge, should be a thing that would be repugnant to the feelings of foreign traders?—Of course it is only used in the case of our own people, it may be, suing a foreigner who may be wishing to get quit of what we consider to be a good claim; otherwise we would not bring it. Therefore I do not care about his feelings.

3934. You do not care about his feelings in that particular case?—No, not in that particular case, because it is only when the pursuer brings an action in this country that the case can arise. Of course a foreigner would think that any means used to bring him from his own country to ours would be a grievance. He cannot get quit of that feeling.

3935. But might he not prefer trading with England to trading with Scotland? If he were in England, that would not happen?—I believe there is a jurisdiction of that kind in London.

3936. Your jurisdiction extends beyond this step of arrestment?—It does.

3937. And if there is a debt owing to him there, you can get that?—Yes, to the extent of your claim.

3938. You first found a jurisdiction, and then you can afterwards lay your hands upon anything belonging to him anywhere you can get at it?—Yes.

3939. Now, might foreigners not consider that that was a reason why they should not trade with you?—We have such a jurisdiction in our system just now—that is to say, the Court of Session has no other foundation for its jurisdiction in these matters.

3940. But do you not think it might make a difference to them, that this was to be exercised by an inferior judge?—I do not think it should.

3941. Mr. Webster.—Is it not a jurisdiction that could be very largely abused, with reference say to foreign vessels, by parties getting up unfounded though plausible claims, and seizing the vessel in the docks?—Of course that may be so. The Sunderland case which I have already mentioned showed how the power was liable to be abused.

3942. Would it not be a more equitable system, to adopt some such practice as is in the common law procedure in England—that in order to found jurisdiction under the courts of Scotland, the claim upon which the arrestment is used should have been contracted in Scotland?—That would cut very deep into our legal principles, because I do not think you could limit it there. I think that would go further than you are thinking.

3944. Mr. Shand.—All the evils that have just been spoken of exist under the present system?—They do.

3945. A party may seize a vessel and do all that has been suggested under the warrant of the Sheriff, followed by a warrant to arrest from the Court of Session?—Yes. I believe there is yet a doubt as to the effect of an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem, whether it is in reality an attachment. I understand that is yet so far an open question. There is a judgment of the court which has certainly a leaning towards the view that there is something of an attachment in it, but what that something is has not yet been defined. Now I don't know but what you could get at what is quite sufficient to found a jurisdiction simply by the arrestment, holding that it did not attach the vessel or the thing, and merely giving notice to the party. For example, instead of seizing a ship by the present method, ad fundandam jurisdictionem, notice might be given to the master, or to any one connected with the foreigner, or to any one holding goods belonging to the foreigner, without interfering with the property itself until the action was brought. I know there are cases where no other step is taken except this initial one, and that is quite sufficient to deter the foreigner, and to make him pay. When this is served upon him, they seldom think of going any further, and probably never intend to go any further, but simply wish to get their attachment made under the initial step, and they gain their end on account of the fear of the subsequent expense. Now, if simple notice, so as not to attach, were sufficient to found jurisdiction, leaving the attachment to follow on the raising of the real action, probably many cases of grievance would be taken away. I do not well see why you should not have the power of attaching foreigners' property in this country, in the same way that you have the power of attaching the property of your own countrymen.

John William Thomson.

3946. The Chairman.—Do you think any hardship follows the dismantling of vessels?—A great hardship, and you would get quit of that by notice in the first instance at all events.

3947. But suppose they were, as the sailors say, to 'pay you with the mainsail,' what would you say then?—Or 'shivering the topsail.' There would certainly be a risk of that. But what I say is, that when you really and truly wish to raise an action and to pursue it, you should have the means of attaching the property until fair security is found for the debt that is involved in dependence of the action; but I do object to this initial step to found jurisdiction having any effect as an attachment.

3948. Mr. Webster.—At present, the party using the arrestment may delay raising his summons?—Yes.

3949. And if he so delays it, what means has a party whose ship or funds are arrested of getting rid of the arrestment?—He must apply to get the arrestment loosed, and find caution, which is a great hardship. In the case I have already referred to, they would not allow the arrestment to be lifted until consignation was made of the amount claimed.

3950. Mr. Paterson.—Have you ever acted professionally for any foreigner whose property was attached to found jurisdiction in this country?—Yes, I have.

3951. How did they view the remedy?—I acted not very long ago in a case where an American quarrelled with a seaman. The quarrel took place on the coast of America. The man refused to work; he came home with the ship, and the moment he came home he took proceedings to attach the vessel. The American was much put about, and applied to his consul, who took the trouble to inquire at the American Minister in London, in order to see whether the vessel could be got free; and he was told he must just abide the laws of the country where he was.

3952. Do you know whether this is a remedy very severely denounced by foreigners who are subjected to it?—Of course it is.

3953. Mr. Webster.—Do you know any other country where there is a similar remedy given against our traders?—No, I do not. I have not had occasion to inquire into that.

3954. Mr. Paterson.—Are you aware that it is a remedy which has been frequently abused?—I know that.

3955. And that a party will resort to it in order to enforce a doubtful claim?—The initial step I have mentioned gives an opportunity for that. I do not object to an arrestment where there is really an action in court—where there is a true case to try; but I do object to that arrestment where it is merely put in as a brutum fulmen, and is not intended to be carried any further—where it is merely used as a threat.

3956. At present you can found upon an open account, or any kind of claim?—Yes, in any manner possible.

3957. And that the party may be served with a copy of the writ without any notice?—Yes.

3958. The Chairman.—I suppose the object of that is, that they may not steal away?—Yes.

3959. Mr. Paterson.—In your application to the Sheriff you are not obliged to define the nature of your claim specifically?—You just give a general statement of it.

3961. Mr. Webster.—Do you know that, under a recent statute, a judgment obtained in one part of the United Kingdom can be summarily enforced in another part of the United Kingdom?—Yes.

3962. Would you allow judgments against a foreigner arresting to found jurisdiction to have the privileges of that statute, or would you limit their effect merely to the assets that were attached within the jurisdiction?—Do you mean as between one part of the United Kingdom and another?

3963. Yes?—I don't know that I would limit it, if the case is to be tried. If the case gets a fair trial, I don't see why you should limit that.

3964. Is the principle of that not the reverse of the ordinary principle, which is that a man is answerable to the tribunal of the country where he is resident?—Yes.

3965. And the other makes him answerable to another tribunal, where his assets may happen to be seized?—It is quite so. That is done, I fancy, in England too, but I don't pretend to know.

3966. The Chairman.—You were asked about the place of business of a person being held as a domicile for citation and for presenting bills, whether his house be or be not within the jurisdiction. Do you apply that to a party who is the partner of a firm, or who is not in Scotland himself; and in this question I do not refer to bills just now, but only to citations?—I limited my answer at the beginning in this way, that the business place should be the business place of the defender himself, and not of his employer.

3967. But what do you say in the case of a partner?—I would be disposed to let that be a domicile. I think there would be no great risk if a citation were left at the place of business of a partnership; I think there is every chance that that would reach the principal. I would make no exception in that case. I would rather except only the case where the person is a servant working in an employer's place of business.

3968. Mr. Webster.—Would you do so even in a case where a partner was the pursuer and a partner was the defender?—You put me in a difficulty there. That just shows how, when one deals with generalities, particular cases start up. It would certainly be safer to make the place of business a domicile only in the case of an individual.

3969. The Chairman.—If he were a partner of a company, although he was not there at all, would you hold him to be subject to the jurisdiction, and subject to be cited there, and amenable to the citation?—I think that suggestion of Mr. Webster's is a very valuable one. It might perhaps be dangerous in the case he supposes, of the very partnership itself being the pursuer against an individual partner of the firm, to leave the principal citation in their own office. That would not be a desirable thing, but that must occur very seldom indeed; so that, I think, in practice almost every case would be met by allowing the individual dwelling-place or the individual place of business of an individual person to be his domicile, except in actions against partnerships or inter socios.

3971. Mr. Webster.—You know that in Scotland it is competent for a firm or company to sue one of its own partners. We look upon a company or firm here as a separate person, differing in that respect from the English system?—Yes; there you must have the consent of all the partners.

3972. Mr. Paterson.—You see no difficulty in putting it this way, that the counting-house should be the domicile, except in questions among partners inter se?—No.

3973. In the west many of the people go to the coast for months, and their houses in town are shut up. Arrestments may be laid below the door of the dwelling-house, of which the people in the counting-house being ignorant, they may in good faith pay away the money. Would not your suggestion remedy that state of matters?—It might. These are keyhole arrestments.

3974. Mr. Baxter.—We had a suggestion made to us yesterday about process for perpetuating testimony. Have you ever thought about that?—Yes; that is one of the matters I was to have suggested. That is a process to which just now we have nothing similar. I think it might be a very useful addition to our practice, not only in the case of the service of heirs, but in maritime questions where we have a very fluctuating set of witnesses. They may leave the country before an action can be brought and their evidence taken. Of course that might not be the very best kind of evidence, but it might be the best you could get in the circumstances.

3975. It would secure evidence that you would lose at a future time?—Yes. I am a good deal connected with maritime matters. I happen to be solicitor for six Marine Insurance Offices, representing interests of the value of upwards of a million sterling, and cases frequently come before me where questions of collision have arisen. You have the seamen at hand, but all you can do just now is merely to take a precognition. The men go away, and you do not know where they have gone. Now, if we had some means whereby we could get their testimony preserved, it would be an advantage. It might not, as I say, be the very best evidence, because you cannot always get a contradictor; but still, if it is taken before a judge, it is certainly of some value; so that I would be in favour of the introduction of the English procedure, with probably an addition to it. If I remember rightly, the English statute only applies to parole evidence, and does not allow the recovery of written evidence; but if any such remedy were to be introduced here, it would probably be as well to make it apply to both written and oral evidence.

3976. Mr. Webster.—I presume that would only be made available if the party could not be brought forward at the proper time when the trial takes place?—Yes.

3977. The Chairman.—With regard to written evidence, might there not be some danger of its being abused, having no contradictor, or a contradictor not being forthcoming?—Of course it might be, but I think the benefits would counterbalance the disadvantages.

3978. With regard to the proceedings for the service of heirs, have you any observations to make? Are there many cases of that kind?—Of course we have a good few of them in our courts. I don't know that there is anything particular to be suggested with regard to them.

3979. Does the present system work satisfactorily?—So far as I have seen, it has done so. It has been thought that there might be an extension to heirs of provision of the combination of the general service with the special service of the same nature. Under the Service of Heirs Act, you can include a general service along with a special service as heir of line, although the lands may be in one jurisdiction and the deceased may have died in another; whereas, in other circumstances, you require to have your general service in the jurisdiction of the deceased, or before the Sheriff of Chancery. I was not instructed to put anything before the Commission on this subject; but a doubt was started, although departed from, in one case that came under my notice, whether there was the power of combining the two together in the case of an heir of line. I am not, however, prepared to make any special suggestion.

3980. Mr. Webster.—Are you satisfied with the mode in which the evidence is taken under the Service of Heirs Act?—It is a little loose, but I have not seen any instance where it has been abused.

3981. In cases of special service, are the titles examined by the resident Sheriff or by one of the Sheriff-clerks?—Well, I am not behind the curtain. The only time or times on which I was called upon myself, acting as honorary substitute in the absence of the Sheriff, to do it, the whole papers were brought before me.

3982. Mr. Baxter.—Have they always been so in any cases which you have had yourself?—Of course I am not beside the Sheriff-substitute when he decides the cases.

3983. But you produce all the papers?—Yes. I am satisfied that in our case it is fully advised.

3984. Mr. Webster.—As to the mode of appointing executors in cases of intestacy, are you satisfied that the system of procedure there is a good one? In services of heirs there must always be evidence; in application for the appointment of executors there is no evidence if there is no opposition?—No, in the latter case there is none.

3985. Are you satisfied with both systems?—I see nothing in practice to find fault with.

3987. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that, after passing, they should be excluded from practising as agents in any town?—I do not think they should.

3989. Mr. Shand.—But if they have any privileges beyond that, do you not think these would be in a different position?—Yes; these should be reserved to the individuals.

3990. What do you assume would be the advantage to the public of the change you propose?—I do not see any great advantage it would be to the public, because, as I have said, I do not think there would be much change amongst the members of the profession. I do not think they would often go from one part of the country to another.

3991. Mr. Webster.—Upon the second point, as to abolishing exclusive privileges, does it not happen sometimes that a person trained in one part of the country ultimately settles in another part where there are exclusive privileges, such as Aberdeen or Glasgow, or here, and that although that person is found to be suited for carrying on business in that district, yet, from not having served his apprenticeship there in his earlier days, he cannot possibly get admitted?—Quite so. However, that is more a matter for the individual than for the public.

3992. But when the public cannot get the services of a man who has been found well qualified for the business, is the public not practically a loser?—Well, of course the public are entitled to have all the talent of the country at command.

3993. Mr. Shand.—It has been said that, under the present system, business is excluded from the Court of Session which would otherwise find its way there, and that if the changes you suggest were adopted, that would not be so. Do you concur in that opinion?—I don't think it would be so.

3994. Your own experience does not lead you to think that?—No.

3995. Mr Paterson.—Would it affect your view as to disregarding the exclusive privileges of chartered bodies, if their charter allowed the admission of any one, provided his qualifications were proved by a sufficient test?—I would of course have only one test, that is, admission through the proper channel to begin with; and I would say that that test should be sufficient for the kingdom at large.

3996. What is the test you refer to?—I say that if a procurator were to go before an examining council, for example, and to get the proper certificates of admission, that should give him admission in any county, and entitle him to be put upon the roll of the place where he is to practise. I think he should need no further test.

3997. Then, on being certified, do you think he should be qualified for admission into any body of procurators in Scotland, having more exclusive privileges?—Yes.

3998. Would you exclude him from participation in any funds which this body may have accumulated; and would you liberate him, on the other hand, from paying any entry fee?—Yes, unless he chooses to pay the fees.

3999. Would you make that voluntary?—Yes.

4000. Do you not consider that some evil might arise from that, if you take an exclusive county where a pretty severe test, at least a reasonable test, is applied, including attendance at so many classes at college, besides having served an apprenticeship? I suppose you approve of such tests as these?—I do to a certain extent. I have seen them applied rather early.

4001. Might not an inferior class of practitioners come and claim to be admitted, and thereby neutralize all this?—They should not have been admitted as practitioners.

4002. Mr. Baxter.—Are you not aware that, under the Procurators Act, every person who enters into an indenture after that Act goes through an examination in general knowledge?—Yes, I think sometimes a little too much.

4003. But that is necessary?—It is.

4004. Mr. Paterson.—Would you take all that upon a general certificate?—Yes.

4005. Mr. Webster.—Would you make that apply to practice in the Court of Session too?—I am not prepared to make any distinction.

4006. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make upon the liability of country agents for expenses?—Yes. We think that is a very great hardship, because the country agent has very little pecuniary interest in the expenses of a Court of Session action—almost none. There is an alternative, but a very unpleasant one, left to the country agent; and that is, to stipulate with his Edinburgh friend that he is not to be responsible. At the same time, it is not fair to the country agent, that while he is without any proper share of the profit of the Edinburgh case, all the responsibility should be laid upon him by his own client in the country, and with all the feeling before him that if the case, however well managed by the Edinburgh agent and by the country agent, is unsuccessful, he gets most of the blame. The Edinburgh agent has there an advantage over the country agent in this respect, that he can get his responsibility shifted over so far upon the counsel, who again are not responsible, so that ultimately the greater part of the blame comes to be upon the country agent, who gets next to nothing. Therefore I think, if there is to be any change in that respect, we ought to be relieved from that.

John William Thomson.

4007. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think that that deters country agents from encouraging clients to come to the Court of Session?—I think it has that effect.

4008. Mr. Paterson.—Would it be a remedy for that if the auditor of the Supreme Court allowed charges to the provincial agent in every instance where he thought these charges were necessary, or incident to the case, but did not involve a double agency?—Yes, if properly carried out.

4009. Mr. Shand.—Is not that the existing rule?—As it is worked out, it is all double agency. There is nothing left to the country agent at all. Some of our faculty think it might be possible to allow the country agent to prepare the summons in the Court of Session. Just now the course which is taken is this: The client instructs the country agent, and he prepares a memorial containing a statement of the case, which is sent over to the Edinburgh agent. The Edinburgh agent then communicates with counsel; but in many cases I understand the Edinburgh agent prepares the summons, and that is sent for revisal to counsel. The draft, when revised by counsel, comes back to the Edinburgh agent, who transmits it to his correspondent in the country for re-revisal. Now, some of our people think that if the country agent, instead of putting a statement of the case in the form of a memorial, were allowed at the outset to put it in the form of a summons, it would be better. It might not be absolutely correct; but still the facts would be there, and then let that go over as the summons in place of a memorial. That might then be revised by counsel, and so save a good deal of intermediate work and expense. That has been suggested.

4010. Mr. Paterson.—Do you think many provincial practitioners would avail themselves of that right, if they got it, to prepare Court of Session writs?—I don't know that they would; but they might have it in their power.

4011. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that clients in the country are able to conduct a case without the intervention of a local agent?—I don't think they are.

4012. Mr. Shand.—If agents were found entitled to practise in all courts, as you propose, would that very much remedy all the evils you have spoken of?—I don't think it, because I don't think they would exercise the power. I don't think, for instance, they would come to Edinburgh.

4013. Don't you think it would lead to some arrangements between Edinburgh agents and agents in other parts of the country, which would counteract those evils?—Do you mean with regard to the division of expenses?

4014. Yes?—That has been suggested, that there should be a division of the costs of the action in a reasonable way between the Edinburgh and the country agent. How that can be done, of course we are not prepared here to say.

4015. Mr. Paterson.—That would be matter of arrangement between themselves, of course?—Yes.

4016. Mr. Webster.—Would there not require to be some increase of the fees, in order to admit of such a division?—I think there would.

4017. A considerable increase?—It would indeed.

4018. As to this matter of the responsibility of the country agent to the Edinburgh agent, is it at all usual for the local agent, in asking the Edinburgh agent to conduct a piece of business, to afford information as to the circumstances of the client, where he has any doubt about him being perfectly responsible, and intimating that, having made this frank communication, he will not expect the business to be undertaken by the Edinburgh agent unless he is quite satisfied to take the client as his sole debtor?—I know that is sometimes done, and I have done it myself. I think it is all that can fairly be required. If the country agent puts his Edinburgh correspondent in possession of a fair account of the circumstances, and of the means of the client, I think it is really then the case of the Edinburgh agent. He may refuse to take the employment. Of course it is incumbent on the country agent to keep his Edinburgh friend advised of everything which would have induced himself to give up the charge. That is only fair and right; but beyond that, I think there is nothing that should be of much consequence.

4019. Mr. Paterson.—Is it an uncommon thing in a commercial community, that a client is perfectly reputable and perfectly responsible at the commencement of a suit, and becomes insolvent long before it terminates?—That does happen sometimes.

4021. Mr. Baxter.—As an honorary Sheriff-substitute, do you take the declarations of prisoners?—I do, and I invariably dictate them.

4022. Do you ever see any wish to entrap a prisoner?—No; I never saw that attempted, nor the least approach to it.

4023. Have you seen questions pressed upon him against his inclination?—No; certainly not.

4024. Has your experience been quite the reverse?—Yes.

4025. Mr. Shand.—Do you think these appointments of honorary Sheriff-substitutes are very necessary?—I should think they are very useful, because there are occasions when the Sheriff-substitute must necessarily be absent; and it is a great matter to get formal orders speedily pronounced. There is no interference with the general duties of the ordinary Sheriff-substitute.

4026. Do you regard such appointments as indispensable?—In a large town such as Dundee, they are indispensable.

4027. Mr. Baxter.—In Dundee there is no unprofessional gentleman who holds such an appointment?—No.

4028. Mr. Webster.—And these substitutes, of course, never act in matters where they are professionally employed?—Never.

4029. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestions to make?—I observe in the paper furnished to me, that the second division is with regard to other local courts than those we have been referring to.

4030. What have you to say with reference to them?—I am speaking more now from what I have been told by others, than from my own personal experience. As to Small Debt Courts, it has been suggested that there should be some notice as to what the nature of a defence is to be in Small Debt cases; for the pursuer may have to bring all his body of witnesses, and there may be no evidence required. It is thought that probably this might be remedied by something like a notice to be given by the defender when he is cited, of the general nature of the defence that is to be stated, or by the alternative of a first and second diet: a mere appearance at the first; and if there is to be a defence stated, then an adjournment. But probably some notice, however general it might be, of the nature of the defence might be given beforehand. Whether that can be practically carried out I don't know; but it has been suggested, because there is a good deal of expense incurred where parties bring witnesses from the country, and a great deal of trouble also, when they come forward and find either that the defender is not prepared to go on with his case, and it is adjourned, or that the evidence, which has been brought together at a great expense and trouble, may not be required.

4031. That applies to the Small Debt Courts, whether before the Sheriff or the Justices?—It would do so in effect.

4032. Mr. Paterson.—Might there not be some difficulty in working that out, say in the case of an illiterate defender?—What you mean I suppose is, that the nature of the defence should be indicated by a written note sent to the pursuer. Well, in that case there might of course be some little difficulty; but if the course were followed, of the parties appearing at the time of the citation, and the defender telling his story, it could be seen then whether it would be necessary to have any witnesses present. The statement might be made, and the case adjourned; but just now the pursuer cannot insist upon an adjournment. If the Sheriff says he must go on with his case, he must go on, and he must have his evidence present; whereas if he had the option of coming himself and telling his statement, and getting the defenders, and seeing the proof that would be necessary at the adjourned hearing, it might be a saving of expense, if the other plan could not be managed. There are some small points with regard to the Small Debt Act which I have been asked to mention. For instance, if the pursuer does not appear to support his case, it is not merely dismissed, but by the Act absolvitor takes place, and he must apply within a month to get a re-hearing. If he does not do that, it is not dismissal, but absolvitor. It is thought that is a defect which might be remedied, by letting the case stand simply upon a dismissal, and that no hardship could accrue. The pursuer would then have an opportunity afterwards of bringing a fresh action, instead of being put out of court altogether.

4034. How long is it to stand as a dismissed case? When is the defender to have a res judicata or a judgment?—The usual prescriptions would of course come into play on the claim.

4035. Then dismissal and absolvitor would be practically the same thing, only the party would require to appear within a certain time?—Yes.

4037. Mr. Webster.—Has he not to come to the court each time he is cited?—That is a matter of expense.

4038. Mr. Paterson.—But you do not mean that there should be a dismissal every week, although the pursuer should not appear? You would not go on dismissing it over the fifty-two weeks in the year?—No. There is a day on which the case must be called in court. If the pursuer does not appear, then the case would just be dismissed.

4039. Suppose that happens on the first occasion, what happens on the second?—The case is gone, and will not appear again unless the pursuer raises a fresh action.

4040. In the second action the same thing may take place again. It will be dismissed if the pursuer does not appear?—Yes.

4041. Mr. Campbell.—And if the defender asked for dismissal with expenses, the Sheriff, I suppose, would have it in his power to award such expenses as the circumstances of the case required?—That is what is suggested.

4042. Mr. Baxter.—Is that not what happens in the ordinary court, that he does not get an absolvitor?—That is the difference between the two. In the ordinary court there is a dismissal with expenses. In this case it is not merely a dismissal, but an absolvitor. The claim is gone for ever, unless the pursuer chooses within the month to ask for a re-hearing. That is one of the suggestions I have been asked to make. There is another suggestion that has been made,—that Small Debt sequestrations should apply to sequestrated effects liable to hypothec, whether upon the premises or not. If the effects are not on the premises at the time the sequestration is taken out in Small Debt form, the landlord requires to put in a separate and ordinary petition to the court. It has been suggested that that should have the effect of an ordinary sequestration; and that they should be at liberty to sequestrate effects, even although not on the premises.

4044. The Chairman.—Which way would they have it?—Three years; that the same length of time should apply in the one as in the other. Then defenders are allowed three months within which to apply for a re-hearing, if the decreet is not implemented. It has been suggested that there is no necessity for limiting that. If the pursuer chooses to press his case, he may get it brought to that; but the defender should be allowed to apply to get the case re-heard so long as it is open. That is in the case of decrees in absence. It has been further suggested, that some remedy should be applied in small ad factum præstandum cases, which are not admissible within the Small Debt Court,—whether some means could not be devised to allow them to be tried there. Suppose both parties were agreeable to it, they could not take it into the Small Debt Court just now; but if both parties are agreeable, it is suggested that there is no reason why small cases of that class should not be tried in the Small Debt Court. There is another subject which has come pretty prominently before us in our own locality, and that is the expense of working out provisional orders under the Police Act. I do not suggest any remedy; but I may state the fact. We have had one instance where about £1200 was found to be the value of the property which was to be valued under the provisions of the Act, and the expense of finding out that value was not less than £500 a side.

4045. Mr. Webster.—Was that by jury trial?—Yes, by jury trial under the provisional order, but settled, I understand, on the eve of trial. There was another case nearly about the same time, where there was a claim by a tenant whose property was taken away by the order, and it was referred to arbitration. The preparation, however, began under this provisional order; and the expense there was about £100 a side, the value found being £70. Then we have had similar cases under the same rule, under the Railway Acts. We have some very striking instances there. There was one in particular, where a piece of land, ultimately valued at about £4000, was sought by a railway. The expense on each side to get at that value of £4000 was upwards of £1500.

4046. Was that by a jury trial?—Yes, by a jury trial. I believe the expenses of the proprietors were restricted from £1500 to £800 by taxation, but still I believe they stood at £800.

4047. The Chairman.—How long did that trial last?—I think it was three or four days.

4048. How would you remedy that?—I can scarcely presume to suggest a remedy; but I think the principle of arbitration should be carried out in these cases if it is possible.

4049. Mr. Shand.—In the last case you have mentioned I believe there were three counsel a side taken to Dundee for the trial?—There were.

4050. The Chairman.—Have the parties not the option to arbitrate under these provisional orders?—The owner has. I do not know whether it might not be possible to reach these cases by the Sheriff enjoining the parties each to name an arbiter, and naming another himself, and let these persons of skill decide it.

4051. Mr. Paterson.—How was that extraordinary expense incurred? I have heard that six counsel were engaged. Were the other expenses incurred for witnesses and men of skill?—I have no doubt it was just by excessive evidence.

4052. Were these extra expenses inevitable, looking to the nature of the proceedings, or might they not have been greatly restrained by those conducting the case?—I was not in the case myself. The only possible answer I can give to that question is to ask you to look at the taxed costs. The taxed expenses allowed were £800, and that will furnish you with a test.

4053. Mr. Webster.—Do you think the agents who conducted the case deemed it necessary to incur that expense?—Surely they did. They thought the interests of their clients required it, and they were so far justified by that very large taxation.

4054. The Chairman.—Then the remedy you suggest is, that the Sheriff should have a power to compel them to arbitrate?—I do not suggest any remedy, for I do not feel myself competent for that; but I think that might meet it.

4055. You think parties should not have a right to go before a jury?—Yes.

4056. Mr. Paterson.—Have you any instance in view of an arbitration where the parties agreed to limit their witnesses to a given number on each side?—No; but I should think that a very useful thing if it could be done. If persons of skill were there, and had some control of the case before them, it would be a very useful thing, so as to prevent that excessive overlaying of a case with evidence. There was incidental allusion made before to Sheriff-clerks. That was one of the points I was desired to bring under the notice of the Commission. We would very much desire that they attended personally to their duties. That matter was so far brought forward before.

4057. The Chairman.—Does the statute not require their residence?—I think it requires residence, and our clerk is resident in the county.

4058. Is there not a statute requiring personal performance of the duties?—I don't think it. I am not aware of any statute of that kind.

4059. Mr. Baxter.—The duties of the Sheriff-clerk's office in Dundee are performed by a young lad—a depute?—Yes.

4061. Mr. Baxter.—Appealing them where?—To the Supreme Court; whether an arrangement could not be made for arriving at the real value, or something like the value, in cases of that kind before they are removed into the Supreme Court.

4062. Have you known any instance?—There was a case reported lately—I think last year—where a single sheep was found to be a sufficient groundwork for an advocation. I think it had been bought for something like £3, 10s. That case was advocated on a dispute with regard to the delivery of the sheep.

4063. The Chairman.—Does that not fall under the class of cases to which the limit applies?—Some of the judges on the bench said it was impossible to tell what the value of a sheep might be. It might be a specimen sheep. In this case it had actually been bought for £3, 10s. or £3, 15s., and it was wished to apply that rule; but the court said they could not do that, because it might be of more value than the limit allowed. However, it might be desirable if some means could be fallen upon for remedying that. Perhaps the Sheriff, before allowing an advocation, should take proper means, by evidence or otherwise, to satisfy himself as to what might be the value; and that the court of appeal should, ante omnia, when the case comes before it, say ay or no to the accuracy of the Sheriff's judgment upon the value. If it is found that it should not have been brought there, then it may be stopped on the threshold.

4064. Mr. Webster.—Would there not be as great an expense in ascertaining that first point as in deciding the case?—I don't know that.

4065. Mr. Shand.—I suppose the certificate by the Sheriff of what was in his view the value of the case would practically serve the purpose?—I think so.

4066. Your suggestion is for the purpose of excluding from the court of review cases that should not be there, and cases that would not be there except that they are in the form applicable to cases ad factum præstandum?—Yes.

4067. The Chairman.—Is there a Justice of Peace Court held in Dundee?—There is.

4068. Is that a satisfactory court, on the whole?—I believe it is. I am told it is a popular court—that they have sometimes as many as 70 or 80 cases, sometimes more. They have an excellent assessor, which is one inducement to go to it. I think it is a good deal resorted to, and that it gives satisfaction.

4069. Are there any criminal cases brought before the Justices?—They have, of course, various statutory powers.

4070. But I mean in practice?—I am aware they have excise cases, also cases as to seamen's desertions, servants' desertions, and others.

4071. Have you a Dean of Guild Court?—Yes, we have. Before we go from the Justice of Peace Court, allow me to make one remark. It has been thought that if these courts are to be preserved, there is a sort of meaningless exclusion by the Justice of Peace Act which should be remedied. By that Act the Justices are not allowed to take up a case with regard to spirituous liquors—that is, where spirits are charged for in an account.

4072. Do you mean the Tippling Act?—No. It applies to cases where spirituous liquors are part of an account, whatever may be its amount. The Act constituting the Justice of Peace Court prevents them from taking up cases where spirituous liquors are involved.

4073. Do you think that is meaningless?—I think it is useless, if these courts are to be retained.

4074. Mr. Webster.—Do you approve of preserving the Justice of Peace jurisdiction in small debt cases, or would you merge the whole in the Sheriff?—I would be rather disposed, from what we see of it in Dundee, to let the public go to the Justice of Peace Courts if they like them. They seem to get cheap and satisfactory justice there.

4075. Mr. Shand.—What do you say as to the jurisdiction of the Justices in offences under the game laws? Do you think it is desirable it should remain, or should it be altered? Is there any public opinion on the subject?—I have had no experience on that, except in connection with the Inland Revenue. There is another thing that comes across my mind with regard to the Justice of Peace jurisdiction, and that is as to the Quarter Sessions. In our county they are held at the county town of Forfar. Now, were it possible, it would certainly be a convenience in many cases if they were held at the principal seat of population in the county. At present parties and witnesses are obliged to attend at Forfar when a quorum of Justices could easily be got at Dundee; but whether that can be remedied or not, I don't know.

4076. Mr. Baxter.—That happens mostly in the licensing of public-houses?—Yes, very much; and I have had to do with it in Inland Revenue cases.

4077. Mr. Paterson.—Would that not be remedied by dividing the county into wards for the Justice of Peace jurisdiction, as we do in Lanarkshire?—Well, I don't know how that would work, but it might be done.

4078. The Chairman.—Have you a Dean of Guild in Dundee?—Yes.

4079. Does he hold a court?—He does, when occasion requires.

4080. What do you mean by that—'when occasion requires?'—He does not hold a court at stated times. When an application is put in for a specific purpose, then of course he hears the parties.

4081. Is there much resort to the Dean of Guild Court?—Yes; it is generally applied to.

4082. Mr. Baxter.—That is, when you must go?—Yes; when you must go.

4083. Mr. Paterson.—Is it an heritable jurisdiction?—It is a very simple one, and we generally get justice done at it.

4084. Is it done satisfactorily?—Whenever I have had anything to do with it, it has been done satisfactorily.

4085. Mr. Baxter.—By the assessor?—Yes, by the assessor. You get your object very speedily accomplished. There is a visitation immediately; the parties are brought face to face, and the exchange of statements and views at the visitation generally settles the case. I think in almost every case.

4086. Mr. Webster.—Are the proceedings conducted before the Dean of Guild under the Act of 1825?—It is under the old Act.

4087. Mr. Harrison.—Does the jurisdiction of the Dean of Guild extend over the whole town?—Only over the royalty.

4088. Mr. Paterson.—By whom is he appointed?—By the Guildry.

4089. Is he a member of the Town Council?—Yes, ex officio.

4090. Who is the assessor?—He is a lawyer.

4091. He is not town-clerk?—No. It is a separate office.

4092. Does the Dean of Guild sit alone, or has he the assistance of 'liners,' as we call them?—He sits alone with his assessor.

4093. The Chairman.—Have you any burghs of barony or regality in your county?—We have. I think Kirriemuir is a burgh of that kind; but I am not familiar with them. We have a baron bailie in the Hilltown of Dundee.

4094. Does he do anything?—I sometimes hear about him, but I never was present at any of his proceedings. There are what are called 'birleymen' of the barony.

4095. Are they not valuators?—They are employed more in 'lining' out boundaries. I have heard of cases where neighbours were going to build; and instead of going through the formalities of an application elsewhere, they would just get the bailie of their suburb and his 'birleymen' to go along with them, and to point out the boundaries. I do not, however, speak from personal observation.

4096. Mr. Baxter.—Is not the Burgh Court in Dundee almost falling into abeyance in civil matters?—I have not been within its walls for many years.

4097. It used to be an important court?—Yes, and a very useful court, until the Sheriff Court swallowed it up.

4098. The Chairman.—Did it exercise a police jurisdiction in criminal matters?—Yes; and cases under the Forbes Mackenzie Act are still tried there. John William Thomson.

4099. Is there a special Act for Dundee, or is it under the General Police Act?—It is under the General Police Act.

4100. Mr. Gordon.—Is it the Act of 13 and 14 Vict.?—Yes, the old Police Act. The magistrates sit as judges in the Police Court.

4101. Mr. Shand.—Do you see any advantage in keeping the Commissary Court as a separate court from the Sheriff Court?—None.

4102. Do you think it should be merged in the Sheriff Court?—I think so, and more especially the fees should be changed.

4103. Mr. Webster.—Do you think the Commissary-clerk's fees are too high?—No, they are not out of the way; but the table of fees in the Commissary Court are perfectly ridiculous, and there is a note appended to the table saying we must charge no more. If you put the fees for an intestate estate alongside the fees for a testate estate of the same value, the one is ridiculous.

4104. Mr Gordon.—Which is the lower?—Those for an intestate estate are ridiculously small. The other is the Edinburgh table of fees, of which we do not complain.

4105. Mr. Baxter.—Who licenses the public-house keepers in Dundee?—The magistrates.

4106. Does that give satisfaction?—I would not like to enter into that. I don't want to interfere with them. I don't meddle with the licensing.

GEORGE HARRISON, Esq.	ADAM PATERSON, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

JOHN GAIR, Esq., examined. John Gair.

4107. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner before the Sheriff Court of Stirlingshire?—I am.

4108. How long have you been so?—For twenty-five years and upwards.

4109. You are also Procurator-fiscal at Falkirk?—I am.

4110. Have you held that office long?—I have held it for upwards of twenty-five years.

4111. There are two Sheriff Court localities in Stirlingshire, one at Falkirk and one at Stirling?—Yes.

4112. Is the larger amount of business at Stirling or Falkirk?—The larger amount of civil business is at Stirling; the larger amount of criminal business is at Falkirk.

4113. Does it appear to you that, with a view to the convenience of parties, the maintenance of police, and economy to the public, one of these seats of a Sheriff-substitute might be dispensed with?—I do not think so at all.

4114. Have you any statement of the number of investigations you have made in criminal cases, and have you any classification of these investigations?—For the present year I have not classified them, but I shall state shortly what has been done in the Falkirk district during the present year. We have had, up till yesterday, 441 prosecutions and trials in summary cases during the year. The Sheriff-substitute has had to sit to try these cases 185 days; on several days diets of trial have occurred oftener than once, prisoners being brought in in the after part of the day, after the first business was over. In these summary prosecutions, fines have been imposed to the amount of £390 for fineable offences, and of these fines about £340 has been recovered for the public. These are the summary prosecutions tried before the Sheriff without a jury. We take, for public convenience, all our jury trials at Stirling, and the jury trials are diminishing in the county. Besides these summary cases in the district, we have had 40 investigations of cases of sudden death—deaths in coal-mines, by accidents from machinery, on railways, by drowning, and from other accidental causes. We have had about 6 or 8 investigations as to accidents in coal-mines, serious accidents, but not resulting in death. These investigations were directed from the Crown Office. We have only had a few jury trials last year, and not many Circuit Court cases, our higher classes of crime being diminishing, as they are generally, I believe, in the landward districts in Scotland.

4115. Can you tell us the number of sentences of imprisonment that were pronounced in these cases?—In all the cases of fines there is the alternative of imprisonment failing payment of the fines.

4116. That is, in the summary cases?—Yes; in all cases of theft, unless it be a trifling theft from gardens or fields, or the like, to which a small fine is appropriate, there is, as a matter of course, sentence of imprisonment without alternative of fine.

John Gair.

4117. Would you state the number of sentences of imprisonment without such alternative?—I shall give you the details of the whole criminal trials in the county, from classified lists made up for the year from 16th March 1867 to 15th March 1868 inclusive. In the Falkirk district during that year, there were 607 persons tried, of whom 110 were tried for theft, fraud, or other offences against property, and 108 convicted; 129 were tried for assaults and other offences against the person, and 124 convicted; 368 were tried for trifling assaults and breaches of the peace, etc., and 363 convicted—total, 607 persons tried, 595 convicted, and 12 acquitted. Of the 595 persons convicted, 70 were sentenced to imprisonment without fine, and 525 were sentenced to imprisonment with the alternative of a fine; and of this latter number 480 paid their fines, and 45 failed to pay, and suffered the alternative sentence of imprisonment. The amount of fines imposed and bails forfeited during the year in these Falkirk cases was £465, 6s. 6d., of which £421, 17s. was recovered and remitted to Exchequer. During the same year 40 cases of sudden death, 5 serious accidents in mines, and 3 serious fires, were investigated in the Falkirk district, and reported to Crown counsel. In the Stirling district of the county, during the same year, 29 cases of sudden death, and 10 serious accidents in mines, were investigated and reported to Crown counsel; 430 persons were tried, of whom 118 were for thefts, frauds, etc., and 312 for assaults, and other offences against the person, breaches of the peace, etc.; and of these 419 were convicted, and 11 acquitted. Of the 419 persons convicted, 130 were sentenced to imprisonment without fine, 18 were put under caution, etc., and 271 were sentenced to imprisonment with the alternative of a fine; and of these, 240 paid their fines, and 31 failed to pay, and suffered the alternative sentence of imprisonment; and the amount of fines imposed and bails forfeited in the Stirling cases was £141, 3s., of which £124, 5s. 6d. was recovered and remitted to Exchequer.

4118. Can you tell me the longest and the shortest period of imprisonment to which any party was sentenced last year?—The longest imprisonment in summary cases is 60 days; the shortest was about 8 days.

4119. Of those sentenced alternatively to imprisonment or fine, can you tell what number paid the fine?—The great majority have paid the fine. I should say that nine-tenths pay the fine. The precise numbers for 1867-68, were 796 persons fined, and of these 720 paid the fine.

4120. In what class of cases is the alternative punishment pronounced?—Assaults with the fist, or without weapons, breaches of the peace in colliers' villages at Saturday night pays, and so on. These are the prevailing cases of the district—assaults and breaches of the peace.

4121. What is the largest amount of fine that has been imposed?—I should say that £4, 4s. is the highest this last year.

4122. And the smallest may be very small?—It may be very small.

4123. A few shillings?—Yes.

4124. Are you in use to couple with the sentence of fine any obligation to keep the peace?—The Sheriff has that always in his power by the form of the complaint; and in cases where it seems advisable, he exercises it.

4125. In Falkirk is there any police separate from the county police?—There is the burgh police; and the cases which I have referred to are cases occurring beyond the burgh, except the cases of theft, which the magistrates of the burgh prefer that the Sheriff should try, although occurring within the burgh.

4126. Mr. Gordon.—These are more serious cases?—Yes. Where there is no alternative of fine, they think such a case is better to be disposed of by the Sheriff.

4127. The Chairman.—The magistrates exercise criminal jurisdiction within the burgh?—They do.

4128. Do they exercise that jurisdiction under the powers of their Police Act?—They do so under the powers of their Police Act, which amalgamates the General Police Act for Scotland.

4129. They have a special Act?—Yes; and it amalgamates the General Act for police purposes.

4130. Mr. Gordon.—Is that the Act of 1862, or the 13 & 14 Vict.?—The 13 & 14 Vict. Our special Police Act was got before the Act of 1862 was passed.

4131. The Chairman.—Can you tell me the number of cases tried before the Burgh Court?—In the burgh of Falkirk, during the same year, 231 persons were tried before the burgh magistrates for assaults, breaches of the peace, and other minor offences, and for being found 'drunk and incapable,' of whom 229 were convicted and 2 acquitted; the amount of fines imposed in these burgh cases being £87, 12s., and the amount recovered and paid into the burgh funds £57, 15s. The number is considerable, chiefly because Falkirk is the market town for a large district of miners. They come into Falkirk on Saturday nights, and generally drink what money they have, and end in quarrelling. A great many of them do that, and these are the cases that occur in Falkirk.

4132. Do you think it useful that the magistrates should have jurisdiction in these cases?—I think it useful that magistrates within burghs should have criminal jurisdiction in police offences committed within their burghs.

4133. Have you found any jarring or difficulty between the county and the burgh police?—Our county police and burgh police are one. The burgh police of Falkirk are combined with the county police.

4134. Do you think that an expedient arrangement?—I think it is. I may mention that, when the Falkirk burgh went to Parliament for a Police Bill, they asked power to have a local police. That provision passed the House of Commons, but in the House of Lords it was struck out, in the view that it would be better for a place of the size of Falkirk to be associated with the county for police purposes.

4135. Mr. Smythe.—What is the population of Falkirk?—From 9000 to 10,000.

4136. Mr. Baxter.—Have you found any collision or jarring with the county police in the discharge of your duties as Procurator-fiscal?—I, as Procurator-fiscal—and I can speak for my brother Procurator-fiscal at Stirling—have never found any jarring between our duties and the duties of the police. We have in each district a police officer attached to the Fiscal for criminal duty; and when we require the assistance of more than one, we get, as a matter of course, every assistance which we require from the police. The police act under our directions as criminal officers in all matters which we are engaged in investigating, the Sheriff being thoroughly recognised by the Chief Constable as the head magistrate of the county.

4137. The Chairman.—You have the authority of the Sheriff, expressed or implied, in what you direct to be done?—The Procurators-fiscal have that authority.

4138. Do you think it would be an expedient thing that Procurators-fiscal should be excluded from private practice?—I do not.

4140. At all events, he would not be a person of the same stamp and class?—I think not, unless the salaries were largely increased, a retiring allowance provided, and the appointment to the office made permanent.

4141. Mr. Gordon.—For these allowances must the Procurators-fiscal find clerks?—They must find all the clerks that are needed to carry on the duties of their office; they must also find stationery; and unless there are county buildings, they must pay office rent, and everything connected with the office.

4142. So that these payments are made not merely for the personal trouble of the Fiscal, but for necessary expenditure?—Yes, for the necessary expenditure of carrying on the duties of his office.

4143. Mr. Smythe.—Under the County Buildings Act the Procurators-fiscal have offices provided for them?—Yes. I myself have only had such an office within the last six weeks, and the Fiscal at Stirling has no such office provided. I have here a note of the allowances made to Procurators-fiscal, salaried and unsalaried, all through Scotland at the present time.

4144. The Chairman.—From what materials did you make it up?—I took it in the first place from the almanac, but I called at the Exchequer Office and verified it there. I may explain that up to 1858 all the Procurators-fiscal of Scotland were paid by fees, according to the work done, and by a table of fees, which was very moderate in its charges as compared with the professional fees allowed to procurators for work done in the country. In 1858 all Fiscals who had drawn an income of £500 and upwards on an average of the five previous years were salaried by Exchequer; and since that time all Fiscals, even with lower incomes, have been invited to arrange with the Exchequer for a salary. Many have availed themselves of this opportunity, and all the Fiscals of Scotland are now salaried except 11. There are 53 in Scotland—42 on salary, and 11 still on fees.

4145. Mr. Gordon.—When you speak of Fiscals having an income of £500, you mean that their accounts amounted to that?—Yes, their business charges.

4146. And these included clerks' work, and payments of that description?—Yes. I have endeavoured to make an estimate of the proportion of the allowance which the Fiscal gets for his own professional services; and while in some cases it may be a little more, and in some a little less, I think I am pretty accurate in stating that about one-fourth of his allowance is required to pay for his clerks and for stationery. In Edinburgh I believe it is more, and perhaps also in Glasgow, and in Dundee; but in the general case a fourth may be deducted from the allowance made to him as his average expenditure.

4147. Mr. Smythe.—What emoluments arise to the Fiscal, qua Fiscal, independent of the salary which he receives from the Exchequer?—There are no emoluments in Stirlingshire except a charge which I believe we are entitled to make against the county, but which the county has refused to recognise for the last twelve or fourteen years, and which we have never pressed against them. These charges are for criminal duties and investigations which do not result in trial, or committal for trial, and are not reported to Crown counsel. They are a small branch of the Fiscal's duty now; and while I think all Fiscals should be salaried, I think they should be salaried for all their duties. The proportion of the duties for which we are not salaried, and for which we consider we have a claim against the county, may be stated in my own case at £20 or £25 a year; and in the case of the Fiscal at Stirling, at a little more.

4148. How are investigations as to sudden deaths paid?—We hold that these are covered by the allowances made to us from Exchequer. They were not included in the average on which our salaries of 1858 were struck; but there was a clause in the Treasury minute authorizing our salaries, which provided that any additional duties thrown on the Procurator-fiscal by the Lord Advocate or the Treasury should be held as covered by the salary; and though some felt it a hardship to have these sudden death investigations added to their other duties, without additional remuneration, we have made no claim as to these.

4149. Mr. Morton.—Have these inquiries into sudden deaths been very numerous?—In some districts, especially mining districts, they are very numerous. I have had 40 this year.

4150. Have you to pay your own travelling expenses?—We are allowed our travelling expenses from the Exchequer.

4151. Mr. Shand.—These investigations involve a good deal of time and trouble?—Yes, some of them are very anxious.

4152. The Chairman.—Are they thoroughly made?—They are thoroughly and carefully prosecuted. Their origin is recent. They began about twenty years ago. They are conducted under directions of the Lord Advocate, communicated to the Fiscals from the Crown Office. I am not aware that the Lord Advocate has any common law or statutory authority to order such investigations, except in cases where criminality is suspected or alleged. I think it of great public importance that these investigations should be conducted under legal authority; and I would suggest to this Commission, if any Act of Parliament follows on its labours, whether some legislative provision should not be made authorizing the Lord Advocate to direct investigations of that kind. My observation applies not only to cases of sudden death, where no crime or suspicion of crime is alleged, but also to investigations in cases of fire. We have a recent instruction from the Crown Office to investigate all cases of fire occurring within our district. The instruction is, that the Procurator-fiscal is to investigate the origin and cause of all fires occurring within his district, wherever a fire has taken place under circumstances of suspicion, or wherever extensive destruction of property has taken place, or life has been endangered by fires. That I believe to be a most useful investigation.

4153. Mr. Baxter.—And it is rather an onerous one?—Yes; and it is looked on with great favour by the public.

4154. The Chairman.—Have you had any such investigations yet in your district?—I have had several.

4155. Are they reported to the Crown Office?—They are reported to the Crown Office. A careful precognition is taken; or if it is seen from the first that it is a mere accident, a formal report is made, with a note of the names of the witnesses examined.

4156. Mr. Shand.—Your investigations of sudden death are not confined to cases of accident?—Certainly not. I shall read our instructions upon that subject: The Procurator-fiscal is charged with the duty of investigating 'all cases of death within his district, in which there is any suspicion or reasonable ground for supposing that the death may have been occasioned by violence, or by culpability of any kind; also all cases of death from accident within his district, and all cases of sudden death from other than known natural causes; also all cases of suicide, and cases in which a person is found dead, and is not known to have died from natural causes.' These instructions are carefully fulfilled.

4157. Mr. Smythe.—Do you consider that the Procurator-fiscal fulfils all the duties that are done by a coroner, under the system of coroners' inquests in England?—We do all the duties under a Sheriff's warrant here. The Sheriff is probably in the position of the coroner, but the Procurator-fiscal practically does that work.

4158. You don't think there is any need of a coroner's inquest in this country?—I do not.

4159. Mr. Shand.—Your precognitions in these cases are forwarded to Crown counsel, by whom they are ultimately disposed of?—Quite so. They have the direction of the future disposal of the case. If on the face of the precognitions culpability appears, the party is apprehended and proceeded against, as if he had been originally charged with the crime. If, on the other hand, it is plain that no culpability attaches to any one, the case is closed by an order for no further proceedings.

4160. Mr. Paterson.—These inquiries are conducted privately; the results don't reach the public?—They are not conducted in open court.

4161. Do you consider that there would be any utility in making them public?—There would be no utility in that, so far as I see. So long as we have a public prosecutor in Scotland, who is charged with the direction and control of such cases, and of all criminal cases, it would be useless, and of no practical effect, to have the investigation in public, because there is no one to conduct such investigations with power to acquit a party suspected, or to send a suspected party to trial, or to determine in any way what is to be the result of the investigation.

4162. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the present system avoids injuring the feelings of relatives?—I think it does, in many cases.

4163. The Chairman.—Do you think that publicity would facilitate the escape of a guilty party?—It would do so more than facilitate his detection.

4164. Mr. Baxter.—Have you ever, in your experience, found any conflict to arise between the public duty and the private practice of a Procurator-fiscal?—I have never done so, and I have a pretty extensive private practice—as much as I can undertake consistently with the due discharge of my public duty.

4165. Mr. Paterson.—You are a banker also?—I am agent for the Royal Bank.

4166. You never found your position as agent for a bank in any way to conflict with your duty as Procurator-fiscal?—I never did. Perhaps I may be allowed to make a further remark as to the impolicy of restricting Procurators-fiscal from private practice. I think that, except in large counties, or large places like Edinburgh or Glasgow, every Procurator-fiscal at present has private practice. Crime does not come in a continuous flow, but often by fits and starts; so that, if a Fiscal in a place like Falkirk were devoting himself entirely to his public duties, he might occasionally be idle for a month or so at a time; and I don't think I need tell your Lordship how dangerous it is for a man actively inclined to be an idle man. He would have to be constantly hanging on, every hour prepared for public duty; and perhaps a week, or a fortnight, or a month, might pass without his being required to work. I think, therefore, it is better even for the man himself, and I believe it is also better for the public, that when he is not engrossed with his public duties he should be at liberty to follow his profession. I think it also improves a man's mind to come in contact with his brethren at the bar in matters other than the duties of his office, and makes him something better than a mere police prosecutor, which, if he were debarred from private practice in small places, he would undoubtedly dwindle down to.

4167. The Chairman.—In very large places, such as Glasgow, the amount of criminal business is such as to exclude private practice, I suppose?—Thoroughly to exclude it; and, as a matter of course, in every other jurisdiction where the criminal duty is large, the Fiscal's capability of conducting private business is proportionately limited.

4168. Mr. Baxter.—It will naturally accommodate itself?—It naturally accommodates itself to the public work which he has to do.

4169. The Chairman.—Do you consider that the Fiscal should give a preference in point of time to his duties as Fiscal, over the demands upon him as a private practitioner?—Most undoubtedly.

4170. It is a thing that won't bide time?—No. His public duties must be first attended to; and the clients of a Procurator-fiscal know that, and accept his services on that understanding.

4171. Mr. Shand.—For the conduct of criminal jury trials, which are not uncommon throughout Scotland, I suppose a man of considerable professional ability is required?—I think so. At all events, he has able men to contend with; and if you have an inexperienced Fiscal contending against an able man, the result would naturally be, that he would lose his jury cases.

4172. Mr. Smythe.—Would it add much to the duties of the Sheriff-substitute at Falkirk if he had to dispose of all the criminal cases that now come before the magistrates there?—I think he is quite capable of performing all the duty, and he did so until the burgh magistrates got a separate Police Act.

4174. Mr. Baxter.—It lifts up their office a little?—It does.

4175. Mr. Paterson.—Do they always act independent of their assessor?—I think they do, in police cases.

4177. Mr. Gordon.—Who provides for the expenses of these burgh prosecutions?—They are paid for by the burgh, out of the general police assessment.

4178. The burgh pays for the Fiscal and all other expenses?—Yes.

4179. Mr. Campbell.—The amount of the fines levied covers a large portion of the expense, I suppose?—Yes.

4180. Mr. Gordon.—And these fines go to the burgh?—Exclusively.

4181. Mr. Baxter.—Who is the burgh Fiscal?—Mr. Lewis Stirling is the present burgh Fiscal.

4182. Is he a professional man?—Yes.

4183. Is he Superintendent of Police?—No.

4184. Mr. Gordon.—Who pays for the summary cases which are disposed of by the Sheriff?—The Exchequer.

4185. They are covered by your salary?—Yes.

4186. These are not treated as unreported cases?—Yes, they are what we call unreported cases, that is, cases tried without having been reported to the Crown counsel.

4187. But you hold them to be covered by your allowance?—They are expressly covered by the allowance from Exchequer.

4188. What is it that is not covered by your Government allowance?—It is a very small portion of our work. For example, a housebreaking takes place, and it is necessary for the Procurator-fiscal to make more inquiry than the police have done—to correspond about the suspected party with other Fiscals, and to direct the police as to their proceedings, and perhaps to take a precognition; but the case ends without being reported to the Crown, and without any party being charged with the crime. These are the charges which are not exigible from the Exchequer; but they must be a very small class of cases. They are, shortly, investigations which do not result in the trial or committal of a party for trial. There are other duties performed by Procurators-fiscal in more remote counties, analogous to police duties, and I believe they are charged for in these remoter counties, but that is not the case with us.

4189. Mr. Campbell.—Some counties pay these charges?—Many counties do. They are paid in Perthshire, by a salary of from £50 to £60 at Perth, and about £30 at Dunblane; and they are recognised in almost all counties.

4190. Mr. Shand.—By whom is the appointment of Procurator-fiscal made?—By the Sheriff of the county.

4191. Can you say whether, generally speaking, throughout Scotland these offices have been filled by men well qualified for the appointment?—I think the duty of appointing Procurators-fiscal has been most satisfactorily and faithfully discharged by the Sheriffs.

4192. Are the offices throughout Scotland generally filled by men of experience and ability?—They are.

4193. And of standing in their profession?—Yes.

4194. Is it of great importance to the Sheriff that the Procurator-fiscal should be a man of that character?—No doubt of it. The Sheriff has the greatest interest in having a well qualified Procurator-fiscal appointed.

4195. Do you think it important that he should have a man with whom he can be on confidential relations?—I think so, and one in whose ability and faithfulness he can trust.

4196. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestions to make upon the forms of criminal procedure?—On the subject of the appointment of Procurators-fiscal I should like to make a suggestion. The appointment of Procurator-fiscal expires with the death of the Sheriff who appoints him, or with his resignation, or removal to a higher office. I think it would be beneficial to provide that it should not expire on the occurrence of any of these events. I may also observe, although I have no fault to find with the manner of the appointment of Fiscals, that it would be more satisfactory to the holder of the office if the appointment were made a permanent one, something like the present appointments of Sheriff-substitutes; and in that case I would suggest that the appointment should be made by the Sheriff, subject to the approval of the heads of the court.

4197. Mr. Baxter.—And the dismissal in the same way?—Yes; and, at all events, there should be a provision made, that on the death of the Sheriff the appointment should continue till the new Sheriff is appointed.

4198. Mr. Gordon.—I suppose that practically there is no case of a Sheriff not reappointing the Fiscal?—No. Practically the new Sheriff reappoints the Fiscal whom he finds in office.

4199. Mr. Shand.—Do you know a single case in which it has been otherwise?—I do not; and I think that says a great deal for the Sheriffs. I doubt whether the Sheriff-substitute has power to give a commission in the event of the Sheriff dying; and I think it would be wise to provide for that, even though there should be no other change in the tenure of the office.

4200. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make as to the forms of criminal procedure?—We have at present two modes of proceeding, viz. summary trial, and trial by jury. I think the forms provided for summary trial are as nearly complete and perfect as may be. They are concise and simple, and they have been found to work uncommonly well. They are the forms which were provided by an Act passed so long ago as 9 Geo. IV. cap. 29.

4201. Mr. Baxter.—Sir William Rae's Act?—Yes.

4202. Mr. Campbell.—You still proceed under that Act, and not under the Summary Procedure Act?—We use the Summary Procedure Act; but the forms in that Act are taken nearly verbatim from Sir William Rae's Act. I think, however, that the form of the criminal libel in jury trials is cumbrous and unnecessarily long, and I have taken the liberty of framing a short form, which I think contains all the essential elements of a criminal libel.

4203. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that the summary procedure should be extended in any way?—I think the summary jurisdiction may now be safely extended to cases in which the punishment concluded for does not exceed six months' imprisonment, in a certain class of cases, viz. cases of simple theft or simple assault, with previous convictions. These cases are proved by one or two witnesses. They require no jury to ascertain the truth of the charge; and the only reason why the case is now sent to a jury is, that it infers a punishment greater than sixty days' imprisonment. I think the Sheriff is quite competent to try such cases in a summary form, without a jury, where the punishment concluded for does not exceed six months.

4204. Mr. Paterson.—You are speaking of cases where the crime for which the prisoner is apprehended is simple, but where he is habit and repute?—Or rather where he has been previously convicted two or three times for the same offence. I have almost never libelled habit and repute for years.

4206. He does not now report many summary cases?—No. There must be something peculiar in the case, as to which he wishes instructions.

4207. In the event of the extension which you suggest, giving the Sheriff power in summary cases to sentence to six months' imprisonment, would you leave it to the Procurator-fiscal to determine whether he should report the case to Crown counsel?—No. I think he should be bound to report all cases inferring a greater punishment than sixty days' imprisonment.

4208. Could any rule be defined?—There is no well-defined rule at present. It is left to the Procurator-fiscal advising with the Sheriff-substitute.

4209. Mr. Baxter.—Where there were two previous convictions, I suppose you would report such a case without doubt?—Most assuredly.

4210. The Chairman.—And if you had doubts as to what procedure should be adopted, you would report?—Assuredly. We are invited to do so by the Crown, and we find it a very useful means of relieving us of difficulty.

4211. You were suggesting an improvement in the form of criminal libels?—I think the criminal libel in jury cases, as I have mentioned, is unnecessarily lengthy. A long formal will is appended to it by statute, and that will contains a great deal of unnecessary matter. I think a simple form, following very much the complaint under Sir William Rae's Act, might be adopted in jury cases, and I have drawn out the form which I would suggest. It is: 'In the Sheriff Court of Stirlingshire, the Procurator-fiscal of court for the public interest complains against A. B. (design him), That on the 10th day of October 1868, or about that time, the accused did feloniously break into and enter (describe locus shortly, thus—the booking office of the South Alloa Station of the Caledonian Railway, situated in the shire of Stirling, and occupied by the Caledonian Railway Company), and did there steal seven bank-notes for £1 each, and £1, 5s. 7d. in coin, the property or in the possession of the said company. And there will be produced against the accused at his trial the writings and articles specified in the inventory annexed; and the trial of the accused will proceed in the Sheriff Court House at on the day of at o'clock, for the first diet; and at on the day of at o'clock for the second diet, if necessary.' This would be signed by the Procurator-fiscal; and an inventory of productions, a list of witnesses, and list of jury would be appended; and the Sheriff-clerk would issue a warrant in these terms:—'Place and Date. Warrant is granted to cite the accused to the diets of trial above mentioned; and to cite an assize, and also witnesses for both parties, to the second diet, if necessary.'

4212. Mr. Gordon.—You do not in that form specify the name of the crime?—No, I had thought of that; but on talking it over with several Fiscals, I found that they thought it unnecessary. If it was thought necessary to specify the crime, the form in the example which I have given would run, 'Complains against A. B. that he is guilty of the crime of theft, aggravated by its having been committed by means of housebreaking.' That was my original view, but others with whom I consulted thought it might be shortened. But if I were pressed, I would prefer setting forth in the libel the known name of the crime with which the accused party is charged.

4213. Mr. Shand.—Do you see any reason why a simple form of charge of that kind should not be extended to the Court of Justiciary?—I see none whatever.

4214. Are you of opinion that the indictment in that court is subject to the same objection of being cumbrous?—Yes, with this qualification, that it has no will.

4215. Do you know whether criminal indictments in England have anything equivalent to our major proposition?—They have not.

4216. The Chairman.—Is there any logic in an English indictment?—No, that is not attempted.

4217. Mr. Gordon.—Was the reason assigned by those with whom you conversed on this subject, for avoiding the specification of the crime in the libel, that there was a difficulty sometimes found in regard to what are called 'Innominate' offences?—Yes.

4218. Is it not an advantage that the prosecutor should very carefully consider to what category he is to refer such charges?—I think it is. I think it also relieves the court of difficulty. They might have to determine whether, if there was no statement of the name of the offence, there was an offence at all stated in the indictment.

4219. The Chairman.—It also facilitates the arrangement of statistics?—No doubt it does.

4220. Mr. Shand.—Does the form under the Summary Procedure Act specify the offence?—Yes; it is that A. B. has been guilty of the crime of theft (or whatever the crime may be).

4221. Mr. Baxter.—Do you ever see an indictment with an undoubtedly good minor thrown out on the major?—I have seen a libel with an undoubtedly good minor, but not precisely conform to the major; and in that case the libel was thrown out.

4222. A major could not be got to fit it?—It had been misfitted in that case.

4223. Mr. Gordon.—I suppose that is a very rare case?—It is very rare.

4224. Have you known two cases of that kind?—I cannot say that I have.

4225. Mr. Shand.—Have you anything to suggest as to a power of amending the libel by the Procurator-fiscal?—I think it is important that the power of amending criminal libels, within certain limits, should be entrusted to the court during trial, even after the case has gone to a jury. I think that the provisions of the Summary Procedure Act, sec. 5, might be fairly applied to all criminal prosecutions. It provides that 'no objection shall be allowed by the court to any complaint under this Act, for any alleged defect therein, in substance or in form, or for any variance between any such complaint, and the evidence adduced on the part of the prosecutor at the hearing thereof, not changing the character of the offence charged; but if any such objection or variance shall appear to the court to be such that the respondent has been thereby deceived or misled, it shall be lawful for the court to adjourn the hearing to some future day, and at the same time, or at any stage of the proceedings, to direct such amendment to be made upon the complaint as may appear to be requisite, not changing the character of the offence; and such amendment shall be authenticated by the signature or initials of the judge or clerk of court.' I think that is a wholesome provision, which might be applied to all criminal indictments.

4226. In its terms that could scarcely be applied to a case in the hands of a jury, for it provides for adjournment?—There is an awkwardness there; but if the court saw that the panel was to be prejudiced, the amendment should be refused.

4227. If the amendment is such as is required for the ends of justice, and will not, in the opinion of the court, prejudice the panel in any way, do you see any reason why it should not be allowed?—I think it should be allowed.

4228. Under our procedure, is not notice given to the panel of the crime charged?—Yes.

4229. And a list of the witnesses?—Yes.

4230. And of the productions to be used against him?—Yes.

4231. Do all these give him full safeguards?—Ample safeguards.

4232. Do you think the Sheriff might be trusted with the discretion of allowing amendments in matters of description, taking care that no amendment was allowed which will prejudice the panel?—Yes.

4233. Have you seen the want of that power productive of injurious consequences?—I have.

4234. In many cases?—Not in many cases; but in some, and on very slight grounds.

4235. Mr. Baxter.—A misdescription of the locus, or a slight mistake in the name of the owner of the property?—Just so.

4236. Mr. Shand.—With however great care proceedings are taken, such errors will occur?—Such errors will occur, however carefully the preliminary proceedings have been got up. They may occur from a mistake made by a witness while under precognition.

4237. And therefore you think that there should be power to have such mistakes corrected where it appears clearly that that will not prejudice the prisoner?—I do.

4238. The Chairman.—Would you allow any review by the Court of Justiciary, in regard to such a proceeding on the part of the Sheriff?—I should. The panel, if he felt himself aggrieved, should be entitled to have the review of the Court of Justiciary.

4239. Mr. Baxter.—On a question reserved?—Yes.

4240. The Chairman.—Declarations are taken in presence of the Sheriff in your district?—They are invariably taken in his presence.

4241. Do you attend for the public interest?—I do.

4242. Who interrogates the party accused?—I do.

4243. Does the Sheriff exercise a control in the event of his being of opinion that a particular question ought not to be put?—I have no doubt he ought to do so, and would do so, if he saw occasion for it.

4244. I believe that, though not then a Procurator-fiscal, you were cognizant of what was going on in another district at one time?—Yes.

4245. Have you ever seen, I don't say in your own case, but in any case, any effort made to get the prisoner entrapped into admissions?—Never in my day. I have heard stories of that kind before my day; but I have now been connected with a Procurator-fiscal's business for thirty-five years, in Glasgow, in Perthshire, and in Falkirk, and I don't know of any instance within my own observation where a Procurator-fiscal has attempted to act unfairly by a prisoner. The prisoner is brought before the magistrate, and the charge is carefully read over to him from the Procurator-fiscal's petition. The Sheriff explains to him shortly what the charge is, and cautions him in the usual manner that he is not bound to answer any question unless he choose, because what he does say is to be taken down in writing, and may be used against him at his trial, but cannot be used in his favour. He is then asked if he has anything to say to the charge. If he chooses to make a statement, and states anything requiring explanation, he is asked as to that. I myself place little value on prisoners' declarations, except for the purpose of their explaining their view of the charge. Our declarations are generally short, and don't wander into minute details. After the prisoner exhausts his statement, or after the Procurator-fiscal has no more questions to put relating to any point in his statement upon which he thinks explanation necessary, the declaration is read carefully over to the prisoner, the Sheriff having dictated it all through; and he is then asked if he has anything more to say, or if he desires to make any correction on what has been taken down. If he says he has nothing more to say, he is asked to sign the declaration; and if he declines to do so, or if he says he cannot write, it is signed by the magistrate in his presence. A docquet is then written out and signed by the Procurator-fiscal, the Sheriff-clerk who has written it, or his clerk, and the officer who has been present, attesting that the declaration was truly and voluntarily emitted by the accused party while in his sound and sober senses, and was adhered to by him after being read over, and was signed by him or by the Sheriff, as the case may be.

4247. Is the presence of these parties not a check upon such a thing?—A powerful check. I don't see how it is possible.

4248. The Chairman.—When the trial comes on, we shall suppose, in the Court of Justiciary, the prosecutor is under obligation to prove that the declaration was freely and voluntarily emitted?—He is.

4249. And unless the prisoner admits it, the prosecutor must put in the box witnesses who were present at the whole proceeding?—Yes.

4250. And the counsel for the accused has the opportunity of cross-examining these witnesses?—Yes, as to all that passed at the examination.

4251. Mr. Campbell.—In practice, the declaration is almost invariably admitted?—Almost invariably.

4252. Does that not seem to imply that prisoners generally have nothing to complain of in regard to the way in which it is taken down?—Quite so.

4253. Mr. Shand.—You say you think the chief value of the declaration is that it explains the prisoner's view of the charge?—Yes.

4254. Do you not think the prisoner should have the right to have the declaration laid before the jury as an element for their consideration?—I have heard it asked, and I have seen it refused by the prosecutor; the prosecutor holding that it is not evidence for the accused party, but evidence which he, the prosecutor, may or may not adduce as he thinks fit.

4255. Seeing that you consider its value to consist in its containing the accused's view of the charge, do you not think that he should be entitled to have it read to the jury as an element for their consideration in disposing of the case?—I should say so, if he and his counsel desire it.

4256. You think that privilege should be given to the accused?—I think so. I may say that I think in many cases, if it were done without the application of the prisoner's counsel, it would hamper him in his defence.

4257. But if he and his counsel desire it, do you think the privilege should be given?—I see no reason why it should not.

4258. As to the system itself, do you not think it would be better that the magistrate or Sheriff should simply ask the accused if he desires to make any statement in reference to the charge, without detailed questions being put?—I think it would. I see no reason why we should not follow that practice, which I believe to be the practice in England, where the charge is stated to the party, and he is asked if he desires to make any statement upon the subject.

4259. You think that no further question should be put to him?—Yes.

4260. And if he does make a statement, he should not thereafter be questioned in detail?—If the statement is intelligible in itself.

4261. Do you think that a better system than the system which at present exists?—Yes.

4262. Mr. Baxter.—Is that not the general practice?—It is becoming the general practice. There is far less value placed by prosecutors on prisoners' declarations than used to be the case in former days; and I think it would be a useful rule if it were universal, that the prisoner should just have the charge read to him, and be asked if he has any statement to make. That is becoming the general practice.

4263. The Chairman.—Does it ever happen that the statements which the accused makes in his declaration lead you to inquiries which result in your not proceeding with the case against him?—It does. He may, for instance, allege an alibi; and if that alibi is made out by immediate precognition, the case ends there.

4264. Or he may allege any of various things?—Yes. I have mentioned the alibi as one which I have had not infrequent experience of.

4265. May it not happen that an ignorant prisoner might not know what was meant by your asking him if he has anything to say, without your putting to him the salient points, and asking if he has any explanation to give upon these?—I think the judge might do that if he saw that the prisoner would not be prejudiced by such a course.

4266. Mr. Campbell.—In cases of assault, where a good many persons are engaged in the disturbance, it must frequently happen that a person who is not the most guilty is apprehended; and if he is stupid and confused, it may be an advantage to him to be interrogated as to the circumstances of the case, so as to absolve himself wholly, or in a great measure, from the charge made against him?—Such a case may occur; but unless the assaults are serious, the accused are tried summarily without examination. But cases may occur where it would be desirable, in the interest of the prisoner himself, that questions should be put, and I would leave that to the judge examinator.

4267. Mr. Shand.—Has the prisoner the protection of an agent in making such declarations?—That is strictly disallowed.

4268. If he asks to have a legal adviser present, that is not permitted?—It is not.

4269. Do you think that is right?—I don't see any good that it would do to have a legal adviser present. I have seen it reflected upon by the Court of Justiciary, that before a prisoner had been examined an agent had been allowed access to him. If the object is to get at the truth, and if the prisoner chooses voluntarily to make a statement, I don't see that it is for the public interest that he should be prevented from making it, or that he should be advised by his agent not to make it.

4270. But as the object is to protect the prisoner as well as to get at the truth, don't you think it a reasonable thing that he should be entitled to advise with those who are to conduct his defence before he should be called upon to emit any declaration?—In that case I should place no value whatever on his declaration as a production to be made thereafter. I would then say, that unless the prosecutor chose, the declaration should not be used at the trial.

4271. Do you think that the declaration would not have value, although emitted after the accused had had an opportunity of advising with his agent?—I don't think it. I think it would be the statement which his legal adviser thought most likely to get him off at the trial, whether truthful or not.

4272. Is it not the case in England daily, in criminal prosecutions, that after the witnesses are examined the party is allowed to make a statement, but that during these examinations he has the protection and advice of an agent?—I know it is. At the same time, I know that before the prisoner sees an agent at all in England, if he chooses to make a statement to the policeman who apprehends him, it is good evidence against him; and I believe the policeman is obliged to tell him that he need not say anything unless he likes. I would look on a declaration made by a prisoner, after getting the advice of his agent, as of no value.

4273. Mr. Smythe.—Does the declaration, as at present emitted, ever operate in favour of the prisoner?—It does.

4275. Mr. Shand.—The same result might be brought about by the prisoner giving information to the Procurator-fiscal, accounting for the circumstances in which he was placed, even without the formality of a declaration?—Yes.

4276. Mr. Paterson.—Have you known cases where the prisoner's declaration got its favourable character for him very much through the interrogation of the Procurator-fiscal?—I cannot say so.

4277. In the case of an illiterate accused person, where you see from the context that there is something more which, if brought out and explained by him, would be in his favour, have you not known that done?—In my practice, the prisoner is allowed every opportunity of making any statement he chooses; and if he has not explained himself sufficiently, he is asked further about it.

4278. In that case, do you consider that the interrogation is beneficial to the prisoner himself?—No doubt of it.

4279. If an agent were allowed to attend at the taking of the prisoner's declaration, might that not lead to his interfering and asking questions?—Of course it must, otherwise he is of no use there.

John Gair.

4280. Do you think that would be of any utility?—I don't think it.

4281. Mr. Campbell.—It is the special duty of the Sheriff to take care that the prisoner has made himself fully intelligible, especially where his own interest seems involved?—Quite so, if the prisoner chooses to make any statement at all.

4282. Mr. Shand.—Might the prisoner not have an agent present for the simple purpose of giving him advice, and of asking the judge to clear up any point on which he thought the examination defective?—I would consider that equivalent to cross-examination.

4283. Even though he does so for the protection of the prisoner?—Yes; of course he would not suggest any question unless it was for the benefit of his client.

4284. Mr. Baxter.—Do you always examine witnesses in exculpation where they are suggested?—Invariably.

4286. The Chairman.—Would you give him that power in cases tried without a jury?—No; only in those cases where the prisoner, having already suffered a long imprisonment, commits a trifling offence of the same kind, and the prosecutor has these numerous convictions to fall back on. These cases should be tried before a jury.

4288. What class of cases?—Chiefly theft.

4289. Assault?—I am not aware that they come to be cases where, upon previous conviction, a sentence of penal servitude is pronounced.

4290. Mr. Baxter.—Have you seen cases in which the distinction between robbery and theft was very slight?—I have.

4292. Mr. Campbell.—I suppose, in your experience, cases are frequently tried before the Sheriff, and punished with sentences of pretty protracted imprisonment, which cases, if they had been tried at the Circuit, would have been, almost as a matter of course, visited with sentences of penal servitude?—That is so.

4293. And the mere convenience of speedy jail delivery has probably been the only motive which induced the Lord Advocate to send these cases to the Sheriff for trial?—That is so, and especially where such crimes occur shortly after a Circuit Court.

4294. Mr. Shand.—Are you in the habit of having the libel read in court before the trial?—It is read at the first diet.

4295. Do you think that should be done away with?—I think it would be an improvement to do away with that.

4296. Mr. Baxter.—Do you not think that the long interlocutors which we have at present in criminal cases before the Sheriff might be very much abbreviated?—I think so.

4297. Mr. Paterson.—In cases where accused parties are liberated on bail, can you tell us the number of those who forfeit their bail-bond, as compared with those who appear at the trial?—I would not like to state the proportion, but a very small number forfeit their bail-bond, and the class of men who do so are chiefly men of position who have committed a violent crime, it may be suddenly, or men in business who have been defrauding their creditors.

4298. The more common class of offenders generally come to trial?—Yes.

4299. What is the range of the penalty in the bail-bond on the average number of offences in your district?—From £10 to £50.

4300. In determining the amount of the penalty in the bail-bond, what elements do you take into consideration?—The man's position, and his ability to find a reasonable amount of security for his appearance.

4301. And in cases of theft, the amount of the stolen property?—That is an element.

4302. Mr. Baxter.—There is a maximum?—Yes, a maximum fixed by the Act 1701.

4303. Are you satisfied with the law of bail as it stands?—No; I think it is capable of considerable improvement. At present the prisoner's right to be liberated on bail is limited to that class of cases which in former times were not capital. In all such cases the Crown counsel have to give their consent before the accused is admitted to bail; but in other cases which were not formerly capital, the prisoner, as a matter of right, gets out on bail. Now, such a man may have defrauded his creditors to a very large amount, and it may not be expedient to allow him to be liberated on bail. I think in all cases, except cases of murder, rape, and fire-raising, which are still pleas of the Crown, and also robbery, the committing magistrate should have the power of admitting to bail, and should take into consideration the nature of the crime with which the party is charged, and also fix the amount; and that if the committing magistrate has fixed the bail too high, or has refused bail, the accused party should have the power of appeal to the Court of Justiciary.

4304. The Chairman.—Do you think the committing magistrate should have the power either to admit to bail or to refuse?—I think so.

4305. And if he admits to bail, to fix the amount?—Yes.

4306. With an appeal to the Court of Justiciary?—Yes.

4307. Would you give such an appeal to the prosecutor also?—No; I think that unnecessary. I think the magistrate, in fixing the amount, will have the public interest in view.

4308. Mr. Shand.—Are there any existing regulations as to the amount of bail?—Yes, the regulations contained in the Act 1701.

4309. Do you not find, in practice, that in many cases these regulations prescribe an amount which is too low?—Yes.

4310. What cases do you specially refer to?—The cases to which I refer are principally cases of breach of trust and frauds of large amount, and cases of forgery.

4311. The result of the bail being fixed too low, is that the party does not appear at the trial?—That is so, especially in cases of fraud and forgery.

4312. Mr. Paterson.—In cases of theft, or fraud, or embezzlement, should the penalty in the bail-bond ever be less than the amount involved in the charge?—I think there are cases where that would be an extreme penalty.

4314. Mr. Shand.—The amount of the fines and forfeited bail-bonds goes to Exchequer?—Yes.

4315. How much in a year may go to Exchequer in that way from Stirlingshire?—The amount in 1867–68 was about £525, composed chiefly of fines; but this, I think, is above the average.

4316. The Chairman.—Does anything occur to you as to the privilege of prisoners, under the Act of 1701, to run their letters?—No; I think that Act works well in its present form.

4317. Do you think it would be expedient or not expedient to make a simple notice to the prosecutor enough, without the necessity of taking out letters formally, and paying fees for them?—I think that would be an improvement, and the simpler and less expensive such a form could be made the better.

4318. Have you any other observations to make in regard to matters criminal?—No.

4319. In regard to matters civil, have you any observations to make as to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of Sheriffs and their substitutes?—I approve very cordially of the constitution of the Sheriff Court, consisting of a resident Sheriff constantly at his duty, with a review by a barrister practising in Edinburgh; but I guard myself against being held to approve of the present system of one Sheriff reviewing his substitute's decisions, and I should like to reserve what I have to say as to that until we come to speak of the courts of review.

4320. Have you any other remark to make upon the constitution of the court?—None. I think it is a most valuable institution—a local Sheriff performing duty on the spot, with a review within the court in some shape.

4321. Have you any observation to make on the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in civil matters, as to whether it should be extended?—I think it may now with benefit to the public be extended to cases from which it is at present excluded. I think, putting it generally, the Sheriff might have something very like the jurisdiction that a Lord Ordinary has at present, subject to certain limitations which I shall explain. I think it is not expedient that in the Sheriff Court cases of legitimacy or marriage should be tried; but the analogous case of divorce is, I think, a fair case for the Sheriff Court, for the sake of parties in poor circumstances; for I know cases of individual hardship arising from the utter want of means of parties to bring their cases in the Supreme Court. As to questions of heritage, and generally suspensions, declarators, and reductions, which are now only competent in the Supreme Court, I think they may now with perfect propriety be permitted to litigants in the Sheriff Court, the pursuer having the power of commencing his case in the Sheriff Court, and the defender being at liberty, if he chooses, to allow it to be ended there. But I think also it might be better, in the meantime, that the defender, if he desires it, should have the right of asking its removal at a very early stage of the case from the Sheriff Court to the Court of Session; and in heritage, if there is to be a limit at all, I think that heritage of the annual value of £50, as appearing in the valuation roll, should be the amount which would entitle the defender to require the removal of such a case to the Court of Session, and perhaps a value of £500 in other matters, leaving the Sheriff to satisfy himself in any way he chooses as to the alleged value of the subject under litigation.

4322. Mr. Baxter.—You mean that you would give the defender a right to have it removed above that limit?—Yes.

4323. Mr. Paterson.—Is it £50 of rental?—Yes. I think the pursuer should have the power of bringing the case before the judge ordinary if he chooses. If it be such a case as would not naturally end there, in all likelihood it would not be brought there; but I think the pursuer should have the right to bring his case in the Sheriff Court in the first instance, and that, the defender not objecting, the Sheriff should have the right to determine it.

4324. The Chairman.—If, after proceeding a short way, the case should appear to be one which would not naturally terminate there, would you allow the pursuer to remove it?—I would allow either party to do so.

4325. Mr. Shand.—You are aware that there is a power at present to remove to the Court of Session cases of the value of £40, on an order for proof being pronounced in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

4326. Do you not think it is making too great a difference to substitute £500 for £40?—I don't think so.

4327. Would you give the pursuer bringing an action in the Sheriff Court involving £500 the absolute right to keep it in the Sheriff Court?—I would, except in the extended jurisdiction which I have suggested. In all matters of jurisdiction now competent to the Sheriff, I think the pursuer should have the right to have judgment in his action, let the amount be what it may.

4328. Mr. Baxter.—Subject to appeal?—Yes.

4329. Mr. Shand.—Are there not many cases in which the sum in dispute is below £500, where the defender might very reasonably desire to have the decision of the Supreme Court without going through the Sheriff Court?—If he reasonably desires it, he will get it in the end. I think the pursuer has as good a right to have a reasonable desire in the matter as the defender; and if he brings the case in the Sheriff Court, I think he should have a right, except in the extended class of cases to which I have referred, to have the Sheriff's decision. The defender has the privilege of ultimate appeal to the Supreme Court.

4330. Might the defender not reasonably desire to have the case taken to the Supreme Court at an early stage, without incurring the intermediate expense in the Sheriff Court?—I think the pursuer has as good a right to his judgment in that matter as the defender.

4331. The pursuer, however, thereby adds to the expense if the case is to go to the Supreme Court?—The expense of any unnecessary intermediate proceedings in the Sheriff Court is added.

4332. Don't you think that would be a disadvantage, where the sum involved is nearly £500, and where the defender is resolved to have the decision of the Supreme Court?—I don't think the disadvantage is so great as to entitle the defender to take the case at once to the Supreme Court.

4333. Mr. Paterson.—Would there be any difficulty in adopting the rent as appearing in the valuation roll as conclusive of the real value of the subject involved in the action? I mean more particularly that a case of this kind might occur, that for the sake of trying an heritable question involving property of a very large rental indeed, you might bring a multiplepoinding, and take the rent of one tenant, which is under £50?—Yes.

4334. Does that present any difficulty to your mind, as to taking the sum in the valuation roll as the value of the particular subject mentioned in the action as the test of the real value involved in the action?—I think the party should have the power of showing to the Sheriff that it involves a value of more than £50.

4337. Mr. Webster.—The expense of the case before the Sheriff is not entirely thrown away, because the records and the evidence are still preserved?—Yes, and are used in the Supreme Court.

4338. Mr. Paterson.—You think there is no disadvantage in the case going on in the Sheriff Court?—That depends on the care with which the record is made up, and the skill of the judge before whom it is made up.

4339. Would there be no disadvantage in questions of a feudal character?—I should not say so. The day has been when country practitioners knew little of conveyancing or of legal titles, but their education has improved, and the position of the resident Sheriff is better than it was in those days. I am therefore of opinion that in many questions of heritage the Sheriff's jurisdiction might be extended.

4340. Dr. Barclay.—Is not the subject to be studied very much simplified?—Most assuredly.

4341. Mr. Paterson.—On what ground do you draw the distinction between actions of legitimacy and of marriage, and actions of divorce, in making the one competent before the Sheriff, and not the other?—In actions of divorce the parties may be poor people, having no means to try their case in the Supreme Court. The consequence of that is, that they form improper connections, and live in an improper manner; and the husband, it may be, is exposed to claims during his whole lifetime, by an abandoned woman who had been his wife. A case occurred within my own knowledge which I shall take the liberty of mentioning. A working man was deserted by his wife seventeen or eighteen years ago. She has led an abandoned life since. She is now getting old and infirm, and she has gone on the parish, he conscientiously refusing to support her after her long abandoned life. Many years ago he applied to an agent in order to get a divorce; but on being told that it must go to the Court of Session, and that the expense would be £25 or £30 at the least, he said it was impossible for him to raise that amount. The parish from which the woman is getting relief is now threatening him with a prosecution because he does not comply with what is still, unfortunately for him, a legal obligation. If that man had the option—and there are many other cases of the same kind—of bringing his case before the Sheriff Court, he would probably have got a divorce for £5 or £10.

4342. Dr. Barclay.—Would you not be content with having the action of divorce a mensa et thoro competent in the Sheriff Court?—No.

4343. Are you not of opinion that it would tend to immorality to make divorce too easy?—I don't think it would. If a rich man is entitled to divorce in the Supreme Court, a poor man should be entitled to it on the same ground in the inferior court.

4344. Mr. Baxter.—That lesser remedy would not meet the case which you have mentioned?—No.

4345. Mr. Paterson.—You have a large mining population in your district, and you indicated something of their habits and character by saying that they come into Falkirk on Saturday evenings, and drink, and quarrel, and give occasion to criminal cases. In that view, do you think that a cheap and easy divorce would be an unqualified advantage?—I know no state of society in which a man, if entitled to a divorce, should not be entitled to have it in the cheapest way consistent with public policy.

4346. Do you say the same of a woman?—Yes.

4347. Mr. Shand.—Assuming that good grounds of divorce exist, you don't think that it should be made a question of money whether a man is to obtain decree of divorce or not?—That is exactly my view.

4348. Mr. Paterson.—As to a mining or other population, in which morality is a little lax, don't you think a cheap and easy divorce might induce persons to resort to that remedy, who in other circumstances might live together all their lives?—I don't see where you can draw the line.

4349. Mr. Gordon.—If the consequences were so serious, that might have a contrary effect?—Yes.

4350. Mr. Adam.—Would you approve of any safeguard against collusion, such as giving information to the Procurator-fiscal in these cases?—I have considered that, but I don't see that it could work well. I think, however, that the judge should satisfy himself by every means that there is no collusion. I would give him power to remit to a public officer of some kind whenever he thought it necessary on public grounds.

4351. Dr. Barclay.—You don't think the oath of calumny sufficient?—Not at all sufficient. The judge, wherever he suspects collusion, should have the power of ordering an investigation, and in all cases should satisfy himself that there is no collusion.

4352. Have you formed any opinion, from your long experience as a Fiscal, as to the propriety of having in Scotland the verdict of not proven?—I see little benefit from it, but it often satisfies the mind of a jury.

4353. Does it not give them an easy mode of getting out of the performance of their duty?—Yes.

4354. Mr. Adam.—Do you think there might be more verdicts of guilty if the verdict of not proven were abolished?—I think there would, if the issue was between guilty and not guilty.

4355. Dr. Barclay.—Don't you think it a disadvantage that a man should go out of court tainted with a verdict of not proven?—No doubt.

4357. They never do that unless they have doubts?—Perhaps not.

4358. If they have doubts, should not the panel get the benefit of the doubt?—Then it should be a verdict of not guilty. The only good that a verdict of not proven does, is that it relieves the mind of a jury.

4359. The Chairman.—It reflects the mind of the jury upon the case?—Quite so.

4360. Dr. Barclay.—Have you formed any opinion as to the propriety of requiring unanimity from the jury in criminal cases?—I think the opinion of the majority is preferable. I don't know how it works in England; but in Scotland it is exceedingly difficult to get 15 men or 12 men to agree.

4361. Mr. Webster.—What is your view as to the number of jurors?—I think in criminal trials we might reduce the number greatly. I think 9 would be fully as useful a number as 15.

4362. Dr. Barclay.—What proportion would you have of special and common jurors?—6 common and 3 special.

4363. Mr. Shand.—What advantage would you expect from the change?—The great advantage would be, that the public would not be called so often as jurymen.

4364. Mr. Baxter.—Can you suggest any plan by which it should not be necessary to summon 45 jurymen, in the event of there being only one case for trial?—I would suggest that at the pleading diet, the prosecutor and the panel should in all cases exhaust their challenges; and that if, after the pleading was over, only one case remained for trial, only one half of the jury panel should be summoned, instead of 45, as at present.

4365. Mr. Gordon.—How would you exhaust the challenges? At present the prisoner may challenge 5 of the 15 called?—He has 5 challenges out of the first 20, and I would give him that power still. The jury roll might be called after he had pleaded, and then he would exhaust his challenges.

4366. Mr. Shand.—But if you allow more than that number of jurymen to come at the next diet, he would have more challenges?—Supposing 22 jurymen were brought instead of 45, he should have additional challenges corresponding to that number.

4367. Mr. Baxter.—Could you not make the Crown challenge at the first diet?—The Crown very seldom challenge.

4368. Dr. Barclay.—You might reduce the number of the challenges?—The number of jurors might be reduced to 27, or probably even to 21, if there was a panel of 9.

4369. Have you formed any opinion as to the line of demarcation between common and special jurors?—I see very little difference between them now-a-days.

4370. How is that ascertained?—The person who takes up the jury list satisfies himself.

4371. Have you not observed that many men are special jurors whom you would have expected to see as common jurors?—Yes.

4372. And some common who ought to have been special?—Yes; and very likely that arises from the parties asking to be put in as common or as special jurors.

4373. Have you discovered any reason for the distinction between special and common jurors?—No; I have not. I think the duty of taking up the jury list is rather loosely conducted at present. The Sheriff-clerk and his deputes ought to be the parties to do it. At present it is done by men out of the department of the Sheriff, and therefore it is not so accurately or so carefully done as if it were under the exclusive charge of the Sheriff-clerk, and suitable remuneration allowed for the work.

4375. And schoolmasters?—Collectors, and inspectors, and schoolmasters throughout the country, who know the people round about. But we have now the valuation roll, and I think the Sheriff-clerk might do it in a more deliberate manner than it is done at present.

4376. Mr. Webster.—How could the Sheriff-clerk in a large county manage the work?—He should do it by his responsible deputes and clerks. It should be worked within the office of the Sheriff-clerk.

4377. Dr. Barclay.—Do you think the pleading diet is an improvement?—No doubt of it.

4379. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know how the office of Sheriff-clerk is conducted at present?—I know that it is held by gentlemen appointed by the Crown, and that they employ deputies. I think that they now live generally at the county town, and to a certain extent perform their duties in person; but they employ deputies under them at the county town, and also at the other towns where Sheriff Courts are held.

4380. In some places they don't do much?—I believe not. In Stirlingshire the duties are uncommonly well and carefully done by Mr. Galbraith. He attends constantly in his office, and he has competent deputes at Stirling and at Falkirk.

4381. Dr. Barclay.—Is he not also city-clerk?—He is town-clerk of Stirling.

4382. The Chairman.—In regard to jurymen, do you think that the distinction of special jurors might be more easily dispensed with by reason of the late removal of exemptions from jurymen?—Yes, I think that is a material element in the consideration of the matter.

4383. With regard to challenges and diminishing the number of jurymen, would you proceed in this way at the first diet, and only in the event of the accused pleading not guilty, that you would then in the first instance strike off a certain number of the jurymen who were last on the list?—Yes.

4384. And then from the remaining names alone the panel must exhaust his challenges?—I think that would meet all the difficulties, and it would retain the last on the list for service at the next court.

4385. Do you think it expedient that jury trials should be introduced before the Sheriff in matters civil?—I do not think so.

4386. What are your objections to that?—I think that, so far as I have seen of jury trials in the Supreme Court, the verdicts are not so satisfactory as to warrant the extension of jury trial to the inferior courts. Even in the Supreme Court, with a judge of the highest ability to direct and guide them, and with a practised bar, you find jurymen going astray often. I don't think we are at all prepared for jury trial in the Sheriff Court. I have not such confidence in the verdict of a jury, that I would ask them to judge in any matter in which I had much at stake.

4387. You would prefer the judgment of the Sheriff?—I would.

4388. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think that the public generally are disposed to place more confidence in the judgment of the Sheriff than in the verdict of any ordinary jury which could be got to sit in the Sheriff Court?—That is my observation of public feeling. They trust more to the Sheriff's judgment, even on matters of fact, than to the judgment of a jury.

4389. Dr. Barclay.—How would it answer to make jury trials optional, as it is in the County Courts in England?—We would require to adapt our system to a new state of things, which I don't think we, as a local bar, are prepared for. I hold the opinion that it is not beneficial to the public to have matters of fact settled by a jury in small cases, and therefore I don't think they need have the option of it.

4390. Mr. Campbell.—Do you think they are asking for any such option?—I don't think so.

4391. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make on the forms of pleading in the inferior court, or as to the mode of investigating facts?—Perhaps your Lordship will allow me to refer to the extending of the Sheriff's jurisdiction in other matters. From the Legislature having passed the Debts Recovery Act of last session, public opinion has come to the conclusion that a debt of £50 may be safely recovered in a summary form before the Sheriff. I think the provisions of the Debts Recovery Act ought to be applied to all classes of debts, so that merchants' accounts, servants' wages, and so on, need not have a privilege which is denied to other debts. But I think also that there need not be two sets of forms under the Debts Recovery Act and the Small Debt Act; and that the forms under the Small Debt Act may be practically applied to all claims amounting to £50, giving to litigants the right of appeal, with the consent of the judge, even down to a very low amount, in matters of law; and giving them the right of appeal, without the consent of the judge, in all claims above £12, both in law and in fact. To try the appeal in the smaller cases, I think it should be sufficient that the judge should state a case for the opinion of the court of appeal. That case may be prepared by the parties or by the judge, but at all events it should be settled by the judge; and the decision may be given without a hearing by the court of appeal, unless both parties or either party ask for a hearing. In the larger class of cases, from £12 to £50, I think there should be a right of appeal to the court of review, both in fact and law; and to get at proper elements for such an appeal, the Sheriff would require to preserve notes of the evidence, in some shape or other, either by his own notes or by the notes of a shorthand writer.

4392. Dr. Barclay.—Although the parties dispensed with it?—No, not if the parties dispensed with it.

4393. Under the Debts Recovery Act the Sheriff only takes notes if he is required to do so?—I think that is a wise provision; and where he is not required to do it, the parties must be held to have dispensed with it.

4394. Mr. Shand.—And thereby to acquiesce in the decision of the Sheriff-substitute?—In matters of fact; but there would still be the appeal in matters of law.

4395. In cases between £12 and £50 would it not be necessary that, in addition to notes of the evidence, some record of the pleas should be made?—Yes; I think it would be desirable for the defender to put in a short plea, or for the Sheriff to note a short plea for the defender; so that there should be a short minute made by the judge or lodged by the party, in order to preserve a record of what his defence is.

4396. Mr. Gordon.—Would you make provision for a reply?—Yes; I think that would follow. If the defender desired it, the pursuer should state his reply, because I think it is for the advantage of the defender to make the pursuer state a reply to his defence.

John Gair.

4397. Mr. Adam.—Do you think it is a good form of process to bring the parties before the judge to state their pleas in his presence. Does that bring them more to the point?—In small cases I think it is exceedingly useful to have the parties before the judge; and with an intelligent judge, who gives his mind to the duty, it is really very satisfactory work.

4398. Mr. Baxter.—You would not have an appeal without an oral hearing, where parties wished it?—No.

4399. The Chairman.—Do you think that the various forms in the Sheriff Court procedure might be assimilated more than they are, by a short form of writ and statement of pleas?—I think the original writ bringing parties into court might be made a very short document—an order on the party to appear to answer to the claim, with a short statement of the claim annexed to the order of the judge.

4400. That in all cases?—That in all cases, the great object being to get decree in absence without much cost at the first. The shorter the writ by which parties are brought to the court, I think, the better.

4401. Dr. Barclay.—Have you had much experience in cases of filiation and aliment?—No, I have not.

4402. Have you had any cases of perjury arising from the law allowing the defender to be examined?—I have only had one information of perjury in a bastardy case, but I rather think they are more frequent.

4403. Mr. Adam.—Would you object to give the right of appeal below £12 with consent of the judge?—No; I think the judge should have power to give his consent below £12.

4404. Take the case of liability to a rate or toll, or any general question involving a small amount?—I think the judge would like that that should be appealed.

4405. Dr. Barclay.—I suppose the judge would only refuse his consent where he was satisfied that the appeal was taken for the purpose of delay?—Of delay, or for causing unnecessary expense.

4406. Should the Sheriff not have power to refuse his consent even above £12?—I think that a party should have the right of appealing, and that that right should not be lightly controlled. I think it is exceedingly useful for all judges to know that there is an appeal against their decisions. It makes them careful in the first place, and it gives the public more confidence in their judgment.

4407. The Chairman.—Have you anything further to say on the subject of pleadings?—I think that the original summons, being of a short and clear description, might be met by a short minute in defence; and that minute should state simply what is admitted by the party, or what is denied—perhaps what is admitted is enough; and should state any plea the defender has, or any counter claim he has against the action, as shortly and simply as can be done, and that the pursuer should be required to reply to that defence; and the record ought to be closed on that, if it can be done. There may be cases, and there often are cases, where it is impossible, within the limits of such a short paper as I have in my mind, to state the case of the parties fairly or fully, so that each knows what the other has to say against him, or in support of his case; and I think, therefore, it should be in the option of the judge to permit a condescendence where he sees it is necessary for the fair statement of the case on either side; but that the judge shall exercise that option discreetly, and with due attention to the case before him, and not grant it as matter of course when asked by the agents.

4408. You think that should be an exceptional matter?—Yes; and that the condescendence should be as concise as possible, without going into minute details.

4409. How would you enforce that?—By the Sheriff striking out and disallowing what he thinks irrelevant and unnecessary. I don't think that is a duty which is sufficiently exercised by Sheriffs at present. On the contrary, I think they are rather indulgent towards the practitioners, and allow too much of what is written to remain, and the agent who has written too much to get payment for it, where he ought not to get it, either from his client or from the opposite party.

4410. Is there not some difficulty in the judge knowing at that stage whether the matter alleged by the pursuer is or is not relevant and important to his cause?—I think there is difficulty, and it requires that the right of striking out should be carefully exercised. All quotations from documents should be disallowed. The document should be mentioned, and parties allowed to open it. Many minute details also should be disallowed, they being merely facts in support of a general statement. No doubt it will require care and discretion on the part of the judge, and he will wisely allow statements to remain on the record even though they may be such as to the relevancy of which he has a doubt.

4411. Mr. Paterson.—In the Sheriff Court at Falkirk, is the record made up by condescendence and answers in the majority or in the minority of cases?—In the majority of cases there is a condescendence.

4412. Is it ever followed by a revisal?—Yes, I have seen that done, and I entirely disapprove of it. I think the original paper is one which ought to remain, because I have seen a new case presented to the Sheriff after the pursuer had seen the defence. I think the original condescendence should remain, and there need not be any revisal unless new matter is stated by the defender, requiring an answer from the pursuer.

4413. Would it not be well, in cases of that character, that those papers should be ordered at once at the pleading diet?—I think it would.

4414. That would supersede the necessity for a short defence, and then a reply?—Yes; whenever it is obvious, from the statement of the parties, that the defender has a separate case to make out, the original order should be for condescendence and defences, and reply by the pursuer.

4415. You would still give the reply?—To new matter raised by the defender.

4416. Would there not be some risk of that practice degenerating into the old defences and replies, and condescendence and answers afterwards?—That should be guarded against.

4417. But that would be a difficulty to be guarded against?—I think there should be an order authorizing the pursuer to state his case in a condescendence, with an order on the defender to answer that, and to state any separate case he has to set up; the pursuer being in like manner entitled to answer that case, and nothing more. I think that might be done without any risk of extended pleadings, and there the record would be closed.

4418. But seeing that in the majority of cases in your court the record is so made up, would it not avoid delay and expense if the revised defences and answers were ordered at the pleading diet?—I think so. Wherever a condescendence is necessary, there need be no minute of defence at the pleading diet.

4419. Mr. Baxter.—Are there many cases in which a long record is made up where the short record might suit?—I think there are. I think the long condescendence is allowed in too many cases.

4420. Dr. Barclay.—The award of expenses contemplates a check for that?—Yes.

4421. Mr. Baxter.—But is that carried out?—No, not sufficiently.

4422. Mr. Paterson.—Is it not a difficulty in the way of imposing a fine, that the question is raised whether the procurator or his client has to pay it?—I think an honourable procurator would have to pay it out of his own pocket; but some procurators might not be of that mind, and would debit their clients with it.

4423.—Do you ever find difficulties in adducing your evidence where the record is in the short form?—No; it is a great advantage to parties who want to manage a case without letting the other party know what is in it, to do it in the short form.

4424. Would your opponent not consider that a difficulty?—He has the advantage, on the other hand, of not having disclosed his case too much. The disadvantage of the minute is, that the pursuer is not required to reply to it. He should be required to reply to it.

4425. The Chairman.—Do you consider it an advantage, that at the earliest possible stage, the case of each party should be disclosed to the other?—I think so; and in practice in the Small Debt Court that is the case where it is well worked. The judge hears what the pursuer has to say; he asks the defender what he has to say against it; and if it is a simple case, it is settled very quickly.

4426. When there are written pleadings, do you think it should be an object, in settling the style of these pleadings, to bring out the case of each party at the earliest possible stage?—I think so.

4427. In regard to cases in which condescendence and revised defences are allowed, and you say a reply by the pursuer on new matter, would that not be in answer to the defender's statement of facts?—That is what I mean. The reply would be limited to that.

4428. Is not that the present system?—We get into long statements.

4429. That is the mode of working the present system. The difficulty arises from the verbosity of parties, or those who act for them?—Yes, that is the practical difficulty.

4430. Prolixity in the statement?—Yes. We are all over-anxious to state our case so as to omit nothing. And if the practice were acquired of stating the case in general terms, leaving the details for proof, that would meet my view as to what the record ought to be.

4431. Does it occur to you that the prolixity of the statement is in any degree attributable to the want of a careful consideration at the early stage of what is the real issue in the case?—Most undoubtedly. I think that agents who study their case before they serve their summons can far more easily and clearly state their case at the first meeting before the Sheriff, than if they bring a haphazard action without having ascertained the facts beforehand.

4432. They would confine it to what was pertinent to the real issue?—Yes.

4433. But if they don't do so, it is a precautionary matter with them to state everything out of which the issue may probably arise?—Just so.

4434. Dr. Barclay.—In a case depending on matter of fact, you would take the precognitions before closing the record?—All cautious agents should do so.

4435. But at present they take the case from their clients?—Yes; and they often get a coloured, distorted view of the facts.

4436. Mr. Webster.—Would it not lead to cost to have an investigation of that kind, where the action is ultimately not defended?—There is a difficulty there; but every agent who wishes to prepare a summons carefully ought to satisfy himself by some means that he has got at the whole case; and perhaps in the table of fees there ought to be an allowance to the agent for an inquiry beforehand, provided he satisfies the auditor that it has been made. That should be a small thing, and in decrees in absence it need not be allowed.

4437. The Chairman.—Such previous study would tend to make the future proceedings simpler and cheaper?—Yes.

4438. It would save trouble, expense, and time to all parties?—No doubt of it.

4439. Mr. Paterson.—As to the incurring of expense in taking precognitions which may never be required, from the cause being undefended, I suppose you have a pretty correct notion beforehand of those cases that are to be defended, and those that are not?—Generally. I think there is hardly any action brought now without an intimation having been made by the agent to the opposite party that such a thing is to be done.

4440. You could be guided by that in taking precognitions?—Yes; I have heard of cases where an unscrupulous agent comes down on a man with an action without giving him notice, but that is rare.

4441. Dr. Barclay.—I suppose that is done in actions of damages?—Yes, generally in such actions.

4442. Mr. Campbell.—The benefits you desiderate would scarcely be attained by legislation?—No.

4443. Dr. Barclay.—The plan you suggested is very much the Act of Sederunt of 1839?—It is; and if the Act of Sederunt had been worked out, the system would have been in operation by this time, and little fault would have been found with it.

4444. Mr. Campbell.—Probably the fault found is very much attributable to the Sheriff Court?—I have no doubt of it.

4445. Mr. Shand.—Have you any suggestions to make as to power to amend?—I find that the Court of Session Act of last year, sec. 29, gives a power of amendment of the record in defended actions, rendering competent at any stage of the cause all amendments necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing action the real question in controversy between the parties. I think that is an admirable provision, and it ought to be extended to the Sheriff Courts.

4446. So that amendments may be made at any stage of the case?—Yes.

4447. Dr. Barclay.—Subject always to an award of expenses?—Yes, in the discretion of the court.

4448. Mr. Campbell.—Assuming that the constitution of the Sheriff Court remained unchanged, consisting of Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff, do you think the Sheriff-substitute should be entrusted with the power of making such amendments without the party going to the Sheriff?—I think the Sheriff-substitute ought to be allowed to amend while the case is in his hands. There are several other provisions in the Court of Session Act which I think might be advantageously applied to the Sheriff Court, viz. sec. 20, for amendment of the summons and pleadings in undefended cases. That is in cases pointed out in the Act itself; sec. 23, decree in absence to pass without attendance of the agent; sec. 24, certain decrees in absence following on personal service, to have the effect of decrees in foro; sec. 40, that actions of damages, where the verdict is for less than £5, are not to carry more than small debt expenses, under the exceptions provided in the statute; and sec. 41, authorizing the stamping of unstamped deeds tendered in evidence. I think all these are provisions of great utility, and they might very safely and properly be applied to Sheriff Court procedure.

4450. Mr. Adam.—Would you apply the same rule to cases appealed from the Sheriff Court?—No; in such cases a decision has been given in the Sheriff Court, and the party dissatisfied is entitled to go to the court of appeal. If he succeeds in his appeal, he is right, and is entitled to all his expenses; if he fails in his appeal, he has dragged the respondent unnecessarily to the superior court, and the respondent is entitled to the expenses thus incurred.

4451. Mr. Gordon.—And the appeal is the only mode of getting justice in that case?—Yes.

4452. Whereas in the other case you have a more expensive court?—Yes.

4453. There is a provision in the Debts Recovery Act to that effect?—There is a provision in the Small Debt Act.

4454. Are there any other matters which you think might tend to expedite procedure in the Sheriff Court?—No; I think I have said all I have to say on that subject.

4455. Dr. Barclay.—Do you know anything of lock-hole citations in your district?—Yes; I think that a very dangerous system. I have known cases where Sheriff-officers have returned false executions of such citations.

4456. Both citation and charge?—Yes. I think it might be an improvement, especially in executing small debt summonses, that they might be served as registered letters through the Post Office,—that instead of sending an officer twenty miles with the summons, it should be sent as an open letter through the post, and that the agent or his clerk should certify that, and produce the receipt of the Post Office for it.

4457. Supposing it came back without the party being found?—Then it should be the duty of the post-master to hand it to the Sheriff-clerk.

4458. Mr. Gordon.—A certificate is returned that it has been delivered at the house?—All registered letters are only delivered to the party to whom they are addressed, and on the receipt of that party. I think some provision of that kind should be made, to secure evidence of the receipt of the writ.

4459. It would save expense?—It would save great expense especially in small debt cases.

4460. Dr. Barclay.—The same plan might be adopted as to jurors?—Yes. It is already in practice as to jurors and witnesses in criminal cases.

4461. Mr. Paterson.—In the greater number of small debt cases, would there be any difficulty in having the charges and the arrestments served personally?—There might be difficulty, but in most cases I think that might be done, and cases of personal service might get an earlier hearing.

4462. Dr. Barclay.—In the Small Debt Act is there not a higher fee to the officer?—Yes, sixpence higher; but I have known officers return personal citations which had been served at the house merely.

4463. Where the party was not got personally, might not application be made to the court to substitute another sort of service?—That would lead to expense in these small cases.

4464. Mr. Paterson.—Where an arrestment in a small debt case is served, especially on the dependence, would it not be an expedient thing that a duplicate should be served on the defender?—Yes, that would be a most useful proceeding.

4465. I suppose you have known many instances of an artisan going for his wages on a Saturday afternoon and finding them locked up?—Yes. I had two parties with me on Monday complaining of that very thing.

4466. Dr. Barclay.—Do you think it would be a good thing in small debt cases to abolish the arrestment on the dependence?—I think it should be abolished in small debt cases.

4467. Seeing that they are so soon adjudicated?—Yes, except in special cases where the people are running away.

4468. The Chairman.—How would you deal with such cases?—By a special application to the court.

4469. That is, cases under £12?—Yes.

4470. Mr. Shand.—To be granted on cause shown?—Yes, such as when a man is going off with his furniture.

4471. Mr. Paterson.—Do you know that a certain class of shopkeepers are in the habit of supplying work-people very much on the faith of being able to tie up their wages?—Yes, they supply them on credit expecting to recover payment in that way.

4472. Do you think that an evil?—Yes.

4473. Is it not an evil to the workman?—Yes, and it is an evil to the general class of shopkeepers.

4474. Have you known it lead to great improvidence on the part of the workpeople?—Most undoubtedly. I see that every day in our district, where a miner is allowed to run up an account of £10 or £12. Because he is getting goods on credit, the shopkeeper gets a much higher price for them, or gives worse goods, and the man is loaded for years with the debt.

4475. Mr. Campbell.—He becomes thirled to that shopkeeper?—Yes; if he leaves him, there are pains and penalties which are usually enforced.

4476. Mr Paterson.—Do you think, if the system of arrestments for small debts were entirely abolished, it might reasonably be expected that workmen might apply their wages in making cash purchases for their families?—Yes, I have no doubt that would have a most beneficial effect. There is one thing which I omitted to say about applying the provisions of the Court of Session Act to the Sheriff Court. In the original writ or summons a warrant of inhibition might be given in cases competent to the Sheriff Court; and I would suggest that the present mode of discharging inhibitions is unnecessarily expensive. The registrar will not mark the discharge of an inhibition without a formal discharge on a deed stamp being presented to him. I think it should be sufficient to entitle him to mark it that a decree of absolvitor in the action should be presented, or an attested receipt for the debt inhibited upon, instead of the discharge on the £1, 15s. stamp.

4477. The Chairman.—Would you have publication of the inhibition?—Yes, I think so.

4479. The Chairman.—In the records?—Yes, I think that is sufficient publication.

4480. Mr. Webster.—In the case of an inhibition on a Court of Session summons, where there was decree of absolvitor, and where there is a right of appeal for two or five years after the decree may have been extracted, would your suggestion not deprive the pursuer of the benefit of the diligence?—I think it might take effect if there is no appeal within a year after the decree. I know cases at present where inhibitions are standing for many years, and they will some day come up, and require a great deal of money to put matters right. That arises from the expensive manner of discharging the inhibitions.

4481. Should not a longer period be allowed for appealing, in the case of parties out of the country, or in minority?—Well, there may be special cases in which, by notice to the registrar, he should be required not to record the discharge on a decree of absolvitor without the leave of the court; but these are exceptional cases.

4482. The Chairman.—Do you not think that extending the inhibitions in the way you propose would multiply inhibitions very much?—I don't think it would do so unduly; but it would cheapen them.

4483. If it multiplies them, and cheapens them, might they not be used oppressively?—I don't think it would have that effect.

4484. You don't think they would be vindictively used?—I don't think so.

4485. The mere publication of them might be injurious?—No doubt, if unduly or oppressively used, it would be injurious.

4486. Mr. Webster.—Is it your opinion that the pursuer should have the uncontrolled right of inhibiting and arresting on the dependence of an action?—I think that cases of great hardship may be conceived to arise from that; but it is very difficult to find a remedy, especially where despatch is required.

4487. Would you not think it necessary that he should obtain the sanction of the court, upon an affidavit showing cause why that should be permitted?—I think it would be desirable that a scheme should be devised which would enable the creditor wishing at once to attach a debtor's effects, to do that without notice to the debtor; but I think it would be an improvement on the present system, under which a creditor may arrest at any moment, and without any authority from the court, if letters of arrestment were given after consideration by the court.

4488. Mr. Adam.—Do you think it would be right to allow a defender who had suffered loss in that way, to recover it without proving malice and want of probable cause in the use of the arrestments?—That goes into a very deep question. I think that would be limiting the right of the pursuer or creditor too much. It would open a door to oppressive litigation, which might prevent people from asking their proper remedy in court. It is a debateable question, and I have not considered it.

4489. The Chairman.—Are there any other matters which you think would tend to economize time and money in Sheriff Court proceedings?—Nothing that occurs to me.

4490. What do you say as to prorogations?—I think they are often given too loosely; but it is very difficult to restrain parties from concurring in these prorogations, or to restrain the court from granting them if parties concur. There are many cases brought in the outset which it is better for the parties should not be hurried through. Therefore I cannot see how the Legislature can restrict a judge from granting prorogations, if parties concur in asking them.

4491. It has been suggested that the consent of the parties themselves should be given to such prorogations. Do you think that is practicable?—I don't think it is. I think that a man who employs an agent has generally that confidence in him that he may trust to his doing what he considers best for his interests.

4492. He would probably take his agent's advice as to whether he should consent?—Yes, most probably.

4494. Do you think the agents should have an opportunity of knowing what is being taken down?—Yes.

4495. And the opportunity of putting questions?—Yes. I don't think it necessary to take down the evidence at full length, but the Sheriff should dictate his notes aloud to a clerk, or read them aloud as he writes them down himself.

4496. Have you any suggestion to make as to taking it by a shorthand writer?—I think in all cases where the parties concur in asking for a shorthand writer, or where either of them asks for it, and offers to pay the expense in the meantime, it would be desirable to provide that, if the Sheriff sees fit, a shorthand writer should take down the notes of the evidence; and in that case the evidence, I think, should be taken down in the shape of question and answer.

4497. And dictated by the Sheriff?—No. I think the question as coming from the party asking it, and the answer as coming from the witness, should be recorded by the shorthand writer; and in order to get an accurate report which will satisfy all parties, I think the shorthand writer should be required as soon as possible to send his extended notes to the party whose proof it is. These notes should be examined by the parties; and if they are satisfied as to their accuracy, let them be the notes of evidence in the cause. If there is any inaccuracy, in the correction of which they cannot agree, let them go to the judge, and let him correct it, as his short notes taken for his own satisfaction, or his memory of the facts, may enable him to do.

4498. The Chairman. — Would not question and answer all taken down make a most voluminous record?—In heavy cases it would.

4499. And in some cases, where the examination goes on a long way, and results in nothing at all, would it not create considerable difficulty in finding where the essence of it lay?—It would involve more writing than is necessary.

4500. You have perhaps observed in cases tried before juries in the Supreme Court, where the evidence was very accurately taken down by a shorthand writer, that that was the state of the matter?—I have.

4501. Mr. Baxter.—Have you ever seen an instance of revising the shorthand writer's notes?—I have seen that, with consent of parties.

4502. Where?—In a case tried before Vice-Chancellor Stuart in the Court of Chancery.

4503. The Chairman.—Was it the case of Young's patent?—Yes.

4504. The evidence was taken down question and answer?—Yes; and revised by the agents in the manner I have mentioned, and any inaccuracy was corrected by the judge. John Gair.

4505. The judge must have had his recollection very perfect?—He took short notes. In that case I believe much use was made of the notes of a judge who had previously tried a similar question in the court here.

4506. That case before Vice-Chancellor Stuart lasted upwards of 30 days?—It lasted 33 days.

4507. Was the evidence ever printed?—It is printed, and forms a volume of enormous size.

4508. Can you give any idea of the size of it?—It is a quarto volume, of about 1500 pages, in large type.

4509. The evidence taken in the court here was taken a great deal more shortly?—The notes of evidence taken by the judge who tried the case here were remarkable for their clearness, and their usefulness afterwards through a long course of litigation.

4510. Dr. Barclay.—If the Sheriff were to dictate the evidence to a clerk, the time taken up would be a great deal longer?—I am not sure of that. I don't want the whole evidence taken down; but just such evidence as the Sheriff takes at present. The difficulty I want to get over is that the agent should know, as the evidence is being recorded, what is being written; and if the judge would read out what he is writing, that would be sufficient.

4511. Mr. Campbell.—You are aware that a competent shorthand writer can read with perfect facility the notes which he has taken?—Yes.

4512. Would it not be the most convenient plan, in the event of a shorthand writer being employed, that the Sheriff should dictate to the shorthand writer that which he would have dictated to the clerk, and that the shorthand writer, after the evidence of the witness had been completed, should read his shorthand notes to the witness in presence of the judge and parties, and obtain his attestation to its accuracy?—That might obviate the difficulty in many cases; the shortening of the evidence would be attained in that way.

4513. Mr. Shand.—Do you think any improvement might be effected in the Sheriff Court, by lessening the number of times at which it is competent to appeal?—Yes, I do. I don't think any appeal is necessary, or ought to be allowed, except upon the interlocutor allowing a proof after the record is closed, and on the final judgment.

4514. Dr. Barclay.—Would you not allow it on a preliminary defence?—If the preliminary defence was such as to involve the decision of the case, I think it would be desirable.

4515. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it might be left to the discretion of the Sheriff-substitute to allow such appeal on a preliminary defence?—I think so; but in the other two cases the parties should have the right to appeal.

4516. There is at present an appeal before the Sheriff-substitute has decided the case on the merits, but after the proof is closed?—Yes.

4517. Do you think that might be dispensed with?—I think it might.

4518. Suppose the Sheriff, after the case had been disposed of on the merits, should think that further proof ought to have been allowed?—There would be an awkwardness there. If the evidence disallowed was such as to affect the question, the Sheriff should have power to open up the case, and allow further evidence.

4519. In that view, the process might come back to him, and he might himself finally dispose of it?—Yes.

4520. That would be better than the system of allowing an appeal in every case at the close of a proof?—Yes, that is a practice taken advantage of to cause delay.

4521. In the way you propose, appeals might be practically reduced to two in the course of a case?—Yes, in all cases of ordinary occurrence.

4522. Would you allow an appeal in the case of a decree granted for an interim payment of money?—Yes; that might be useful.

4523. Mr. Baxter.—Have you many prorogations of proofs, or are they generally taken at one diet?—The proof for each party is generally taken in one day.

4524. The pursuer's on one day and the defender's on another?—Yes.

4525. Not both on the same day?—No, not generally.

4526. Dr. Barclay.—Are they taken on consecutive days?—No.

4527. Is not that pernicious?—It is not the best course. I think a proof once begun should go on till it is finished, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the judge that delay is necessary.

4528. The Chairman.—You said something about the Sheriff being enabled to admit evidence after it had been excluded. I suppose you are also of opinion that if evidence had been improperly admitted, he could exclude it from his consideration when deciding the case?—Exactly so.

4529. What have you to say with reference to review?—I think it essential for the due administration of justice in the Sheriff Courts, that there should be a review within the court itself,—a review that may be conducted by the agents who have had the management of the case from its commencement, and a review that can be carried out with little expense to the parties. But I am not satisfied with the present system of review by one judge of the judgment pronounced by another, the appeal judge having only the record of the evidence before him, while the inferior judge has had the advantage of having the witnesses before him. I think that the appeal court within the Sheriff Court itself might be improved by having a second Sheriff attached to the Sheriff of the first jurisdiction for appeal purposes.

4530. Mr. Baxter.—You mean that the appeal should be to two minds instead of one?—Yes.

4531. The Chairman.—Would you allow an appeal from them to the Supreme Court?—Most certainly; in all cases above £50, at any rate.

4532. You would have them final under £50?—Yes.

4533. Mr. Campbell.—In cases above £50, would you make it optional to the parties to have recourse either to the appellate court or to the Supreme Court?—I should. I think that no man who has a decision against him in matters above £50 should be required to go on with the case in the inferior court, if he chooses to take it at once to the Supreme Court.

4534. Mr. Baxter.—Both parties?—Both parties. That is, the party having the decision against him should be entitled to appeal at once to the Supreme Court.

4535. Mr. Gordon.—Of course these two judges of appeal, or any other judge of appeal, would be liable to the disadvantage which you say at present exists of not having seen the witnesses?—No doubt of it. But my objection to the single judge is, that it is an appeal from one man to another; the one having had a better opportunity of forming a correct judgment on the case. With two appeal judges, there would be two minds applied to the review of the judgment.

4536. Mr. Baxter.—You think that would strengthen the court of appeal?—I think so.

4537. Mr. Paterson.—Do you contemplate the appointment of an additional Sheriff-principal, or would you call in a Sheriff from the adjoining county?—I don't think Parliament will give us any more Sheriffs-principal; and therefore my view is, that the second appeal judge should be taken from the existing Sheriffs.

4538. Mr. Shand.—Does it occur to you that there is any advantage in your proposed arrangement beyond that of having two minds instead of one?—I think the only other advantage is, that it would be more satisfactory to litigants, and would probably end litigation in the appeal court in many cases.

4539. That is because you think it would be a more satisfactory tribunal?—Yes.

4540. The present system of review is as cheap a one as you could devise?—Yes.

4541. Have you any suggestion to make for improving the present system, other than that which you have stated?—I don't know how the present system could be improved, except that the Sheriff, if there is to be only one, should be required to hear the parties in open court.

4542. How often would you propose that the court of two should sit in such a district as your own?—I think once in two months would be quite sufficient.

4543. And if there was an enactment to that effect in regard to the Sheriff under the existing system, that would be a desirable improvement?—Yes, decidedly.

4544. And it would secure the oral hearing which you desire to have in these cases?—Yes; and I would make provision as to the despatch of appeals, that the review Sheriffs should hear the appeals every two months—every appeal taken up to within six days of that court—and should be required to give their decision before the next appeal court.

4545. Do you contemplate a system of two judges sitting all over Scotland, or only in populous districts?—What I want is, to have a good court of review helping to educate the local bar, hearing their appeals in open court, and showing the public that they attend to their duties; and I think if the Legislature can devise the means by which two Sheriffs should join with one another in their respective jurisdictions, perhaps extending the jurisdictions somewhat, though I am not prepared to give any scheme as to that, these two Sheriffs sitting in open court, hearing appeals in presence of the local bar, would be of great assistance to the local bar, and would give confidence to the public in their judgments.

4546. Do you contemplate that two judges should sit in that way all over Scotland?—I think so, except in very remote places.

4547. Would you have these Sheriffs to go to all the towns to which the Sheriff now goes?—In our own county, unless to suit the convenience of the Sheriff, who would necessarily live in Edinburgh, and might prefer hearing cases in Falkirk, I think the county town would be sufficient.

4548. You would have them to sit in the county town of every county in Scotland?—Yes.

4549. Would it not frequently happen in some of the northern counties, that there was only a single filiation case, or the like, ready to be disposed of?—We are speaking of what would be an improvement on the present system, and there may be exceptions to all arrangements of that kind. If there were only a single affiliation case, or if there was little to be done by the Sheriff, that might be provided for by his hearing it in an adjoining county. If there were such a small amount of business as not to justify a judge in going, I don't know that he should be expected to go; but I have not worked out the scheme.

4550. Mr. Baxter.—You would require to have statistical information to enable you to do so?—I would require information which I have not got.

4551. Mr. Shand.—A difficulty has been suggested as necessarily arising in summary cases, such as questions of interim interdict, sequestrations, and questions of diligence requiring despatch: has it occurred to you how that difficulty could be obviated if there was an appeal court of two judges?—We have these cases under the present system; and the present system has this additional disadvantage, that the Sheriff of appeal may keep the case as long as he likes. My scheme would require him to settle them all within two months.

4552. Under the present system, has a party not the power within three or four days, or even twenty-four hours, to put in a petition, and bring the matter under review?—I don't see why that should not take place under the new system. Every facility given to a litigant at present for the speedy despatch of his case ought to be retained.

4553. To whom would you propose that such a petition should be sent?—I think that, to carry out the system which I have in view, it would require a clerk of the Sheriff Court settled in Edinburgh, with an office in Edinburgh, to receive all appeals, and transmit them to the proper quarter.

4554. To be disposed of by two judges resident in Edinburgh?—Yes.

4555. Mr. Baxter.—You contemplate that they should all be resident in Edinburgh?—I do; I think there is great advantage to the public in the appeal Sheriff not being resident in his district. He is removed from local influences and local prejudices, and from the society among whom his decisions are to circulate; and I believe the public have more confidence in such a judge, than they would if he were long resident in the district.

4556. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it would be satisfactory to the public if there were no appeal within the Sheriff Court, and if all appeals must go to the Court of Session?—I don't think that would be satisfactory; on the contrary, from anything I have heard or observed, it would be highly unsatisfactory. It would be giving the resident judge the sole power of deciding finally in probably nine-tenths of the litigation before him.

4556*a*. You don't think that desirable?—No, certainly not.

4557. Supposing the expense of an appeal to the Court of Session could be reduced in ordinary cases to £10 a side, would that make any difference in your opinion?—No doubt it would make a material difference in the consideration of the question whether there should be only an appeal direct to the Court of Session from the local Sheriff; but my objection to the system of an appeal direct from the resident Sheriff to the Court of Session goes deeper. I think that litigants in the Sheriff Court ought to have a cheap and speedy review within the court itself, in the first instance, so that the agents who have had charge of the case from the first should be enabled to plead it to the end, in a first court of review, and before it reaches the Supreme Court. If the Legislature could devise a scheme by which agents practising in the country should have the right of pleading their appeal cases before the Supreme Court, that would meet a great difficulty; but we will never get that.

4558. Taking the public interest as the only guide, and supposing that the expense of an appeal to the Court of Session could be reduced to £10 a side, would you still say that it is desirable to have a cheaper appeal in the meantime?—I don't think that the public interest is different from the view I take. On the contrary, I have tried to make my view such as would meet the public view, apart altogether from the benefit it would be to the local profession, or the disadvantage to the Supreme Court. I don't think an appeal against a resident Sheriff's judgment direct from the Sheriff Court to the Supreme Court is desirable, if you can devise a good and cheap court of review by the Sheriffs.

4559. You would expect that that court of review would be cheaper than the sum I have mentioned?—Yes. At present we have the appeal for a small sum, and the hearing for not an unreasonable sum to the agents who conduct it. Under any other system, there would be fees to counsel and to new agents, which might be avoided in the court of review composed of Sheriffs, as I have suggested.

4560. Dr. Barclay.—Where the two appeal judges differed, I suppose the judgment of the resident Sheriff would stand?—Yes.

4561. Mr. Webster.—Where the two appeal judges did differ, would that not tend to dissatisfaction on the part of the losing party, and to a greater number of appeals?—No, I don't think so.

4562. Mr. Baxter.—At present you have only one to one, but on the other system you would have two to one?—Yes.

4563. Mr. Paterson.—Is the number of appeals from the Sheriff of Stirling's judgment to the Court of Session large?—It is not at all large.

4564. Can you give me any idea of the proportion of the judgments acquiesced in?—The proportion of cases taken to the Supreme Court is not 1 in 20 or 1 in 30 of those acquiesced in.

4565. Do you not accept that as evidence that the present system of appeal to one Sheriff is working well?—No, I am sorry to say I cannot. I know many a case that would have been appealed but for the enormous expense of the Court of Session.

4566. Mr. Shand.—Under the system you propose, there is no remedy for that?—There is this remedy in my mind, that the opinion of two judges is better than the opinion of one, and would be more readily acquiesced in.

4567. Mr. Paterson.—You think the Sheriff-principal's judgment would be strengthened if he had another Sheriff sitting with him and determining the case?—Just so.

4568. Is the Sheriff-principal, as matters now stand, excluded from having assistance of that character, though in a different way? He must, by statute, be a practising advocate. Is it not reasonable to suppose that, in cases of difficulty, he would consult with his brother Sheriffs in the Parliament House?—I don't approve of that system. I hear of Sheriffs who, when they cannot make up their own minds, run about asking the opinion of everybody. But I want a judge to decide the case who hears the parties, and is responsible for his decision. I don't care anything for a Parliament House opinion given to a Sheriff, privately and without responsibility, on his own statement of a case.

4569. Mr. Campbell.—I suppose, in your experience, the larger proportion of final interlocutors appealed are adhered to?—Yes, a great many.

4570. Do you think that where an appeal is very cheap, the mere fact of the appeal court being often resorted to, can afford any test of the satisfaction which it gives? Suppose an appeal were got for one shilling, does the fact that an unsuccessful litigant has recourse to it, give any indication as to the satisfactory nature of the judgments it pronounces?—I don't care how cheap the appeal may be. The litigant has the right to appeal if he chooses, and the cheaper the better for litigants.

4571. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you have known appeals taken for delay?—Yes; and I would guard against that, by limiting the cases in which appeal should be allowed.

4572. Mr. Campbell.—A litigant has two reasons for appealing,—either the obtaining of another chance, or to get delay?—Yes.

4573. If he can get his appeal cheaply, the fact that he does appeal doesn't indicate that he has any particular confidence in the court of appeal?—That depends on the motive with which he is actuated in appealing. I think that if a man loses a case, and believes he is in the right, he is entitled to have his appeal heard. His confidence in the court of appeal may be little or great. Unfortunately we have judges whose judgments are not at all times satisfactory in the court of appeal; but a man is entitled to appeal whether he has confidence in the court of appeal or not.

4574. Mr. Paterson.—In regard to your suggested appeal court of two judges, have you considered whether there would be any benefit in causing a Sheriff-substitute to sit as a member of that court, so as to make the number of the judges three?—I think that might, in some cases, be useful; but it has its drawbacks, because if he is a man of strong feeling, and apt to take the side of the decision which he has pronounced, there is a danger of his influencing the appeal judges. All of us at times are in danger of taking a wrong view; and I am not sure that the advantage of having three sitting together, the third being the judge whose judgment is under appeal, would be so great as simply letting the two sit and deliberate by themselves. I think the danger would be, that the Sheriff-substitute might maintain his own view indiscreetly with the other judges.

4575. Assuming that he was a man of only average obstinacy, would there be any harm in giving him an opportunity of reviewing his own judgment?—I have such a feeling about that, that when I form a judgment myself, I like to stand by it afterwards. Most men have that failing; and I would rather limit the cases to those in which the two judges required the Sheriff-substitute to sit with them.

4576. Mr. Baxter.—You would like two unbiassed judges?—Yes; and it should be only in cases where they desire the resident Sheriff to sit with them that he should do so.

4577. Mr. Paterson.—Would not the circumstance of the resident Sheriff sitting as one of the court of appeal obviate the difficulty of the two differing?—The difficulty is got over by holding that where the two differ, the original judgment stands.

4578. You prefer that to giving the resident Sheriff a voice in the appeal court?—Yes.

4579. Mr. Shand.—Do you think it would be any advantage that the appeal Sheriffs should be in daily practice at the bar?—I think that would be an advantage if it were practicable.

4580. In the scheme which you propose, do you think it is practicable?—That I do not like to give an opinion upon, till I know more as to the work which would come before the appeal judges. I think it is a great advantage to litigants that non-resident Sheriffs or Sheriffs-principal are practising advocates at the bar.

4581. Mr. Campbell.—Assuming that a court of two judges of appeal were constituted, would you still retain as chief magistrate of the county a non-resident Sheriff, or would you make the resident Sheriff the chief magistrate of the county?—If you deprive the non-resident Sheriff of his magisterial duties and responsibility, you change the office very materially. If you take away from him his magisterial duties, you must relieve him of the responsibility of the office to a great extent; and you create a difficulty where there are three or four resident judges within the jurisdiction. In such a case there must be one superior to the others, otherwise there would be no subordination or order preserved; but so far as my observation has gone, I have no hesitation in saying that the resident Sheriffs are well qualified for the discharge of the administrative duties pertaining to the office of Sheriff; so that if the Legislature should resolve to make such a change in the office, the duties of the principal Sheriff could be competently discharged in the counties by the resident Sheriffs. But it would change the office more than I would like to see, if the principal Sheriff were deprived of his magisterial duties.

4582. The Chairman.—He would then cease to be a Sheriff, and would be an appeal judge of a different character?—Exactly so. He would cease to be the Sheriff, and to be responsible as between the Crown and the public.

4583. Mr. Campbell.—That is not a change that you would recommend?—No.

4584. Mr. Shand.—Why do you deprecate a change to that extent?—Because I am much attached to the present system, and it works well on the whole.

4585. Mr. Gordon.—You think it has worked well?—It has worked well.

4586. And where there is more than one Sheriff-substitute, it is an advantage to have a Sheriff to whom they can appeal?—Yes, and to direct the general business of the county.

4587. Mr. Shand.—In what respect do you think it has worked well, so far as the administrative duties are concerned?—As regards the administrative duties, I don't know that they have been more advantageously discharged by a Sheriff resident in Edinburgh than they could have been by a well-informed resident Sheriff. I don't think his ministerial duties are so important as to require that he alone should discharge them; but what I would deprecate is the total change of the office, which must occur if you take away his magisterial duties from the Sheriff-principal.

4588. Mr. Baxter.—Still you think the resident Sheriff quite competent to discharge them?—Quite.

4589. Mr. Shand.—Have you frequently found great advantage from having recourse to the Sheriff?—I would not say frequently, but I have found it occasionally, and the knowledge that I have the privilege is a great comfort. I have found it not unfrequently a great advantage in matters of administration; and where the Sheriff takes an active share of the work in his county, no doubt it is an advantage to have a man coming from outside. We are all the better, I think, of knowing that there is a superior officer of the county who can come into it at any time he likes, with the right of inquiring into what has been or is going on.

4590. Mr Harrison.—Where the judgment of the resident Sheriff is confirmed by the court of review, would you propose to make that judgment final?—In all cases up to £50.

4591. Not beyond £50?—No; I think £50 is a fair limit to the right of a party to have the decision of a higher court on his claims.

4592. Don't you think that would encourage litigious people to carry their cases further?—I don't think it would. It does not do so at present. It would not encourage them, but it would not prevent them. The difficulty is to prevent them.

4593. Does it not put too much power in the hands of obstinate or wealthy people to oppress the poorer classes?—No, I don't think so. If a man has a claim in court which he thinks it right to go with to the superior court for decision, no Legislature ought to prevent that, if the amount is sufficient, according to public policy, to justify his going there. So much is that my opinion, that I hold that a man who has a claim of £50 is entitled not only to go to the Court of Session, but to the House of Lords, for a final judgment.

4594. Does that not make it almost a necessity that a poor man should give in at the very first, seeing that he may gain the case before the resident Sheriff and before the Sheriff of appeal, and then be glad to abandon it rather than go further?—No. If your principle were right, there would be no litigation between rich and poor men. The present system has not so worked; it has not prevented cases between rich and poor going even to the House of Lords.

4596. And they have less to lose?—Yes; and I never knew a poor man who had a good pecuniary case to try who did not get agents to conduct it.

4598. Mr. Gordon.—The sacrifice is rather made by the rich man than by the poor man?—That is my experience.

4599. Dr. Barclay.—You would not require caution in appealing cases above £50?—No.

4600. Do you not think that would be a check?—I think it is rather an unreasonable check.

4601. Would you ever allow an appeal where the resident Sheriff and the two appeal Sheriffs were unanimous?—I think so.

4602. Mr. Shand.—Without caution?—Perhaps in such a case caution might obviate any objection,—caution to a reasonable amount.

4603. Caution for future expenses?—Yes. Perhaps that would remedy it. I don't see any objection to that.

4604. Mr. Baxter.—Or any hardship?—No.

4605. Dr. Barclay.—There would be a prima facie case against the appellant there?—Yes; and if he has such a sense of the injustice of the decision as to warrant him appealing against the decision of three judges, no doubt he would have the means of finding security for expenses. I think that would be a very wholesome provision.

4606. The Chairman.—Have you anything to suggest as to costs?—The costs allowed under the Sheriff Court Act are very fair and reasonable, I think. I don't think the litigants themselves can find fault with the amount, and I am not aware that any of my brethren have complained of their being too low, except in Commissary Court proceedings, and there they are decidedly too low. I think in Commissary Court proceedings, where inventories are of large amount, the fees to the practitioners should be increased.

4607. Mr. Shand.—Does that apply to cases of both testate and intestate succession?—Yes.

4608. There is a distinction, is there not?—Not in regard to the fees. There is a distinction as to the stamps.

4609. The fees in your county are the same?—They are the same all over Scotland, except in Edinburgh, where Writers to the Signet have higher fees.

4610. Dr. Barclay.—There is very little litigation in the Commissary Court?—Very little.

4611. Mr. Baxter.—What is your opinion of the Debts Recovery Act?—I have had little experience of it; but the feeling among procurators in our district is that the fees are not nearly sufficient for the work. The consequence is, that unless one has plenty of these cases in his hands, he rather declines to take charge of them.

4612. The Chairman.—Do you think the principle on which the fees are regulated is a sound principle?—No; I like the principle better which pays a man according to his work, for the time and labour he bestows on it. In the Debts Recovery Act there is an unwise provision that no fees are allowed to the agent for managing the appeal after the case goes to the Sheriff. The consequence is, that an agent may discourage appeals even in cases where there is a reasonable prospect of success.

4613. Mr. Baxter.—There is an inducement to do that?—Yes. I don't say it is done.

4614. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to the privilege of agents?—I think that all agents throughout Scotland should be admitted under the same rules, and have the same rights and privileges.

4615. Both in the local courts and in the Supreme Court?—Yes.

4616. Mr. Baxter.—You are aware that all procurators are now admitted in the same way?—In the inferior court; but we are restricted in our right of practice throughout Scotland.

4617. Should that limitation continue?—No; I think it would be better that it should not.

4618. When a person is admitted to practise in a local court, do you think he should have a right to practise in all local courts?—Yes. Of course there are privileges pertaining to certain faculties, which will not go as a matter of course to a person passing as procurator. If he wants the privileges of the faculty, he must be admitted to it.

4619. But he should not be excluded from practising in Glasgow, or anywhere else?—No.

4620. Mr. Shand.—Do you think any benefit to the public would result from a change of that kind?—I think so. A client has his general agent in one jurisdiction, meets him in consultation in his affairs every time he requires to consult an agent, and the agent knows all about the case. The present practice in the Sheriff Courts is for the local agent to send instructions to his correspondent in another town; but I think that the general advising agent of the client should be at liberty himself to plead the case in that other jurisdiction.

4621. Dr. Barclay.—The present system leads to double agency?—Yes. There is an understanding among procurators in the country by which the fees are divided; but the better plan would be to give the option to an agent in one jurisdiction to plead in another, if his client wished him to do so.

4622. The Chairman.—That would very often result in such an arrangement as you have spoken of—viz. a division of the fees?—Yes, except in special cases.

4623. Do you think that what you propose would lead to a similar result in regard to cases in the Supreme Court?—I think it would, and I think that would be an advantage to the public. There would then be no reason for charging the client more than one agent's fees. At present a client who is anxious to have the services of a country agent must pay for two agents. The country agent must be paid for his work which cannot be charged against the opposite party, and the Edinburgh agent has to be paid in addition.

4624. It has been said that, under the present system, business does not reach the Court of Session which otherwise would have done so. Do you concur in that opinion?—I do.

4625. Do you think that has been the case to any large extent?—I think it has.

4626. Mr. Baxter.—What do you think has been the case?—That the country agent advises his client not to send cases to Edinburgh, in consequence of the undue expense caused by double agency.

4627. And the country agent feels that he is liable for the Edinburgh agent's account?—I don't know that that has much influence. I don't know any case where an Edinburgh agent has made an unreasonable demand on his country correspondent. On the contrary, everything I have seen of the feeling of Edinburgh agents is quite the opposite, and that if you cannot recover from your client, they don't hold you liable.

4628. Dr. Barclay.—Is it not often made matter of agreement that the country agent is not to be held personally liable?—There are many cases in which no stipulation can well be made with a respectable agent in Edinburgh. You want to have a good agent, and you cannot stipulate that with him; but at the close of the case, if there has been much expense, he says if you don't recover from the client, he will not hold you liable.

4629. The Chairman.—At present the town agent has to correspond with the country agent to obtain information, to examine witnesses for him, and as to other matters of that kind. Do you say that if the case is gained, that expense is not allowed?—The country agent is not allowed for the work he does.

4631. The client has to pay the country agent?—The hardship is on the client.

4632. In what way would you relieve the client of that expense?—I think that if we had a system sanctioned of agents in the country and agents in the town sharing the fees in the case, there would only be one fee legitimately chargeable against the client by both agents as it were. At present the client wishes the services of a country agent; but the country agent is not allowed anything in Edinburgh when the account is taxed. The Edinburgh agent is allowed all the fees, and he retains all the fees.

4633. Would you reduce the profits of the Edinburgh agent?—As the system is worked in England, I believe it is this, that the London agent gets a proportion of the fees earned by the country agent, and the country agent gets a proportion of the fees earned by the London agent.

4634. The client pays for both?—The client pays only one fee, but that includes both.

4635. Both accounts are paid out of the client's pocket?—Yes; but where a litigant gains, they form costs in the cause against the opposite party.

4636. That does not cheapen litigation?—No.

4637. And it does not improve the condition of a party who has lost his cause?—No.

4638. It makes him worse?—No; but it makes a fairer division between the agents who have done the work.

4639. It makes a party who has lost his cause worse to this extent, that at present the country agent's account on the other side cannot be charged against him; but if your system was adopted, it would all go into the Edinburgh agent's account, and the whole would be charged against the losing party?—And so I think it ought to be.

4640. That is no advantage to that party?—It is no advantage to the losing party.

4641. And calling it double agency is merely giving it another name?—Yes.

4642. Mr. Webster.—Is there not double agency to this extent, that the Edinburgh agent writes to the country agent, and the country agent writes to the client, stating what has been done, or what is wanted?—Yes.

4643. On the other hand, where the country agent prepares a paper which goes to counsel, or precognosces witnesses, or furnishes their precognitions, the Edinburgh agent does not do that work over again; he sends the precognitions or memorial to counsel, and that is charged for, and is allowed, whether it be stated in the country agent's account or in the Edinburgh agent's account?—I believe it is by the present Auditor.

4644. The work actually done in the case, so far as not arising from double agency, is allowed against the losing party?—Yes. I have understood that it was necessary that the account should be charged as if the work had been done by the Edinburgh agent.

4645. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose most clients are not able to conduct their own causes?—No.

4646. Mr. Shand.—The change you propose would not in any way lead to increased expense by the allowance in future of charges which have not been allowed hitherto by the Auditor?—No; not against the opposite party; but the fees might be more equitably divided.

4647. So far as the country agent had trouble, he would share his profits with his correspondent in the metropolis, and the correspondent in the metropolis would in like manner share his profits with the country agent?—Yes.

4648. Mr. Webster.—Would that be so fair as the present system, where each gets the full fees for the work that he does?—I think it would lead to an agent in the country being more willing to advise his client to take a case to the Court of Session. There are many charges which the Auditor will not allow, but which it is necessary for a person anxious about his case to incur. He sends his country agent to town to advise with counsel and with the town agent, and that cannot be charged against the opposite party; but it is an expense that the client is willing to bear. Such an arrangement as I have suggested would enable the fees earned in the case by two agents working together to be fairly divided.

4649. Mr. Shand.—You think the remuneration of the agents in the metropolis would in that way be diminished, but that there would be a much larger number of cases brought to Edinburgh than there are?—Yes, I think it would lead to that.

4650. Mr. Gordon.—Might there not be power given to the Auditor to allow the expense of a country agent coming to Edinburgh in a special case, where he thought the presence of the country agent was really necessary?—I think so.

4651. Mr. Baxter.—Does the Auditor allow correspondence with the country agent?—No.

4652. He thinks the client should write himself?—Yes.

4653. Is he capable of doing so?—In many cases he is not. If he were, he need have no country agent.

4654. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think permission to make such an arrangement would be beneficial to clients?—I think so.

4655. The Chairman.—Have you anything else to state?—I think it may be worth while to direct the attention of this Commission to the practical advantages of a public prosecutor, as shown by the comparative results of criminal prosecutions in England and Scotland. Taking the criminal returns for the year 1867, there were in England 18,032 criminals tried, which trials, in no fewer than 3802 cases, resulted in acquittal. In Scotland 2811 were tried, and of these 277 were acquitted. It would thus appear that about 21 per cent. of the trials in England resulted in acquittal, and about 9 per cent. in Scotland; and assuming this year's return to be a fair average of the result of prosecutions in England, either the machinery of the law in nearly 4000 cases a year fails to convict when conviction ought to have been obtained, or this vast number of innocent persons are annually put to trial without sufficient cause, through the want of a public prosecutor to direct and control the proceedings.

4656. You are aware that in Scotland, if the public prosecutor does not choose to prosecute, a private party may do so?—Yes.

4657. Have any cases come under your cognizance in which private parties availed themselves of that power after the public prosecutor had declined to prosecute?—No; I have not had a single instance of that in my experience, and I don't recollect a single instance of it for twenty-five years anywhere. I have often had to tell complainers that if they were not satisfied it was open to themselves to prosecute, but I know no instance of their having done so.

4659. Do you think the Commissary Court ought to have a separate staff from the Sheriff Court?—I don't think the public advantage requires it. At the same time, although I have no personal interest in the matter, I think it necessary to make this explanation, that there are now very few offices in the country which can be given to procurators, and I state it quite openly that in the interest of the procurators there is some advantage in having public offices into which deserving parties may be put.

4660. With a view to the status of the parties?—Yes; and I don't know that the public would save anything in fees by having the Commissary Court transferred to the Sheriff Court.

4661. Mr. Shand.—Is not the office of Commissary-clerk frequently held by the Sheriff-clerk?—It is quite an independent office. The deputes often hold the offices of Sheriff-clerk depute and Commissary-clerk depute; but, as a rule, the principals are separate. It is one of those offices often given for a man's services to his political party.

4662. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to Deans of Guild?—Deans of Guild have police duties to perform as well as their ordinary duties. I see no harm in making the Sheriff's jurisdiction co-ordinate with that of the Dean of Guild, except in certain police matters.

4663. Dr. Barclay.—You have no Dean of Guild in Falkirk?—No.

4664. And there is none in Stirling?—No; the Sheriff does the duty.

4665. Mr. Shand.—I suppose you would not propose that that should be done in large cities?—No.

4666. You would treat them quite exceptionally?—I think so.

4667. The Chairman.—Are there any burghs of barony or regality in your county?—They have all gone into disuse in our county, and they ought to be abolished.

4668. Dr. Barclay.—Is there not Kilsyth?—Yes, I had forgotten Kilsyth. The last I recollected of was Denny.

4669. The Chairman.—There are burgh courts held for civil purposes?—Yes; that also is going out, and I think might with public advantage be done away with. There are very few burghs where the power of trying civil causes is exercised by the Burgh Courts; and I think it is not for the advantage of the public that it should be continued.

4670. You never knew them trying cases with a jury?—No.

4671. Either civil or criminal cases?—No.

4672. What as to Justice of Peace Courts?—I think it important that there should be Justices of the Peace acting in many capacities throughout the county. I think it does a country gentleman, who sits as a Justice of the Peace, a great deal of good to meet people and hear their views in open court, and to express his own views; and therefore I think, except in matters of civil right, and perhaps in game cases, the Justice of Peace Courts ought to be continued as they are.

4673. Dr. Barclay.—Would you abolish their jurisdiction as to cases of debt up to £5?—No.

4674. You mean you would abolish it in cases of masters and servants, and of illegitimacy?—Yes; I think that might be taken away. But I think it is useful to the public to have such a jurisdiction as the Justice of Peace small debt jurisdiction. I think it is also useful that the magistrates of a county should have the regulation of the licences. The feeling about game prosecutions is rather against their being continued in the hands of the Justices; and I know many of them would be willing to be relieved of these cases. At present it is not competent to try day poaching before the Sheriff.

4675. Mr. Shand.—I believe a great many county gentlemen have expressed a desire to be relieved of cases under the game laws?—Yes.

John Gair.

4676. Dr. Barclay.—Is there a Fiscal for the Justices at Falkirk?—Yes.

4677. There is no collision with him?—No.

4678. Do the Justices try criminals, except under their statutory jurisdiction?—No, not in our county.

THURSDAY, 31st DECEMBER 1868.

Members Present:—

Lord Colonsay.	George Harrison, Esq.
E. S. Gordon, Esq., Q.C.	James Adam, Esq.
A. R. Clark, Esq.	A. B. Shand, Esq.
Dr. Barclay.	James Webster, Esq.
James Campbell, Esq.	J. B. Baxter, Esq.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

William M'Clure, Esq., examined.

William M'Clure.

4679. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner in the Sheriff Court of Renfrewshire at Greenock?—Yes.

4680. There are two seats of the Sheriff Court in Renfrewshire, one at Greenock and one at Paisley?—Yes.

4681. There are two wards in the county?—Yes.

4682. How long have you been a practitioner?—I passed as procurator in the year 1837.

4683. In Renfrewshire?—In Greenock.

4684. Do you hold any official appointments?—None.

4685. Have you any suggestions to offer to the Commission as to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of a Sheriff and his substitutes?—The principal thing that I have to suggest is with regard to the court of appeal, and as to taking evidence in disputed questions of fact.

4686. What is your suggestion as to the court of appeal?—I think it ought to consist of two Sheriffs, and that the appeal should be heard orally before these two Sheriffs.

4687. How often should these courts of appeal for oral hearing be held?—As often as possible; but it would depend very much upon the business. I don't think they should be less than once a month, at any rate.

4688. Do you think they ought to sit at Greenock, or at Paisley?—I think they ought to sit at the seat of each court.

4689. Would you apply that to all the places in Scotland where there are substitutes and a Sheriff Court?—I think so.

4690. Such as Hamilton and Lanark?—Yes.

4691. Have you formed any opinion as to the class of cases that should be appealed to these Sheriffs?—I think all cases above the value of £50. I think the Debts Recovery Act should be extended, so as to embrace all classes of cases under £50.

4692. If it is so extended, you think there should be no appeal from the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute to the appeal Sheriffs?—Not where there is no principle involved, and if it is merely a question of amount.

4693. Do you think that any alteration should be made upon the mode of taking evidence, or upon the necessity of taking evidence in cases under £50?—Unless there is a principle involved, I think the Sheriff should just take notes himself for his own satisfaction, in the same way as he does in the Small Debt Court; but if there is a principle involved, he should take these notes at greater length, so that they might be brought under the notice of the court of review.

4694. Would you have any interposition of the parties as to his taking or not taking notes, or would you leave that entirely to himself?—I think evidence, when taken, should always be dictated so that the parties should hear what the evidence is.

4695. But should the parties have a right to require notes to be taken, or would you leave it to the discretion of the Sheriff whether he should take notes or not?—I think if any of the parties is of opinion that a material point has been overlooked, or should be noted, the judge should take it down.

4696. But at the commencement, do you think it should be left to the discretion of the judge, or do you think that the parties should fix whether or not notes of the evidence are to be taken?—As I have said already, I think notes should not be taken unless there is a principle involved. If there is a principle involved, I think notes should be taken if either of the parties ask it.

4697. How are you to determine whether there is a principle involved?—I suppose the thing would be self-apparent; I mean if it involved a principle that was to regulate other cases, and was not merely to settle that particular case.

4698. You mean that it should be done in a representative cause?—Yes, something of that kind.

4699. Mr. Harrison.—Would you make the Sheriff-substitute the sole judge as to whether it was a representative cause?—I think he might almost be allowed to be the judge of that. I don't think he would go far astray upon that point.

4700. The Chairman.—Whether it is a representative cause or not is very much a question of fact?—To some extent; but I think it would be better, if it is a representative cause, to have that fixed before the proof begins.

4701. If either party says it is a representative cause, and states why, you think the Sheriff should decide whether it is a representative cause or not?—Yes; and that point might be appealed.

4702. But suppose he was of opinion that it was not a representative cause, what as to taking notes?—I think in that case the appeal should be heard first and determined, and let it come back to him.

4703. You think the cause should be delayed until that point was determined on appeal?—Yes.

4704. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you don't think that there would be a necessity for that in many cases?—I don't think it.

4705. The Chairman.—You would not give either party a right to require at the outset, as matter of right, that the Sheriff should take notes?—I don't think that would be necessary.

4706. Is there any right of that kind in the Debts Recovery Act?—The parties have a right to ask the Sheriff to take notes.

4707. You don't think that necessary?—I don't think it, except in the cases I have mentioned.

4708. If it should turn out, in the course of a cause, that an important question of law was emerging, what course would be followed?—Supposing it were brought out by the facts on the proof, I think an appeal should lie, provided either of the parties ask it.

4709. Whenever the point of law arises?—If it is an important point.

4710. You think that the decision of the Sheriff should be appealable upon the matter of law?—Yes.

4711. Upon his statement of what the facts were?—Yes. If he once begins to take down the facts, it should be on his statement, with this addition, that if any of the parties ask him to take notes on a particular point, he should do so.

4712. You would confine the notes to that point?—He would take his own notes; but any additional notes would be confined to that point.

4713. You think that the Debts Recovery Act ought to be extended to all classes of debts?—I think so.

4714. And what you have now stated as your view of the course of procedure, would apply when it is so extended?—Yes.

4715. The appeal would lie to two Sheriffs?—Yes.

4716. They would sit once a month at the seat of the Sheriff Court?—Yes; not less than once a month.

4717. Would you have any appeal from their judgment to the Supreme Court?—I think not under £50.

4718. Under £50 the judgment should be final?—Yes.

4719. Would you extend these rapid forms of procedure to cases above £50?—Not the Debts Recovery Act procedure.

4720. In ordinary cases, would you retain the present form of procedure in the ordinary court?—No. I think the way in which proofs are taken is very unsatisfactory. I have thought a good deal about that, and I have had great difficulty in making up my mind about it. It is not satisfactory to have the judge taking notes himself without reading them over; and I think it is also unsatisfactory to have them taken by a shorthand writer, because what is taken down is not heard, so that corrections could be made. The idea that I have formed, as the best plan possible, is to have the two Sheriffs sitting to try these cases along with the Sheriff-substitute.

4721. I am talking of the original court of the Sheriff-substitute?—Well, I am speaking of that in cases where proofs are to be taken on disputed matters of fact.

4722. You think these ought not to proceed before the Sheriff-substitute?—I think it would be much better that they should proceed in presence of the three judges, that they should hear the evidence taken, and take notes each for his own satisfaction; and immediately upon the evidence being closed, that they should come to a conclusion in findings upon fact, and that their judgment upon that should be final.

4723. Mr. Baxter.—You mean them to sit as a jury?—Yes.

4724. The Chairman.—Upon all questions of disputed fact above £50?—Yes.

4725. Dr. Barclay.—Then the resident Sheriff would not take any proof in cases above £50?—He would sit with the other judges.

4726. But never by himself?—Never by himself. It should just be a trial in point of fact, and the judgment in point of law would be reviewable.

4727. The Chairman.—You think their findings in point of fact should be conclusive?—Yes.

4728. Mr. Webster.—Similar to the Court of Session findings, where there has been proof in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

4729. Dr. Barclay.—Have you thought how much time that would take?—They would be gone over very rapidly.

4730. Perhaps too rapidly?—I don't think so.

4731. The Chairman.—Have you any idea of the number of proofs that are taken by the Sheriff-substitute at Greenock?—I have not made an estimate of them, but my own impression is that they would not be very numerous. I don't think he takes above three in a week in Greenock; but of course I am merely guessing.

4732. Do you know what time these proofs occupy the Sheriff-substitute?—They do occupy his time a good deal at present; but he takes notes not for his own satisfaction merely. He takes them much more lengthily than would be done if the judges sat in the way I am suggesting. They would only take notes of the most important points, for their own satisfaction—short notes.

4733. Mr. Baxter.—The Sheriff-substitute takes down all the evidence just now as a record for review?—Yes.

4734. The Chairman.—Have you thought how the system you have suggested would work in such a place as Glasgow, where there would be a great many proofs?—Glasgow is quite an exceptional case, and it would perhaps require to have a greater staff of judges, or they would require to sit more constantly; in fact, they would almost require to sit permanently.

4735. What qualification would you require for these judges of appeal?—A qualification similar to the principal Sheriff at present.

4736. You mean that they should be members of the bar, of a certain number of years' standing?—I don't think they should ever be under ten years' standing; and I think also they should be in good practice before they are appointed.

4737. Should they abandon practice when they are appointed?—They should at least abandon all practice both directly and indirectly connected with the places where they sit as a court of review.

4738. Do you think they should retire from the bar?—It would be as well.

4739. Those that you say would require to be permanently resident in Glasgow must of course retire from the bar?—Yes.

4740. How many places do you think that two of these Sheriffs ought to visit?—That would depend on the amount of business to occupy their time, if they were retiring altogether from the bar.

4741. How many of such lawyers do you think should be appointed Sheriffs in appeal?—That would depend on the amount of business to come before them. You would require to have as many as could easily transact the whole business.

4742. You have formed an opinion upon that subject, have you?—No; I have not formed an opinion upon that.

4743. Have you considered what kind of remuneration these gentlemen should get?—I don't think they should have less than £1500 a year each, and perhaps £2000. Indeed I don't think that either a Sheriff or a Sheriff-substitute should have less than £1500 a year in any populous place, where they require to keep up a position.

4744. Would you have these gentlemen to travel through more counties than one?—Yes.

4745. How many counties?—That would depend on the amount of business.

4746. Mr. Baxter.—You contemplate them holding circuits?—Yes.

4747. The Chairman.—Would you extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court in any respect?—Yes; I think it should be extended to causes generally; but there is one thing in particular which I think has been a great grievance in our maritime ports, I mean the proviso which was added to a clause in the 1st and 2d Vict. cap. 119; I think that proviso should be cancelled. By that Act the Sheriffs were held to have all the powers of the Court of Admiralty; but the proviso is, that they are only to have that in the event of the parties being amenable to the Sheriff's jurisdiction on some legal ground. We find in practice that that proviso is productive of great mischief. I suppose the intention of it was to have cases of that class brought to the Court of Session; but in our practice we find that the cases emerge on a sudden, and unless a sudden remedy is provided, they do not go forward at all, and the remedy is lost.

4748. Mr. Shand.—The parties escape from the jurisdiction even of the Court of Session?—They are ready to go to sea, and there is no time to apply to the Court of Session to have a case prepared and the vessel stopped.

4749. Mr. Webster.—That proviso led to a serious litigation in the Court of Session?—Yes. In point of fact it does not bring business to the Court of Session, and yet it is a great mischief to people who are to recover debts from persons who are on the eve of escaping from the kingdom altogether.

4750. Dr. Barclay.—Of course you would still have the party within the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—No. He may be a foreigner and off altogether.

4752. Unless you could arrest the vessel?—Unless you could arrest the vessel, and take her into port, and dismantle her.

4753. Dr. Barclay.—Can you not do that to found jurisdiction?—No.

4754. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—I think that where owners of ships live in different jurisdictions, they should be amenable to one Sheriff Court,—that in which the case first originated. The whole of the owners should be capable of being convened in one Sheriff Court, if one of them is resident in the jurisdiction.

4755. Mr. Baxter.—Would you apply that to other cases of contract, where there are several defenders?—Yes. I would apply that rule generally.

4756. You would not confine it to maritime cases?—No.

4757. Mr. Webster.—Would you give the pursuer the choice of the Sheriffdom in which to bring his action?—I don't see that there would be any alternative.

4758. The Chairman.—Would you suggest any further extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction, either as to territory or subject?—I think there ought to be an extension in the case of heritable rights.

4759. Would you put any limit to that?—I don't see that there should be a limit. I think if the Sheriff is capable of judging in cases of £100,000 in moveables, it is not a bit more important to try a question of heritable right. The value is the same.

4760. Mr. Clark.—Does it occur to you that there should be any limitation of the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—I don't think it. I think his jurisdiction should be universal.

4761. As absolute as the Court of Session's?—Yes.

5762. Mr. Baxter.—Under the power of appeal?—Yes. I have stated that.

4763. The Chairman.—Would you extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to all questions of status, including declarators of marriage?—Yes, I think so. These just involve a question of proof in my view, though of course they are very important in their consequences.

4764. Mr. Baxter.—Have you known bad effects to arise from persons not being able to prosecute actions of divorce?—I have known many cases of that sort. It has led both to immorality and violence.

4765. Mr. Clark.—Do you think there is the same advantage in an appeal that there is in having the case begun and ended in the Court of Session?—I think so.

4766. Is there nothing important to the cause in the manner in which the record is prepared, and the evidence taken?—I should suppose so; but I don't think there should be any difficulty in preparing the record in the country.

4767. And in taking the evidence?—And in taking the evidence.

4768. Do you propose that the defender shall have power to remove his case from the Sheriff Court for progress, or must he submit to the judgment of the Sheriff Court in the first instance?—I think he should submit to it in the first instance.

4769. So that if the pursuer brings an action, and chooses the Sheriff Court as the tribunal, the defender must submit to that judgment without any other redress than what is to be found by way of appeal?—Yes.

4770. Mr. Webster.—And that only on points of law?—Yes.

4771. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that in regard to very large estates, the actions would be brought originally in the Court of Session?—That is what I would do myself.

4772. Mr. Clark.—Then what is the use of giving the Sheriff jurisdiction?—Because in a great many cases they would be tried there, and they would be tried cheaply. At present, if a question arises regarding a house of very trifling value, it must go to the Court of Session, the expense of which would utterly ruin many people. In that way very many persons cannot afford to get their rights vindicated, because of the expense.

4774. Mr. Baxter.—Are you not in the habit of preparing deeds and conveyances of large properties?—We do that in the country to a large amount; and if we are able to prepare the titles to the rights that are in dispute, why should we not be capable of giving advice to the Sheriff upon these very points? Are we incapable of conducting a cause, or shaping a record to try a question of right, if we are capable of preparing these rights themselves? It seems to me quite anomalous.

4775. Mr. Webster.—Take such a case as recently occurred about the Breadalbane estates. Suppose the whole of these to have been in one Sheriffdom, and that either of the parties had originated the cause there, the whole succession would have depended upon the opinion of the court of appeal taking evidence on the matter of fact—viz. legitimacy or not?—Yes.

4776. And there would have been no power such as now exists, of appeal from the Court of Session to the House of Lords, to review that matter?—Not upon fact.

4777. There it was simply a question of fact,—legitimacy or not, and the decision of the Court of Session upon the evidence was open to appeal to the House of Lords, and was reviewed there. You would abolish that power of review if the case originated in the Sheriff Court?—The power of review would be abolished so far as fact is concerned.

4778. I am assuming that in that case there was nothing but the simple fact of legitimacy?—If I don't mistake, there were questions involved there as to the evidence which should be led, and as to what was evidence.

4779. Would you allow an appeal from the Court of Sheriffs to another court upon all matters affecting the quality or competency of evidence?—I think these are pure questions of law.

4780. How could they be raised?—By taking a note of them.

4781. I understood that you were to have no notes taken?—The Sheriffs would take a note if they were refusing evidence, or admitting evidence which was considered incompetent.

4782. Then you would allow exceptions about evidence?—Yes; but not on the judgment formed on the evidence itself when taken.

4783. Mr. Clark.—How would the court of appeal dispose of the exception if they had no notion of what the evidence was that was being taken?—That would be pointed out by a statement on the record as to the line of evidence. It would be a pure question of competency.

William M'Clure.

4784. Dr. Barclay.—You would raise that by a bill of exceptions, as is done in the jury court?—Quite so.

4785. Would you have no motion for a new trial in such a case as has been referred to?—I have not the slightest doubt that such a case would be originated in the Court of Session.

4786. Mr. Shand.—But you would leave it to the pursuer to determine that?—Yes.

4787. Mr. Clark.—And if a pursuer thought he had a quisquis case, he might select a quisquis tribunal?—I don't assume that it would be a quisquis tribunal.

4788. Mr. Shand.—Do not these considerations, and the fact that entail cases and cases involving large heritable questions of great nicety might be raised, lead you to modify your opinion, and to think that it would be desirable to leave the defender the power, which he at present has, to advocate a cause before the proof is taken?—Well there might be such a power left in the very large class of cases.

4789. In cases of large value?—Yes.

4790. Mr. Clark.—In a small class of cases, but of large amount?—Yes.

4791. The Chairman.—In cases affecting heritable right where the party was claiming in various counties or districts, would you apply the rule you have laid down as to defenders in different counties?—Unless the estate was very large, I don't think the rule should be altered; but if it was a large estate, involving a stake of some consequence in different counties, I think it would be proper to bring it in the Court of Session.

4792. Mr. Webster.—Only if it were in different counties?—Yes.

4793. Would your views as to the qualifications of procurators before the Sheriff to prepare records and plead cases lead you to make any change in the Supreme Court, or would you still maintain the distinction of counsel and agent?—I think there should still be counsel and agent; but I think that all agents should have the power of practising over the whole country.

4794. Mr. Shand.—As agents?—Yes; or if they had a case which originated with themselves, I don't see why they should not plead it. I don't think we should be peripatetic at all; I think we should stick to our own court.

4795. Mr. Webster.—Would you carry your view this length, that the agent who has conducted the case in the inferior court should have the right not only to 'agent' but to plead the case in a higher court?—If it was in a small case, and if there was any appeal; but I have cut that off in regard to matters of fact. Perhaps it would be as well that counsel should have the exclusive privilege of conducting these cases; but the agent should go to the Court of Session and be his own agent.

4796. The Chairman.—Do you think counsel should be permitted to practise in the court of appeal that you have suggested?—Certainly. I think counsel should be entitled to practise everywhere, as they do just now.

4797. In any court?—In any court.

4798. Mr. Adam.—Would you allow the expenses of counsel as against the opposite party in that court of appeal?—I think counsel's expenses should be allowed.

4799. Dr. Barclay.—Supposing one side took counsel, but the other did not, would you allow it without the consent of the judge?—I think the consent of the judge should be given.

4800. The Chairman.—Do you mean consent to the counsel to plead, or consent to charging for counsel in the account against the opposite party?—To charging it in the account. The Sheriff should judge of the necessity of bringing counsel from Edinburgh in such a case.

4801. Mr. Shand.—Is it your experience that the great expense in causes appealed to the Court of Session now arises upon questions of fact, rendering printing necessary, and long discussions on the import of the proof?—The printing is certainly a very considerable item in the expense.

4802. And the fact of having the proof printed leads to long discussions, and adds to the expense of the appeal?—Yes; sometimes.

4805. You think it may be taken less expensively in that way; because time would be saved in taking the notes, and it would be more summarily done?—Yes.

4806. And if it were final, it would save the expense which occurs in review, both in the printing and in the argument on the proof?—Yes.

4807. But you would still propose to leave a review on matters of law?—Yes.

4808. How would the Court of Session reach the questions of law coming up from that court of three, in the absence of evidence?—The questions of law would arise in the record; and any other question of law that might arise would be as to the competency of evidence.

4809. May not questions of law frequently arise with special reference to the evidence as it comes out? Suppose the record to be a short and somewhat meagre statement, do you not find that questions of law arise out of the evidence?—But you have specific findings of fact by the judges, which show all that could arise in point of law.

4810. Then do you contemplate that it should be the duty of the appeal judges, in the interlocutor containing the findings in fact, to raise the law for consideration of the court above?—They would have to make specific findings of fact as proved, and these would necessarily disclose any plea that could be raised on them.

4811. And they would be followed by findings in law?—Yes.

4812. Would not that be a very expensive tribunal in rural districts, where cases are comparatively few, and which are at a distance from the great centres of this country?—I don't think it, because the judges would sit a very short time in questions of that sort.

4813. Dr. Barclay.—If the three Sheriffs should differ in opinion, two to one, would you still make their findings on the facts final?—I would.

4814. Suppose that witnesses are absent from sickness or contumacy, and are brought up at a future diet, do you not see some difficulty in the judges being able to grasp the evidence, having no notes?—I have said that each is to take notes for his own satisfaction—short notes of the important points; and I don't see any difficulty about that; because, if either party was not prepared to go on with his case, because of some important witness being absent, he would move an adjournment, and there would perhaps be other cases to dispose of, which might enable them to take that one up at a later period of the same sitting.

4815. You have stated that at present the evidence is not read by the resident Sheriff: is it not always read at the end of the witness's examination?—Yes.

4816. You desire that it should be read as it goes along?—Yes; because, not hearing the evidence taken as the witness gives it, some very important point may escape your notice altogether; whereas, if you are hearing it as it goes on, the point is before your mind at the time.

4817. Don't you hear it from the witness's lips?—Yes; but you don't know what is taken down.

4818. Have you ever found, when it was read over, that you had cause to complain of the resident Sheriff not taking down the res gestæ?—I have.

4819. Mr. Baxter.—Have you often heard that complained of?—Yes.

4820. The Chairman.—When it was read over, you observed the omission; was it corrected?—It was as well corrected as it could be; but on hearing evidence hastily read over, you are not alive to the importance of the points as you would be during the examination.

4821. Mr. Baxter.—And you have been disappointed frequently, on reading over the Sheriff's notes, at not getting a true representation of the evidence as it came out?—Not exactly as I expected to see it, and that sometimes on very important points.

4822. Dr. Barclay.—Have you found the agents differing as to what should be taken down?—I don't recollect of hearing much dispute about that.

4823. Mr. Adam.—Do you think that sometimes the judge, at the beginning of a proof, does not know the points on which the case is to turn, and may unwittingly fail to give them prominence?—Sometimes he is not aware of the record at all.

4824. Mr. Baxter.—He cannot be aware of the proof to be led?—No.

4825. Dr. Barclay.—You would have the appeal court constituted of Sheriffs-principal of the different counties: you don't bring in any new class?—No.

4826. Have you turned your attention to how you would arrange Scotland?—That would depend entirely on the number of judges that might be necessary.

4827. Would all the Sheriffs be necessary to form members of the court, or would you have more, or fewer?—I think that there would be fewer; but that would depend a good deal on what was done for Glasgow. Even with Glasgow, however, my impression is that there would be fewer. I think those left out should enjoy their present emoluments during their lives.

4828. Mr. Adam.—Do you contemplate that the Sheriff-substitute should sit with the appeal judges in any case except for the purpose of taking proofs?—No. It would be necessary, in some degree, to have him sitting with them, to make a majority; otherwise, if they differed, there would be no decision.

4829. Dr. Barclay.—In cases of pure law, the two Sheriffs are to decide?—Yes, if it is appealed.

4830. Supposing they differ, would the judgment of the local Sheriff be set up?—It should stand, unless they reverse it, as there would, in that case, be two judges against one.

4831. And no appeal?—No appeal.

4832. You have said they should sit once a month at least. There is a number of summary cases—cases of ejection, aliment, and interim interdict; how would you deal with these? Must they wait till the appeal Sheriffs hold their sittings?—Yes, unless there is some immediate cause for haste, and then it ought to be sent on to the judges.

4833. Would there be oral or written pleadings?—I think the agents should attend the judges where they happen to be, or have a written pleading.

4834. Mr. Shand.—You have many cases in Greenock where summary despatch is of importance?—Yes.

4835. Where maritime questions arise, it is important to have an immediate appeal?—Yes.

4836. And an immediate decision?—We seldom get an immediate decision in a case like that.

4837. You have it in your power to put in a reclaiming petition within 24 hours?—I have pointed to that just now as being a remedy for any sudden case.

4838. To whom should that be sent?—To the two judges.

4839. Where do you contemplate that they should reside?—That is for them to arrange. They might be on circuit at the time. I am supposing that they are going circuit, and fully employed.

4840. When not on circuit, where do you contemplate that they should reside?—I don't know. I suppose they would fix their own residence.

4841. If they resided in different parts of Scotland?—They would have to arrange a meeting to discuss these cases as they came up, if they were very important and could not wait.

4842. Mr. Webster.—I think you stated that one reason for preferring this new mode of ascertaining the facts was that it would be more satisfactory than that by jury?—Certainly. According to my view, trial by jury is the most unsatisfactory mode of disposing of a question.

4843. Is that the general feeling of the mercantile and professional classes with whom you associate?—I think so. I think trial by jury should be abolished for many reasons.

4844. You mean in civil cases?—Yes.

4846. Mr. Clark.—Then your objection is not the expense?—That is a main point.

4847. You object not only to the expense, but to the unsatisfactory constitution of the tribunal?—Yes; that is my reason for falling back on an intelligent body like the Sheriffs to hear the cases.

4848. Mr. Shand.—Suppose a system could be devised by which the expense was very much reduced, what would you say to jury trial?—I would still have the objection to the constitution of the court.

4849. Mr. Adam.—Suppose, along with your system, it were still thought desirable to have review as to matters of fact, might that not be effected by one of the judges taking full notes of the evidence?—That would delay the court, and it would still be that judge's notes and not the notes of the court.

4850. You would not recommend that?—No, I don't think so.

4852. Mr. Baxter.—You mean they should get a superannuation allowance?—Yes. Or I could suppose that an experiment might be made to try them with the interim interdict cases.

4853. The Chairman.—You would utilise their services in that way?—Yes, in the meantime.

4854. Dr. Barclay.—The principal Sheriff has very important administrative powers; would you vest these in the resident Sheriff?—They would naturally fall into the hands of the resident Sheriffs.

4855. The Chairman.—I understand your suggestions to amount practically to this: in the first place, you would extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriffs to all classes of cases; in reference to cases under £50, you would have an appeal, upon matter of law only, to the court of two; and in cases above £50, you would have the judgment of these judges final upon fact, and have the evidence taken before them, and not before the Sheriff-substitutes as at present?—Yes.

4856. Their judgment final in fact, and appealable in law to the Supreme Court?—Yes.

4857. Your object is twofold, as I understand: first, to have the judgment of two persons instead of one; and secondly, to have a tribunal of three lawyers for investigating the facts, their judgment upon these facts being final?—Yes.

4858. These are your views?—Yes.

4859. Mr. Clark.—In a case above £50, if it required proof, the only judgment to be pronounced would be a judgment of the court of three?—Upon the facts.

4860. And law?—No; it is reviewable in law.

4861. But the only judgment pronounced in the inferior court would be by that court?—Yes.

William M'Clure.

4862. The Chairman.—Would you have power given to a party to have a new trial, if he could show cause for it to these appellate judges; or to whom must he apply for that new trial?—If there was a miscarriage.

4863. What do you call miscarriage?—If it could be shown that a party was taken by surprise in any way, or that there was a miscarriage, pretty much as a new trial can be moved for now.

4864. Where would you move for that new trial; in the court of Sheriffs or in the Supreme Court?—I think it should be before the three Sheriffs.

4865. That would be the redress supposing you were to consider that the judgment arrived at was an erroneous judgment in point of fact?—Yes, even supposing it were.

4866. You think a party would have an equal chance of redress in that case as he has at present, in the event of there being an erroneous judgment in point of fact?—I think so. I think the court could have no interest in debarring a person from having a review of the case, if there was anything like surprise or any acknowledged miscarriage of justice.

4867. Suppose he says they have arrived at an erroneous conclusion upon the evidence?—It is impossible to say that the Court of Session could review a judgment on a question of fact, with no evidence before them.

4868. But I want to know why you should not allow some appeal to the Court of Session. Perhaps the three judges in the Sheriff Court might differ two to one upon the question of fact; and if one of the parties thinks they have gone wrong in the inference which they have deduced from the facts, is he to have an appeal to no mind but the minds of those who have already given their decision?—If they have erred in point of fact, to err is human, and I don't see how you could get it settled better in any way. All the members of the court might differ as to their inference from the fact; but I think these three judges would be more capable of drawing an intelligent inference from facts than a jury would, and therefore I think their judgment should be final.

4869. If a jury goes wrong in point of fact, a new trial can be granted?—Yes; but how is it to be ascertained that they are wrong, if these three judges have given their judgment, and there are no notes of the evidence?

4870. If you exclude notes of the evidence, so as to make it impossible for anybody to look at them, you arrive at that result?—And if they are very short notes they would be of no use to the reviewing court.

4871. You in that way exclude the remedy of a new trial where there is an error in point of fact?—I don't see why there should be any difficulty about that, more than if a man enters into an arbitration by which he agrees to abide by the judgment of arbiters. This is setting up a court which is a better court than arbiters could be; and if an arbitration is to be final, I see no reason why that court should not be final.

4873. Dr. Barclay.—And although these three judges should not be unanimous, you would still have finality?—Yes.

4874. Mr. Baxter.—You would have such confidence in these three men as jurymen that you would trust them with making findings of fact?—Yes.

4875. The Chairman.—When they have made up their minds on the fact, they decide the law applicable to the fact?—Yes.

4876. Do the three judges decide the law, or do two of them decide the law?—Two, that is the majority, of them would decide the law; but their judgment would be subject to review.

4877. Mr. Clark.—And you could not raise any question of law except what you could induce these judges to raise by their interlocutor?—No.

4878. Mr. Shand.—Would there not be some difficulty, from the circumstance that two of these judges were moving about from place to place, and that questions of law might involve more than one consultation in order to reach distinct findings in law?—I don't think it.

4879. You must expect that in many cases where questions of law are involved, the judges could not determine them at the time?—Granted. They must have some time to consider and look up the authorities.

4880. When and where would the consultations occur between the local judge and the other two judges upon these matters?—I suppose they could very easily get the local judge to go to them; or, if it was a question of such importance that it required long consideration, it could wait for the next visit.

4881. Would that not be productive of some evil in the way of delay?—I don't think the delay would be much, compared with what we have in conducting cases now.

4882. Is there any reason why the delay that there is now should not be much diminished?—I don't think it is likely to be diminished.

4883. What is the chief cause of delay in the Sheriff Court at present?—The chief cause of delay with us is in endeavouring to make the parties meet and agree to compromise.

4884. But, speaking of the machinery of the court, what is the chief cause of delay in Sheriff Court cases now?—It is what it has always been—to suit the convenience of the procurators or the Sheriff in getting a debate or a proof led. Sometimes an engagement may come in the way of one or other of them, and then it is postponed for some time.

4885. You propose that the courts of appeal should sit once a month. Supposing the Sheriff came to the county once a month, would that not entirely remove any objection on the ground of delay in the present system?—So far as delay is concerned, but it would not remove this difficulty, that he is just one judge reviewing another judge's judgment, the other judge having taken the proof; so that the facts must have a more permanent impression on his mind, and having been throughout at the preparation of the record, and so being perhaps in a more favourable position than the appeal judge for forming an opinion.

4886. You think the quality of the judgment is not so valuable?—They are very much the same. Sometimes very good judgments are given—some that I approve of overturning the substitute's judgment,—and sometimes I think they are not quite so good.

4887. Mr. Baxter.—You think the present appeal court requires to be strengthened?—Yes, I think so.

4888. Mr. Shand.—Do you not think the present appeal court might be weakened by adding, it might be, a judge who had not the same legal accomplishments, to the present appeal judge, where you have, as at present, a judge who is a sound lawyer?—But suppose we have a judge who is not a sound lawyer.

4889. There is the risk of either weakening or strengthening the court?—I don't think there is any chance of weakening it. Where there are three judges sitting together, the probability is that they will give a strong judgment.

4890. But in the case I put, of two judges sitting, would you not be weakening the court?—Two judges, one a good lawyer, and the other an inferior one—that would not be worse, certainly, than having one weak judge.

4891. Mr. Baxter.—You would like two minds better than one?—Yes.

4892. The Chairman.—Should the three judges sit to receive documentary evidence?—Where there is documentary evidence, the two appeal judges could consider it themselves.

4893. You would have the resident Sheriff to decide upon that in the first instance?—I think he might in the first instance judge, if it is merely documentary.

4894. Or if it is a mere question of law?—Yes.

4895. And then there would be an appeal to the two judges?—Yes.

4896. In that class of cases, would the resident Sheriff sit with the others?—Not if he judged in the first instance.

4897. Mr. Clark.—And he judges in the first instance in every case in which there is not oral proof?—Yes.

4898. Dr. Barclay.—In the case of a reference to oath, would you have that taken before the resident judge or the three judges?—In that case, where the evidence would be taken at length, I see no great inconvenience in the resident Sheriff taking it. The object I had in view was to lessen the expense of trying cases where witnesses were to be brought forward.

4899. The Chairman.—Where the resident Sheriff does not sit with the appeal judges, if they differ in opinion upon an appeal from his judgment, the judgment stands?—Yes; practically that would be two against one giving the decision.

4900. But there would be an appeal?—Yes.

4901. Dr. Barclay.—You spoke of miscarriage and surprise. Suppose you were managing a case, and were perfectly satisfied that the conclusion come to by the judges was erroneous, and that you could convince them of that, would you have a motion for a new trial?—I don't think that a miscarriage of that kind would be listened to, because that is presupposing that the court is not going to be a satisfactory court. I think a party must take his chance of that court on questions of fact. What I was referring to was, that there might be miscarriage, by palpable misapplication of the law to their findings. There might also be review, if important evidence, not known to exist at the time, was afterwards discovered.

4902. Mr. Clark.—But you don't give a right of re-hearing?—No; it would come more to be one of those cases where there might be a reduction on the ground of substantial error.

4903. Dr. Barclay.—Would you give that to the Supreme Court?—Yes.

4904. Supposing you gave a right to move the three judges for a new trial, don't you think that parties would frequently avail themselves of that for the purpose of getting another month's delay?—I think that likely if it were allowed.

4905. But you do allow it?—No.

4906. You allow it in the case of surprise or miscarriage?—If there was surprise, that would naturally be stated before the case went to trial; and if a party did not complain of surprise at the time, I don't think that he should be heard again.

4907. Can he find out the surprise till the surprise occurs on the evidence?—You mean if the party was bringing forward evidence which was quite new to him. If there was surprise of that kind, the three judges should be entitled to re-hear it.

4908. Don't you think that would be often taken advantage of?—I don't think the Sheriffs would allow it.

4910. Dr. Barclay.—A foreigner might have gone away in that time?—I am supposing that the property is attached in the case of a foreigner.

4911. Mr. Webster.—What is your opinion as to the present system of supporting appeals by written argument?—I think that is never so satisfactory as an oral hearing.

4912. And it is much more expensive?—It is.

4913. Dr. Barclay.—In a case of count and reckoning, where there is a number of figures, would you say it is more satisfactory?—I would. You generally draw certain conclusions from the figures, and you can make that intelligible in argument quite well.

4914. Are you favourable to caution being found where an appeal is allowed to the Court of Session?—I think, where there is an appeal to the Court of Session, security should be given.

4915. Would that not prevent a poor man from having his case heard?—I think the evil is much greater the other way, where the poor man tries to evade paying his debt.

4916. The Chairman.—You think he has too much facility for review?—I think so.

4917. Mr. Adam.—Do you think it would be a sufficient check to that facility, if he were only allowed to appeal with the consent of the judge?—I would not object to its being done in that way. If the judge should say that there is reasonable ground for appealing, I think the party might be allowed to appeal without finding security.

4918. Mr. Baxter.—You said you would not allow an appeal to the Court of Session in cases below £50. Suppose a case of that sort brought into the Court of Session in the first instance, do you think there should be any regulation as to expenses, suppose the pursuer to succeed?—I think, if the pursuer takes a case into the Court of Session, and incurs very heavy expense, he should just get Sheriff Court expenses up to that point. He selects the court himself, and he should not select the most expensive court.

4919. Mr. Shand.—Do you think that the number of appeals competent in the course of a Sheriff Court process might be usefully diminished?—I don't think there are too many appeals at present.

4920. Do you not think that, whether there is to be a change in the court of review or not, appeals on preliminary pleas should be done away with, except with the leave of the judge at all events?—I think it is rather dangerous to go on with a case while a preliminary is behind you.

4921. And therefore you think that should be retained?—I think so.

4922. Under the present system, is it not often productive of great delay?—It is.

4923. And the appeal is often taken for the purpose of delay?—Not very often; but I dare say it is in some cases.

4924. Would it not serve the purpose to allow the appeal to be taken, as it may at present be taken, when an order for proof is pronounced, and before the expense of a proof or remit is incurred?—Generally, if it is disposed of before the proof, it would do well enough. An objection to the relevancy cannot well be disposed of till the record is prepared.

4925. Then you think that appeals might be dispensed with till a proof or remit was ordered?—If the plea is that there is no case at all, I think that should be disposed of. The expense of the record should not be incurred with that preliminary behind.

4926. The Chairman.—If it were an objection to jurisdiction?—I think that should be cleared off at once.

4927. Mr. Shand.—For what reason?—Because otherwise you have the expense of the record.

4928. But is not that trifling compared with the evil of delay?—I don't think it. The delay might be much greater, because you might go on with the preparation of a record, and be turned back after all.

4929. Would you give the Sheriff-substitute power to allow amendments of the record at any stage?—I think so, and of admitting documents.

4930. Although they had been in the possession of the party all along?—Unless he was unaware of it. If he was aware of them, and kept them back, I don't think he should be allowed to put them in.

4931. The Chairman.—Documents that were in his own possession you would not allow to be produced afterwards?—Not if he was aware of them; but if he has made a search without finding them, and afterwards finds them by chance, I think he should be allowed to put them in.

4932. Mr. Shand.—Would not the power of giving expenses be quite sufficient protection against the evil of a party keeping up documents?—I don't know that.

4933. Are you aware that in the recent Court of Session Act there is a power given to parties to produce documents at any time, subject to questions of expenses?—If a party wilfully keeps back documents that should be put in process, he should suffer for it.

William M'Clure.

4934. By losing the case?—I think he has no right to win if he attempts unfair dealing in that way.

4935. Mr. Clark.—You think he has no right to speculate on winning the case without producing the documents?—No; he should produce everything that he can to forward the interests of justice.

4936. Mr. Webster.—His keeping back these documents may have altered the whole shape of the defender's case?—Quite possibly.

4937. Mr. Shand.—Would not his paying the expense be a complete remedy?—The proper remedy for a fraudulent man is to let him lose his case.

4938. The case where you would find against him on the merits, is where he was acting fraudulently?—Or keeping them back wilfully.

4939. Dr. Barclay.—Do you apply that even to incidental documents—a letter, for example?—If it was a very important letter, and one that would alter the complexion of the case, I think so.

4940. Mr. Clark.—A document which the party must have considered?—Yes, and known about.

4941. Mr. Shand.—Suppose a case where a party has not seen the importance of a document in his own possession, and has not produced it, what would you say?—I would say that if he did not see the importance of it, he should not be punished.

4942. Under the present system, is it not the law that a party, even in these circumstances, cannot put into process, after the record has been closed, documents which have been in his own possession?—The law used to be, that if there was anything that newly came to a person's notice, he was entitled to add it to the record, and to put it in the documents connected with it.

4943. At present, suppose a party innocently retains documents till the record is closed, is he allowed to produce them?—I don't know.

4944. The Chairman.—Have you any suggestion to make on the matter of costs?—I have not considered that question.

4945. Mr. Baxter.—Have you considered it in relation to the Debts Recovery Act?—It has been suggested that there should be a slump sum, and it has also been suggested that the payment should be by fees. My own impression is, that it is best that the agent should be paid in proportion to the trouble he has had.

4946. The Chairman.—Do you apply that to cases under the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes.

4947. Then you object to the principle upon which the remuneration is provided by that Act?—Yes, I do.

4948. What evils result from it?—You may have occasion to conduct a case for a long time, and get very disproportionate remuneration for your trouble; and you may have occasion to state a case in a very short time, and yet the remuneration would be the same, which I think is a bad system.

4949. It would be too much in the one case, and too little in the other?—Yes.

4950. Is that Act much resorted to in your court?—Chiefly for decrees in absence.

4951. That is to say, where opposition is not offered?—Where it is very seldom offered.

4952. Dr. Barclay.—And for the benefit of execution?—Yes.

4953. Mr. Clark.—And the cheapness of getting the decree?—Yes. It is for that reason chiefly that I think the Act should be extended to all cases. I don't see why a judgment on a bill should not be got in the same summary form as a judgment on an open account.

4954. The Chairman.—What is the expense of obtaining a decree in absence?—I cannot exactly say.

4955. Dr. Barclay.—It depends on the amount?—Yes.

4956. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think the fees are fair for obtaining a decree in absence under the Debts Recovery Act?—I think it is a fair enough fee in an unopposed case.

4957. Mr. Campbell.—What is the practice in your court with reference to the taking of notes in debt recovery cases? Is the Sheriff-substitute usually asked to take a note of the evidence?—He is asked, if it is intended to appeal.

4958. Is he generally asked to do so in practice?—There is really not a great many cases of that description in the court.

4959. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to the privileges of agents?—They are all now examined by the same body; and I don't see why, if they are admitted to one court, they should not be entitled to practise as agents in any other court in Scotland.

4960. Mr. Baxter.—You don't think they should be excluded from any court?—No.

4961. Dr. Barclay.—I suppose you would not admit them to the exclusive privileges which the procurators of Glasgow and Paisley enjoy?—I think these exclusive privileges should be abolished, except so far as regards funds.

4962. You would allow agents to practise in every court?—Yes.

4963. But to have any of these exclusive privileges, they should become members of the particular body?—Yes.

4964. Mr. Baxter.—So as not to participate in their property unless they pay for it?—No.

4965. The Chairman.—Do you hold that all agents should be entitled to practise in the Supreme Court, as well as in the Sheriff Court?—I think it would be a proper thing to enable the agent in the country to correspond directly with the clerk of counsel, and to give the clerk of counsel remuneration for the trouble he has.

4966. But do you think they ought to be allowed to practise before the Court of Session?—In their own cases I think they should be allowed to practise as agents in the Court of Session.

4967. Would you have them admitted by the Court of Session to practise in that court?—If the Court of Session have the power of framing regulations for the admission of procurators, I think they should so frame them that the procurators should be capable of practising in both courts. Their examination should be a test of their qualification in the Supreme Court if they wished to do so.

4968. Then the admission should not be by the Supreme Court, but by the council of procurators?—Perhaps the better course would be to have the sanction of the Supreme Court to the agents who wish to practise before that court.

4969. The Supreme Court would get a report from the council of procurators, and give the privilege?—Yes, if they think right.

4970. Dr. Barclay.—You said you would allow the country agent to correspond with the advocate's clerk. Would that not be making the advocate's clerk an agent in the Supreme Court?—The advocate's first clerk is so at present.

4971. Mr. Webster.—That is abolished?—I did not know that.

4972. Mr. Harrison.—You would wish every procurator to have such an education as would enable him to practise before any court in Scotland?—Yes.

4973. And you would leave it to the client to select any procurator in Scotland to conduct his case?—I don't see any harm in that.

4974. Dr. Barclay.—Do you think the standard is not sufficiently high now?—I think it is high enough.

4975. Mr. Webster.—Suppose you in Greenock were conducting a process before the court here, how would you manage the matter of borrowing and lending a process, keeping in view the right of your opponent to have immediate access to it in the way he has at present, which is enforced by process caption?—I suppose the process caption would require to be regulated so as to admit of that. I don't see any harm of the advocate's clerk borrowing a process and sending it down to the country agent.

4976. How would his opponent be able to get access to the papers with anything like the despatch which is required?—If it was sent down to the country for the agent to look at it, as in point of practice is often done now, there would be a limited time for that, and he would send it back. Two people cannot read it at the same time.

4977. But how would that be managed in a case from Orkney or Shetland or Caithness?—It is quite plain that if the case were from Orkney or Shetland, it would be much better to employ an Edinburgh agent, and he would very likely be employed. I am supposing that everybody is seeking to get the case determined at the least possible expense.

4978. The party who selects the agent in Orkney or Shetland is on one side of the case, and is not selected by his opponent; suppose he wishes to have the case delayed, and the process is not made available at the time it is wanted by his opponent, how is his opponent to get it, if there be not some one liable to process caption living within the immediate vicinity of the court?—I don't see how he would get it in that way suddenly, nor would he get it suddenly if the agent was liable to process caption, because if he was in Orkney it must come back to Edinburgh. It is the distance that makes the difficulty.

4979. The Chairman.—It is the non-residence in Edinburgh of the person entitled to have the process. That is overcome in England. How would you overcome it?—I don't see how it is to be overcome in Scotland at all, except you hold that the person who got it was liable to caption as well as the person who sent it. He would take care that his correspondent sent it back within a reasonable time.

4980. It frequently happens that the agent on one side wishes to see certain documents or steps in a process which is in the possession of the other agent, and he writes asking him to return the process, or to allow him access to it. That is done in a couple of hours, but it would be impossible in the case you mention?—That implies simply that it is impossible for an agent in Caithness or Orkney to conduct a case in the Court of Session.

4981. But take the case of Greenock?—If the process were sent through to Greenock, it would be sent back next day. If a telegram was sent for it, it would be returned next day.

4982. But suppose access to it was wanted before next day?—I can hardly suppose that it would be necessary to have it so very suddenly as that.

4983. Mr. Webster.—Do you not know that the rule in the courts of Westminster Hall and Chancery, where agents at a distance may practise, is that papers can only be got by an agent residing within two miles of the seat of the court?—They generally have a branch in London.

4984. The object is to secure the interest of the opposite party, and to give the court an effectual control over the process?—Yes.

4985. Dr. Barclay.—Are you aware of the clause in the Act of Sederunt of 1839 that a procurator shall not be entitled to borrow a process unless his house or office is within the jurisdiction?—Yes.

4986. Mr. Shand.—Speaking practically, would it not be necessary that some such regulation as that should be introduced, if agents throughout the country were entitled to practise in the Court of Session?—They would only be practising in cases from their own county. I am not supposing that they would be practising generally.

4987. Even assuming that, would it not be necessary, that in order to give the parties and the court a control over the process, there should be a regulation that the process could only be borrowed by some one resident in the immediate neighbourhood, who should be responsible for it?—But if it is a case that has gone from the county, there will be an agent in the county on both sides, and I think the probability is that it is in the county that the process would be wanted to be seen on both sides. If counsel wanted to see it, that is likely to be after the agents have examined it, and it would then be in Edinburgh, and not in the county. I don't think that would be a practical difficulty.

4988. Mr. Clark.—Does it follow that the agents would always reside in the same county? Supposing a Perthshire man sues a party in Greenock, and the Perth agent conducts the case there on the one side, and the Greenock agent on the other?—The Perth agent would not conduct the case while it was in Greenock.

4989. Why?—Because that would be a very expensive thing.

4990. Then he conducts it in the court of appeal?—He might do that.

4991. And the case in the appeal court would be conducted by a Greenock agent and a Perth agent?—It is possible that such a case might arise.

4992. Is it not likely?—There must be many cases of that sort. It is more likely to be the case with Glasgow cases.

4993. The Chairman.—There is an understood rule of law that a country agent and an Edinburgh agent cannot arrange to participate in the fees or profits of a case. Do you think that ought to be altered?—I never had such an arrangement myself. I always give the agent his own fees, and let him take his own responsibility. I think, if such a thing exists, it ought to be abolished. It is not a right thing.

4994. Mr. Webster.—What is not a right thing?—Dividing fees.

4995. The Chairman.—As at present?—Yes.

4996. You think the stigma of pactum illicitum should be removed?—I think so.

4997. If that were done, might it not lead to some arrangement for enabling the country procurator and the Edinburgh agent to conduct the cause between them, the Edinburgh agent having the custody of the process?—If that was done, there would need to be an arrangement for dividing the profits in proportion to their labour. At present the evil consists in this, that the country agent gets a share of the fees of the Edinburgh agent for doing his own business.

4998. He is prevented from doing that by the rule against such participation?—I think that should be prevented altogether; but it would be quite different if the country agent was doing a share of the work. It would then be a partnership to a certain extent, and the participation in the fees would be proportioned to the labour of each.

4999. You think that would be a better position of matters?—I think so. That is the way it is done in England, the agents having a branch in London.

5000. Would there not be a difficulty as to the process?—The process would require to be sometimes in the provinces, if the country agent was doing any of the work.

5001. Mr. Shand.—Parts of the process are now frequently in the provinces; but there is a party in Edinburgh responsible to the court for these?—Yes.

5002. Mr. Webster.—Would you state your opinion as to whether it would be fairer that the country agent should be paid the whole fees for what he himself does, and that the Edinburgh agent should be paid the whole fees for what he does, or that there should be a division of both sets of fees between the two?—I think the right way would be to let each get the fees for his own labour.

5003. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say about the responsibility of a country agent to the Edinburgh agent for his account?—I don't think the country agent should be responsible. If the Edinburgh agent is getting the whole fees, and if a client is introduced to him, I think it is his business to make himself aware whether that client is able to pay him or not. If he gets the whole fees, he should take the whole risk.

5004. You think he should make inquiry as to the condition of the client?—Yes. If the country agent induced him to take up the case by misrepresentation, then I think the country agent should bear the responsibility, but not otherwise.

5005. You think it should be an introduction without responsibility?—Yes.

5006. I suppose the country agent at present considers carefully whether he is covered by the risk which he so runs?—According to my experience, a country agent is employed by the client, and the country agent employs the Edinburgh agent; but it would be much better if the country agent had nothing to do with Edinburgh cases as a rule.

5007. You think it would not be agreeable to be always protesting to the Edinburgh agent that you are not to be responsible?—I think it should be the rule that the country agent should not be responsible.

5008. Do you think it incumbent on the country agent introducing a client to an Edinburgh agent, if he had any reason to doubt the sufficiency of the client, to make the Edinburgh agent aware of his doubt?—I think that should always be done. If he has any doubt, he should let it be known.

5009. He has a better opportunity of knowing the condition of the client than the Edinburgh agent has?—Yes.

5010. Dr. Barclay.—Would you make that an exception to your general rule?—I am supposing that it is a concealment which almost amounts to fraud. If he suppresses the truth wilfully, he would be liable on another ground. But if the client is habit and repute good when he is introduced, there should be no responsibility on the country agent.

5012. The Chairman.—Are there any other points which you wish to bring under the notice of the Commissioners?—No.

5013. Do you think there is any hardship attending the system of arresting ships and dismantling them?—Of course it might sometimes be a hardship to the people having goods on board; but if they have goods on board a ship which is clearly indebted to a creditor, they must submit to that inconvenience, and take their remedy against the shipowners for any damage that may accrue. I might perhaps suggest, that I think there should be a claim equal to a lien or preference in favour of creditors furnishing goods to a ship for a voyage on which she is about to proceed. I think there ought to be some rule of that kind.

5014. Dr. Barclay.—A lien on what?—Perhaps the remedy which I have already suggested would cover it; but there is great inconvenience, and often great loss occurs by shipmasters getting introduced to people and ordering goods and supplies for a voyage. These people expect payment till the last moment, and the shipmaster goes off without settling with them.

5015. Mr. Baxter.—They have given them the means of prosecuting their voyage?—Yes; without these goods the voyage could not have been begun. They ought to have a lien or preference for these goods if the ship is attached, and in competition.

5016. Mr. Shand.—Do you find that the remedy of dismantling ships is used oppressively?—No, I have never known an instance of that.

5017. You are aware that at present an alleged creditor may dismantle a ship on obtaining a merely formal order from a court, with a warrant to arrest?—Yes.

5018. Do you not think that is too great a power to give to a creditor, without the circumstances having been specially brought under the notice of the judge, and without special leave obtained?—You might perhaps call upon the creditor, in a case like that, to make oath to his debt before he got the power to arrest and dismantle; but I think that is a power which could not be with safety abandoned, because the ship would be off, and the remedy lost.

5019. But are there not cases in which small claims have been brought suddenly forward, and considerable hardship inflicted by keeping the vessel from sailing?—I have known one or two cases of that description—claims which the people themselves thought good, but which did not turn out to be good on investigation. But I don't think that is a hardship that has ever practically come under my observation.

5020. Have you had a great many cases of dismantling vessels in your own practice?—I have had them, but not many of them. We don't go to that extreme, if it can be avoided.

5021. How often does that occur in the port of Greenock or neighbourhood?—Very seldom. If the arrestment is in, and we have reason to believe that they will keep good faith, we don't dismantle; but if we think it is a person not to be trusted, we do dismantle.

5022. Dr. Barclay.—Can you not dismantle under the arrestment to found jurisdiction?—I doubt very much whether it is competent.

5023. You get the warrant from the local judge?—Simply to arrest to found jurisdiction.

5024. Is not the form given in the books to dismantle as well?—No.

5025. Then what is the use of it?—That is just the question. It has always been considered that it was not safe to trust to that arrestment until we got the arrestment ad effectum.

5026. Which you get from the Court of Session?—Yes.

5027. I daresay you remember the time when there was very stringent caution in all Admiralty cases?—Yes.

5028. That is now done away with?—Yes.

5029. On both sides?—Yes.

5030. Both pursuer and defender had to find caution?—If the one found caution, he had a right to ask the other to do so.

5031. Is it your opinion that the total abolition of caution in maritime cases has been beneficial, or would you have it in any degree put on again?—If we are allowed to arrest in the first instance, we thereby establish a nexus which renders caution unnecessary. If you have the power of arresting the vessel, caution is not necessary; but without that power, I think it would be necessary. For instance, if I put goods on board to furnish a ship, and she is going away on a voyage, and the freight is all paid on the other side; if I bring my action against the ship or the owners before she leaves, I think I should be entitled to get caution for the goods actually put on board, since I cannot get the freight.

5032. You have not that power just now?—No.

5033. You had it before?—Yes.

5034. Before dismantling a vessel, the creditor should make oath to the validity of his debt?—Yes.

5035. The Chairman.—If the creditor is at a distance, he should send an oath with his application?—Yes.

5036. Are there any courts in Greenock that exercise jurisdiction except the Sheriff Court?—None have maritime jurisdiction.

5037. Dr. Barclay.—Is there not the Water Bailie?—He lives in Glasgow.

5038. Has he not jurisdiction to the Cloch Lighthouse?—Yes.

5039. The Chairman.—Does the Baron Bailie exercise jurisdiction?—No; he does not hold any court.

5040. The magistrates?—The magistrates don't exercise any civil jurisdiction.

5041. Do they exercise criminal jurisdiction?—They exercise it in their police courts; and we have a Dean of Guild.

5042. Does he exercise jurisdiction?—Yes.

5043. In what class of cases?—In the same way that all Deans of Guild in Scotland do; but I think the constitution of the court is very defective, and that the Sheriff should have cumulative jurisdiction with him in everything.

5044. Mr. Baxter.—You think it is objectionable?—Yes, it is most objectionable in its constitution.

5045. The Chairman.—What is its constitution?—The Dean of Guild is one of the bailies. He is also a member of the Police Board as a councillor. The Police Board give orders for certain improvements about the town, and he is one of the parties who resolve that these things are to be done. He then goes with his court, and sits with four assistants and judges whether these things should be done or not.

5046. What are the four assistants?—A council of advisers.

5047. Mr. Baxter.—Has he a legal assessor?—Yes.

5048. Mr. Webster.—Is the assessor the town-clerk?—Yes.

5049. The Chairman.—You think there ought to be a cumulative jurisdiction with the Sheriff?—I think so. I think it is a very badly constituted court at present.

5050. Do you think there should be an abolition of it, and that the jurisdiction should be given entirely to the Sheriff?—The Dean of Guild Court was constituted only in 1865 by the Police Act.

5051. Do you think it would be better if the power was vested in the Sheriff?—Yes; I think it should be abolished altogether.

5052. Do you think there is so much to do in the Dean of Guild Court, that the business would be too heavy for the Sheriff?—I think they make more business in the Dean of Guild Court than is necessary.

5053. Mr. Baxter.—You think the Sheriff could overtake it?—Quite easily.

5054. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think it is of advantage that there should be a court of that kind to deal with matters of municipal regulation, in regard to which the members are much better acquainted than the Sheriff could be?—They appoint members of the Police Board to sit and advise the Dean of Guild. They don't call in tradesmen at all. The Dean of Guild Court is quite an anomalous court.

5055. Don't you think the constitution of the court has the advantages I have pointed out?—I don't think it. I don't think a bailie, chosen as he may be by haphazard, is a better judge than the Sheriff; and I don't think his advisers, who are taken from the general Police Board, and who are not tradesmen, can advise him in regard to buildings or linings in any way.

5056.—Do you know how the Dean of Guild Court works in Glasgow?—Tradesmen are called in to assist there.

5057. If that were done, would it obviate your objection?—Partly; but I think it is wrong to let a judge first sit at the Police Board, and determine that certain things shall be done, and afterwards sit in the Dean of Guild Court to determine as to the same matters.

5058. Dr. Barclay.—Greenock is not a royal burgh?—No.

5059. You had no Dean of Guild till the Police Act of 1865?—No.

5060. Did the inhabitants of Greenock suffer from the want of it previously?—No.

5061. Has there been any improvement since?—I don't think so. I think the Sheriff's judgments would give satisfaction to the community. The people have not confidence in the Dean of Guild Court as it at present exists.

5062. Is the Dean of Guild's province defined in the Police Act?—Yes.

5063. Is it as extensive as the Dean of Guild's in a royal burgh?—It is expressly so stated.

5064. The Chairman.—The Dean of Guild may have no special qualifications for the office?—Quite so, and his advisers are in the same position; and another anomaly is, that while they give him advice, he is not bound to take it.

5065. Dr. Barclay.—I suppose very important questions come before that court?—Yes; there is one depending just now before the Court of Session.

5066. The Chairman.—Do they deal with the matter of the Shaws Water?—No, that is now acquired by the town, and there is a separate trust for it called the Water Trust.

5067. The Dean of Guild exercises no jurisdiction about the repairs?—If there is anything needing repair in the buildings, he would take cognizance of that.

5068. You think the jurisdiction should be transferred to the Sheriff?—Yes.

5069. Do the Justices of the Peace exercise jurisdiction?—They do, in questions of seamen's wages, and otherwise.

5070. Do you think their Small Debt Court is a good court?—I have no doubt it is well administered. In regard to seamen's wages, I should say that the judges sitting are very generally shipowners, and they are apt to be a little biassed.

5071. Dr. Barclay.—Does the Mercantile Marine Amendment Act not contain a clause excluding them if they are shipowners?—Not if they are shipowners, but if they are interested in the particular ship.

5072. The Chairman.—Do the Quarter Sessions review the judgment of the magistrates in granting licences?—They do. I think it is very improper to leave the licensing of public-houses in the hands of the magistrates.

5073. Mr. Clark.—Where would you put it?—It was infinitely better in the hands of the Justices.

5075. Mr. Shand.—Is there such a thing as canvassing of Justices with a view to granting licences?—That has been done.

5076. Is that not an objection to the tribunal?—I think it is. It would be much better in the hands of a stipendiary. There is no such great pressure on the Justices as there is on the magistrates. The magistrates have to be elected by the community again, and they depend on their votes for the election perhaps.

5077. Do you think the matter of licensing as you now have it is better than it would be in the hands of a Sheriff or stipendiary?—I think it would be infinitely better in the hands of the Sheriff or a stipendiary.

5078. Then you would transfer the jurisdiction as to licensing to the Sheriff?—I think so.

5079. Mr. Baxter.—Would you prefer that to the Justices of the Peace?—I would prefer them to the magistrates, but I would prefer the Sheriff to the Justices.

5080. The Chairman.—Does that apply to Greenock alone, or do you extend it to the country districts?—I think, where there is an election going on in a burgh, when the magistrates require to consult these spirit dealers, and get their influence in carrying their elections, it is a very wrong thing to put the licensing in their hands.

5081. Do you think the Sheriff a superior tribunal to the Justices in reference to country districts?—In country districts I think the Justices might retain it. I see no evil arising there.

FRIDAY, 8th JANUARY 1869.

Members Present:—

J. B. Baxter, Esq.

The Right Hon. LORD COLONSAY in the Chair.

Henry Cockburn Macandrew.

Henry Cockburn Macandrew, Esq., examined.

5082. The Chairman.—You are a solicitor before the Sheriff Court at Inverness?—I am.

5083. How long have you been so?—Since 1855.

5084. Do you hold any official appointment?—I do not, except that of Secretary to the Faculty of Solicitors.

5085. In how many places in Inverness-shire are there Sheriff-substitutes?—In Inverness, Fort William, Portree, and Lochmaddy.

5086. I believe the Sheriff-substitute at Fort William has a district partly carved out of Inverness-shire and partly out of Argyleshire?—Yes.

5087. Have you any observations to make upon the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of the Sheriff and his substitutes?—I think that, on the whole, the Sheriff Courts give satisfaction to the country; but I think also that it would be a great advantage to the community if the status of the judges in the first instance was raised, and if one had a more satisfactory appeal than the present one, from one Sheriff to another, at something like the same expense.

5088. Mr. Baxter.—You mean if you had the appeal court strengthened a little?—Exactly.

5089. The Chairman.—What have you to suggest as to a more satisfactory court of appeal?—I think that if we had an appeal to two judges, it would be much more satisfactory than the present system; and it would not necessarily be more expensive, either to the country or to the litigants.

5090. Do you mean that two Sheriffs should sit together to hear the appeal?—Two Sheriffs, or similar judges, with very much larger salaries than the present Sheriffs draw, and confined entirely to the appeal functions.

5091. When you say confined to the appeal functions, do you mean that their official duty should be confined to that, or do you mean that they should be excluded from practice?—I mean that they should not practise,—that they should be simply appeal judges.

5092. That an appeal should lie from the Sheriff-substitute to them?—Yes.

5093. Has any mode of disposing of these appeals suggested itself to your mind?—My own decided impression is that the appeals should be heard orally, and that we should not have written pleadings. That, I think, is more satisfactory in every way, and less liable to error than the system of written pleadings.

5094. Do you think that oral pleadings would be more or less expensive to the party than written pleadings?—The oral pleading is very much less expensive.

5095. That would do away with the reclaiming petition?—Yes.

5096. How often do you think the judges should sit to hear such appeals?—That, of course, would depend on the result of a little experience as to the amount of business; but I should think that once a month would be quite satisfactory, and it would be at any rate a very great improvement on the present system. In our county we have the Sheriff only about three times a year.

5097. At present some of the appeals are dealt with by written pleadings, and these are transmitted to the Sheriff?—Yes; but I may mention that in Inverness-shire, I believe, that is not often done now.

5098. You have the opportunity of oral pleadings only about three times a year?—Yes.

5099. And you would desire to have it about once a month?—Yes.

5100. Would you have the judges to go to each seat of a Sheriff-substitute?—Unless the business very largely increases, that would not be necessary, because except in Inverness there is very little business before the Sheriff-substitutes. I think it would be quite sufficient for the appeal judges to sit in Inverness, not only for Inverness-shire, but also for Nairnshire, Morayshire, and Ross-shire. I am assuming that the country would be divided into districts larger than the present Sheriffdoms.

5101. How many districts?—I have seen a calculation based on the appeals in Glasgow, showing that five districts would be sufficient.

5102. Mr. Baxter.—That implies ten judges?—Yes.

5103. The Chairman.—You think that Inverness would be a centre, as it were, for hearing appeals from other parts of the district?—We would naturally expect to have it at Inverness.

5104. Do you think that it would suit to have it there, looking to the population of the district?—Looking to the means of communication, I think it is the natural centre.

5105. What range do you think it would comprehend? Would you take in the range of the whole Criminal Circuit?—I believe the business of that Circuit would not be too much for a single court.

5106. But would the convenience of the litigants be sufficiently consulted by holding it at one place?—Of course there would be necessarily very great inconvenience to litigants from the remoter parts of Inverness-shire and Ross-shire, but there would probably seldom be cases from these more remote districts; and the convenience of all the practising agents, except in the islands, would be sufficiently consulted, more particularly when the Skye Railway is finished, which will open up the western district.

5107. The paucity of cases would perhaps not be a strong argument in the mind of individual litigants?—Clearly not; but there must be exceptional cases under any system.

5108. Mr. Adam.—Does the Sheriff-depute at present go to Lochmaddy and Portree to hear appeals?—Yes; he goes there when there are cases.

5109. The Chairman.—Would you hold the appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the two appeal judges to be final?—Clearly not.

5110. You would have an appeal from these judges to the Court of Session?—Yes; at least on questions of law. My own inclination would be, to hold it final on questions of fact.

5111. To any amount?—Yes.

5112. Would you have them to review the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute upon the matter of fact?—It appears to me that the investigation of questions of fact is the great difficulty in rearranging the courts, and I don't think that the present system of review on matters of fact is altogether satisfactory on the proofs as at present taken; but I have a difficulty in suggesting anything that would be satisfactory on that point. I have seen a suggestion that the three judges should sit together and try questions of fact.

5113. That is, the two appeal judges and the Sheriff-substitute of the district?—Yes; and if that is practicable, I think it would be a highly satisfactory court for trying matters of fact. But whether it is practicable would depend of course on the amount of business, and on the number of proofs to be taken, as to which I have not seen any statistics.

5114. In the district of which Inverness would be the centre, would you have the Sheriff-substitute of the district from which the appeal comes to be the third judge who would sit with the others to take the proof? When a case comes from Ross-shire, would the Sheriff-substitute of Ross be the person to sit; or if a case came from Lochmaddy, would it be the Sheriff-substitute at Lochmaddy?—If that arrangement was to be adopted, I think it would be necessary that the appeal judges should go to these places to take proofs, because the expense of bringing witnesses such a distance would be a very serious matter.

5115. Then you think the appeal judges should go to the districts?—They should go at least to the head burghs of the districts.

5116. In regard to appeals on matters of law, who would sit with the two judges of appeal in a case from Sutherlandshire?—My proposal was that the two appeal judges should try questions of law on appeals from the resident judge, so that it would not be necessary that any third judge should sit with them in trying appeals; and while I stated that Inverness might be a convenient centre for the sitting of the court, if it is to sit at only one place in each district, I can see no good reason why the court should not go to the other counties and hear appeals from them.

5117. Is there any class of cases in which you would hold the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute to be final?—In small debt cases I think it should be final.

5118. You mean cases under £12?—Yes. I would not be inclined to extend it beyond that.

5119. Mr. Adam.—Even where the judge might certify that there was a reasonable ground for appeal?—I am not in favour of giving a judge the power of allowing appeals, because practically it would come to this, that an appeal would be allowed whenever it was asked. It is a delicate thing for a judge to refuse to allow an appeal from his own judgment.

5120. The Chairman.—Is there any point at which you think the judgment of the two judges should be final?—If one had a sufficiently cheap appeal to the Court of Session, I think it would be desirable that there should not; but at present I think it might be made final up to £100 or £200 in money value.

5121. Whatever might be the nature of the question involved?—Yes.

5122. Do you think that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff should be extended to questions other than those in which it is now competent?—Most decidedly.

5123. Such as?—I have tried to see any sufficient objection to extending the Sheriff's jurisdiction to all cases, and none occurs to my mind. It appears to me that the questions tried by the Sheriff are as difficult as any that could arise in cases which are at present excluded from his jurisdiction; and that there can be no reason why a judge who is competent to decide any question involving any pecuniary amount in a commercial matter, should not decide all other questions, more particularly questions of heritage, where there is nothing involved except pecuniary value. In questions between husband and wife, and parent and child, I have frequently seen cases of very gross hardship arising from the fact that the Sheriff has no jurisdiction.

5124. Do you apply your remark also to questions of declarator of marriage and legitimacy?—With an appeal, I can see no objection to the Sheriff trying them in the first instance.

5125. Mr. Murray.—Do you apply it to questions of divorce?—Yes; and my great reason for holding that opinion so strongly is, that at present all these actions are luxuries to rich people, which are quite denied to the poor.

5126. Mr. Adam.—Suppose you were to give that extended jurisdiction to the Sheriff, would you still hold that there should be no appeal on questions of fact from the appeal court?—I can conceive that there might be hardship if there was no appeal; but on the whole, I am inclined to think that on matters of fact the decision of three qualified judges sitting together is about as good as any decision that could be got.

5127. Mr. Murray.—And that might regulate the succession to landed estates in different counties from that in which the action was originally raised?—Yes. I don't see that the fact of the lands being in different counties affects the judgment.

5128. But does it not affect the question of the expediency of giving the Sheriffs that power?—If a Sheriff can try a question affecting heritage in two counties, he can give as satisfactory a judgment as if it was situated only in one.

5129. But do you think it expedient that that power should be given with reference to estates scattered over the country, without an appeal to the Supreme Court?—You make the judgment of a jury in Edinburgh applicable to land all over Scotland; and, in my opinion, the judgment of three such judges as I have mentioned would be infinitely more satisfactory.

5130. But that is a jury directed by a judge of the Supreme Court?—Yes.

5131. Would you think it expedient to give the Sheriffs that power?—Yes. That is to say, I see many objections to the working of it, which could only be solved by an accurate knowledge of statistics. I have not had an opportunity of examining these statistics, so that I am not prepared to say that it is practicable to constitute such a court; but if the court could do the work, my opinion is that it would be very satisfactory.

5132. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—You would make the judgment conclusive as regards the other counties in which the property lies?—If the question was involved in the action raised.

5133. The property lying in several counties, would the pursuer have the option as to the county in which he should bring his suit?—There would require to be some regulation as to that.

5134. What would you propose?—I should be inclined to give the pursuer of the action his option.

5135. And the decision of the court of appeal would be final?—On matters of fact. It would not be a court of appeal on matters of fact, but an original court.

5136. In what cases would you allow three judges to sit?—The three judges would sit to try questions of fact.

5137. And two only for questions of law?—The law, according to my proposition, would be decided in the first instance by the resident Sheriff, with an appeal to the two judges.

5138. And in the event of difference of opinion between these two?—Then the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute would stand. The advantage of that over the present system is, that it gives a judgment by two to one always. At present the appeal is from one Sheriff to another, and where they differ it is very unsatisfactory.

5139. Would you state generally what are the inconveniences which are felt from the present system of appeal to a single Sheriff?—One inconvenience is the infrequency of the Sheriff's sittings in the county. That applies more to counties such as Inverness-shire than to counties nearer Edinburgh. The second is the feeling that the profession generally have, that a great many of the Sheriffs are not men of the standing in their profession which they ought to be, holding that position.

5140. Mr. Baxter.—That they are not much superior to the Sheriff-substitutes?—Quite so.

5141. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—Are their judgments frequently appealed against, or are they generally recognised as final?—The tables of statistics show that the number of appeals from the Sheriff to the Court of Session is small. That arises in a great measure, I believe, from the fact that, although not quite satisfactory, the second discussion and decision are advantageous, and that when the two Sheriffs agree, the decision is satisfactory. But the great cause is, I believe, dread of the expense of the Court of Session.

5142. If such a court of appeal as you have suggested were established, would you propose that the Sheriffs should retain their executive functions?—No; my proposal would be that they should not.

5143. You think they should be merely judges of appeal?—Yes; but that, of course, is coupled with the raising of the status of the resident Sheriffs, which I think is essential.

5144. Then they would be local judges of appeal appointed throughout the country, with no other functions excepting those of an appeal court?—Exactly, unless they also sat as judges upon evidence in the first instance, as I have proposed.

5145. The Chairman.—Would you have the judgment of these two judges final as to any class of questions of heritage?—I think so, in questions of small value.

5146. Of what value?—I should say £200 would not be too much.

5147. But in questions of status you would allow an appeal?—In all questions involving considerations beyond pecuniary amount I would allow appeal.

5148. Such as?—Such as cases of status.

5149. What do you say as to an action ad factum præstandum?—There would be some difficulty in ascertaining any limit there; but I think, if you make them final as to questions of property in land up to £200, you may also make them final as to questions of that kind where the actual pecuniary value of the subject in dispute is not greater.

5150. But you think there may be a difficulty in finding whether it is within the limit?—There is a difficulty in that which would require to be got over. That might be met by allowing the case to be sent to the Supreme Court if the defender wishes it.

5151. Do you mean that the losing party should have an appeal?—No, I mean that when the action is brought in the Sheriff Court, the defender should have power to have it removed to the Supreme Court.

5152. Mr. Baxter.—Provided it is of a certain value?—I would allow that, in order to avoid any dispute as to value. Let the defender have the option, taking his risk of the expense.

5153. The Chairman.—That is, where the value is indefinite?—Yes.

5155. Have the appointments of Sheriff-substitutes generally given satisfaction, do you think?—I believe not. So far as I have had an opportunity of ascertaining the views of my brethren in other counties, they have not, as a rule.

5156. The Sheriff has a material interest, has he not, in getting an efficient Sheriff-substitute?—To some extent he has; but that does not appear to have weighed considerably with many Sheriffs.

5157. Is it not a comparatively recent thing, that Sheriff-substitutes are generally taken from the bar?—I believe it is. It is since the appointments became more valuable than they were before.

5158. You don't think that is a satisfactory thing?—I think it would be very satisfactory that they should be taken from the bar if we got advocates of standing; but at present they are, as a rule, taken from men who have admittedly no chance of success at the bar.

5159. But you think if the emoluments are increased, they ought to be taken from the bar?—I don't say that altogether. I think it would be a great advantage that it should be left open to members of my own branch of the profession also.

5160. Then you think it ought to be a matter of choice whether to take them from the bar, or from practitioners in the local courts?—I think so.

5161. Mr. Campbell.—Are you aware that in the case of some Sheriff Courts, where the emoluments are comparatively large, gentlemen of considerable practice have been induced to accept the appointment of Sheriff-substitute?—I am not aware of any case lately where a barrister with anything like good practice has accepted a Sheriff-substituteship, and it is not worth the while of a man who has any chance in his profession to take such an appointment.

5162. The Chairman.—What do you think the emoluments ought to be, so as to secure the services of the kind of person you point at?—I don't think any man could take the position with satisfaction to himself with less than £1000 a year.

5163. Mr. Adam.—Do you propose to appoint in Lochmaddy, Portree, and Fort William, Sheriff-substitutes with £1000 a year?—No. I mean that that should be given to the principal Sheriff-substitute in each county, residing at the county town.

5165. And you think that the Sheriff-substitutes at the other places, if they were retained, ought to deal merely with police matters as magistrates?—I think it would be sufficient to have police magistrates there.

5166. To deal with matters criminal?—Yes; and it might be advisable to let them hold Small Debt Courts.

5167. Mr. Baxter.—Is it very much so at present?—There is very little civil business at any of the outlying districts of Inverness-shire.

5168. Mr. Adam.—To what extent, in that case, would you give the resident Sheriff jurisdiction in regard to crime?—I have not had much experience in criminal practice, but I think the jurisdiction of the resident Sheriff might be extended. So far as I have observed, the class of cases decided by the Circuit Court is not materially different from those usually decided by the Sheriff.

5169. But my question refers to the Sheriff acting as a police magistrate at Lochmaddy and such places?—They would deal with police cases.

5170. Mr. Baxter.—What is the practice just now? Where is the Jury Court held?—All the Jury Courts are held at Inverness.

5171. Mr. Adam.—Are you aware, in point of practice, that cases which might otherwise be tried by jury owing to their serious nature, are sometimes tried before the Sheriff, on account of the expense and trouble of sending witnesses to Inverness?—There was a case lately from Lochmaddy appointed to be tried by jury; but some of the witnesses did not appear, and it was sent to be tried summarily.

5172. The Chairman.—As to the two appeal judges, what qualification would you require for them, and what should be their emoluments?—I think they ought to be taken from the bar, and that they should be eligible for promotion to the Supreme Court. I don't think that less than £2000 a year would be sufficient remuneration for them.

5173. You would exclude them from practising at the bar?—If they got districts similar to the Circuit districts, that would necessarily be the case.

5174. Mr. Baxter.—They would have work enough?—Yes; just as in the case of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire at present.

5175. The Chairman.—You think that if they went to the different outlying districts forming part of the Inverness Circuit, they would have sufficient occupation?—I assume that they would sit, not at Inverness alone, but at the other county towns at least. I would not propose that they should go to Lochmaddy or Skye, because there really is very seldom an appeal from these districts, I believe.

5176. And very few proofs to be taken?—I am not prepared to say how many proofs there are; but I know that they have generally only one or two cases, and sometimes not that number.

5177. Lord Barcaple.—You mean one or two in a year?—Yes.

5178. The Chairman.—Have you any remarks to make about the forms of proceeding in the Sheriff Court in civil matters?—I think that the three forms of process which we have at present are altogether unnecessary.

5179. Mr. Baxter.—You mean the Small Debt, Debts Recovery, and Ordinary Court forms?—Yes. I think that the system of processes under the Debts Recovery Act might with advantage be abolished, except as to the form which it introduces, and which is practically the same as the Small Debt form, of obtaining decrees in absence cheaply. At the time of the discussion of the Debts Recovery Act, my opinion was that the only real grievance which the mercantile bodies who agitated for it had to complain of, was the expense of obtaining decrees in absence. I would recommend that all cases should originate as they do in the Small Debt Court now, and that the expense should begin only when it is found that the cases are to be defended.

5180. You mean that cases should begin with a writ of summons, such as there is in the Small Debt Court?—Yes, so that any person can obtain a decree in absence without employing an agent at all, if he chooses.

5181. Mr. Campbell.—You would require the debt to be identified by some schedule?—Yes, there could be no res judicata otherwise; but that is done in the Small Debt Court by an account being produced, or a statement being introduced into the summons.

5182. Mr. Baxter.—A decree in absence could be got at very small expense?—I see no reason why it should cost above 5s. or 10s., apart from the expense of an officer serving the writ at a distance.

5183. The Chairman.—If appearance were made, what course would the case take?—My feeling is in favour of the present system of records. I am aware that it is abused; but if we had a higher class of judges, and if it was impressed on them that it was their duty to check any abuse of it effectually, I think the present form of process is simple and good.

5184. Mr. Baxter.—When you speak of abuse, do you mean that records are made up in the long form by condescendence and answers, when they might be made up under the short form?—I am not in favour of the short form of record; but I think records at present are often too long.

5185. The Chairman.—Too verbose?—Yes; and as entering too much into detail.

5186. Mr. Campbell.—Then you disapprove of the minute of defence?—I think it is clumsy. There might be a more articulate statement on both sides, without any increase of the length.

5187. Mr. Baxter.—But you find you don't have that in practice?—In practice the records are often made unnecessarily long; but we often have them such as there could be no objection to. The present form of the summons is also very awkward, in introducing the grounds of action as a parenthetical clause in the conclusions.

5188. The Chairman.—You think the small debt form the better form?—If you introduce anything beyond an account, that is liable to the same objection; but it might be very easily modified by introducing into the body of the summons, and before the conclusion, such a statement as is now introduced parenthetically in the conclusion.

5189. Mr. Campbell.—Or it might be done by a schedule appended to the summons?—Yes, it might be indorsed on the summons.

5190. The Chairman.—Do you see any mode of checking the prolixity of practitioners in making their statements?—I would suggest that the Sheriff should in all cases, when he closes the record, indorse on it what length of a paper ought to be allowed. I don't mean that he should interfere with the paper, but that he should state how many sheets should be allowed in the taxation of the account.

5191. Do you think that the closing of the record is the proper time for that? Would it not be better after he has heard the use that parties are to make of it?—It is more immediately under his notice when the record is closed. Afterwards his mind is more directed to the decision of the case.

5192. But if he does it when the record is closed, he must in some degree anticipate what is to be the case, and what are the reasons for the introduction of the statements?—I don't think it is material at what stage he does it, and perhaps it would be better at the end of the case; but I think a great deal might be done in that way if Sheriffs felt more that they were responsible for the proper conduct of business in their courts than they appear to do at present.

5193. And if the practitioners aimed at brevity?—If the Sheriffs addressed themselves to that, I think practitioners would very soon take up a tone that they are not encouraged to take up at present.

5194. Lord Barcaple.—Is it the fact that there are not many cases in the Sheriff Court in which a somewhat detailed explanatory statement is desirable?—The only reason for that is to give notice to the opposite party of what you are going to prove; and I think, as a rule, if you state distinctly and accurately the grounds of action, that would be sufficient. My objection does not point at records in the Sheriff Court only. I have seen quite as bad records in the Supreme Court as any I ever saw in the Sheriff Courts.

5195. I suppose you don't find cases occurring frequently in which any detailed statement is really beneficial?—There are some cases where you require necessarily to go into more detail than others; but my remarks point at this, that detail is gone into in most cases to a greater extent than it ought to be.

5197. And that would stand over till the judges of appeal came?—Yes, if that plan were adopted; but I am giving the opinion as to taking the proofs in the way I have suggested, with the reservation that it would depend on whether the judges could do the amount of work.

5198. Do you think that appeals should continue to exist at the stages at which appeals are now competent?—I think there should be no appeal till final judgment.

5199. You would have no appeal on any preliminary matter?—No. The only matter in which an appeal might be necessary would be as to the admission or rejection of evidence; and I am inclined to think that appeals of that kind should be as much discouraged as possible, and of course no such appeal would be necessary if the case were tried by three judges, as I have suggested.

5200. Would you exclude altogether appeals on preliminary defences?—Until the final judgment; and I would be inclined to allow the summons to be amended at any stage, so as to obviate any merely technical objection, imposing always a sufficient fine for the default.

5201. Suppose an objection to jurisdiction, or an objection in point of law which would go to extinguish the action if it was sustained, would you exclude all appeal upon that till the end of the cause, and go to proof in the meantime?—If it was such an objection that it would render proof unnecessary if decided in a particular way, it might be advisable to have an appeal, although I am not sure that the ends of justice would not be better met by letting the party take his chance, and suffering for his wrong action.

5202. Lord Barcaple.—Do you think the party is not very apt to leave himself entirely in the hands of his agent in that matter?—The agent, of course, is responsible, and must take the consequences of his responsibility.

5203. But there is no remedy, I suppose, if he has made an error in judgment?—No, if it is a reasonable error.

5204. The Chairman.—Do you think that in all cases where an investigation of fact is to take place, that should take place before there is any judgment upon a preliminary point at all?—Certainly before any judgment on merely technical objections, which could be obviated by an amendment of the summons.

5205. But otherwise?—Otherwise, I think it might be advisable that if the objection were such that decree of absolvitor must pass if it is well founded, an appeal should be allowed before proof.

5206. You think that in that case it would be right for the Sheriff in the first instance to decide upon that point?—I think so, because that would render unnecessary the great expense of a proof which might be useless.

5207. Mr. Campbell.—According to the form of process which you recommend, I understand that whenever the Sheriff-substitute, or the judge in the first instance, considered that the case required to go to proof, it would be remitted from his court to that of the three judges?—The three judges would then sit very much as a jury.

5208. But would that not be a position of matters in which any defence of a prejudicial character might be disposed of before the actual diet of proof was fixed?—That is what I said in answer to Lord Colonsay's last question; and, of course, if appeals could be had as frequently as I suggest, the objection that exists to the number of appeals would be in a great measure removed.

5209. Mr. Shand.—An objection to numerous appeals is, of course, the expense?—Yes, and another is the delay; but the delay would be obviated if we had the appeal court sitting once a month.

5210. The same purpose might be served supposing the Sheriff went to his jurisdiction once a month, as far as delay is concerned?—Yes.

5211. You are aware that at present it is competent to appeal when an order for proof or a remit is made?—Yes.

5212. Don't you think that is a valuable provision, as giving the right of appeal at a stage when considerable expense is about to be incurred?—I have said that I think an appeal should be allowed where the point would necessarily exclude proof.

5213. There are two points at present at which such an appeal may be taken—one when a preliminary plea is disposed of, and again when a proof is ordered?—Yes.

5214. Don't you think that the first of these might be advantageously done away with, making the power of appeal only at the last of these stages, so as to cover both?—Yes, I think the fewer appeals the better. I have seen a case in which there were thirteen appeals to the Sheriff before final judgment.

5215. The Chairman.—Were some of these in the course of leading the proof?—No; there was no proof. It was an action of multiplepoinding in which various questions arose.

5216. Perhaps there were thirteen parties?—There were only three parties.

5217. Lord Barcaple.—But you find that, practically, the number of appeals taken is a great grievance?—Yes; that makes the cases take three times as long as they otherwise would do.

5218. Might not many of them be dispensed with without any disadvantage?—Many of them are unnecessary, and are not pleaded before the Sheriff.

5219. Mr. Baxter.—Are they taken for the sake of delay?—Yes.

5220. Mr. Shand.—I think there are only five or six stages at which an appeal can be taken at present?—There are only two properly before final judgment, viz. on a preliminary defence, and on the order allowing proof.

5221. Also at the close of the proof?—Yes, if objections are taken to evidence.

5222. And on the merits?—Yes.

5223. And a fifth is on the expenses?—Yes.

5224. Do you think that two or three of these might be done away with?—I think the appeal about the expenses might certainly be done away with. It may not be possible to get rid altogether of the appeal in evidence if you are to have review on evidence; but appeals on that should be discouraged as much as possible.

5225. Lord Barcaple.—As a general rule, do you find that the proof causes a very large portion of the whole expense of the cause?—A very large portion—the expense of witnesses.

5226. Mr. Campbell.—And time?—Yes.

5227. Lord Barcaple.—But the expense of the proof is a very large portion of the expense of the cause?—Yes, but the expense of witnesses attending a proof cannot be got rid of by any system.

5228. Mr. Campbell.—A very large proportion of the cases tried in the Sheriff Court are disposed of after proof?—It was my impression that the proportion was larger than it appears to be. I got from the Sheriff-clerk-depute a few days ago 27 accounts of expenses; I asked him to pick out accounts in which decrees had been extracted in the course of this year; he sent me 27, chosen at random, and which were all he could lay his hands on, and in only 5 of these were there proofs. The payments to witnesses alone in these amounted to about one-fifth of the whole expense.

5229. Assuming that proofs continue to be taken by the judge in the first instance, are you of opinion that it would be an advantage to give him a permissive power to employ, where he could obtain it, the assistance of a shorthand writer?—I think it would be an advantage to have the proof taken by a shorthand writer.

5230. Lord Barcaple.—With what view?—The appeal judge would get a much more correct view of the evidence than he can do by the Sheriff taking it down shortly.

5231. The Chairman.—Would you let the Sheriff dictate what was to be put down, or would the shorthand writer take down every question and every answer?—I think the most satisfactory way would be, if competent shorthand writers could be got, to take down question and answer.

5232. Would that not lead to an immense bulk of evidence, or rather of written matter?—That is the only objection to it, and it is an objection.

5233. It would be difficult to find out in three or four printed pages the only point that is involved?—That might happen.

5234. How would it answer if the Sheriff were to dictate in the hearing of the parties what the shorthand writer is to put down?—I think the objection to that would be, that there would be endless disputes between the Sheriff and the agents as to what should be put down.

5235. Proofs taken on commission are dictated in that way to a clerk, the evidence is then read over to the witness, and signed by him?—Yes. Proofs on commission take very much longer than proof before the Sheriff.

5236. When the Sheriff takes the evidence himself, he takes his own notes, and there is no reading over and no signing?—The Act provides that the evidence should be read over, but it is very often not read over.

5237. Mr. Baxter.—You don't know what the Sheriff has taken down until the end?—The Sheriff at Inverness is exceedingly accommodating, and tells us from time to time, at any important point, what he is taking down, so that we cannot complain of any practical inconvenience beyond the fact that it is a mere summary of the evidence that goes to the appeal judge.

5238. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—Does he read the evidence to you after he has taken it down?—He is bound to do that, unless the parties dispense with it, which they very often do.

5239. The Chairman.—And if they have confidence in the Sheriff's way of taking it down, they may be disposed to dispense with it?—Yes; and we almost invariably do so.

5240. Mr. Baxter.—What is your opinion as to extending juries to the Sheriff Court?—I have heard that very much discussed, but I would decidedly object to it. There is one suggestion that has been made with reference to proofs, viz., that the evidence should be taken down by a shorthand writer, and that parties should be heard, and the judgment on the facts given immediately, and that the notes should only be extended in cases where there was an appeal on the matter of fact. That might be a good system.

5241. Would that not require the shorthand writer to remain during the discussion upon the evidence?—Yes; that would be necessary, but it would not occupy very much more of his time.

5242. As to the matter of review, you have expressed your opinion already. The first question is, whether there should be review within the Sheriff Court itself?—I think that a great evil would be done if we had not a review, I don't say within the court, but as cheap as we have it now; and if such a court as I have mentioned were not constituted, I think it would be a great improvement if single appeal judges were confined to large districts, with largely increased salaries, and confining themselves to appeal business.

5243. Mr. Shand.—What advantage would you expect from that arrangement over the present?—That we would get a higher class of gentlemen as a rule to undertake the office of Sheriff.

5244. In consequence of the higher salary?—Yes.

5245. Mr. Campbell.—You think there should be five districts?—That number would not give to any one district more than the Sheriff of Lanarkshire does at present.

5246. Mr. Shand.—Does not the present arrangement secure as Sheriffs those in the highest practice at the bar, except the four Crown officers?—There are a few Sheriffs who are men of the highest standing in the profession; but the great majority are not.

5247. Under the present arrangement, don't men of the highest practice at the bar accept the office of Sheriff?—They do; but there are not enough of them.

5248. Do you think that men in such practice would accept such an office if they were obliged to give up practice altogether?—I think that the ordinary rule in all cases would follow, that if you make it worth the while of good men to take these offices, good men would be found.

5249. Would you expect that men in the highest practice would accept these offices?—I would expect that more men of great ability would go to the bar than go at present.

5250. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make on the mode in which costs are charged, or the scale of them?—I think there might be a revisal and readjustment with advantage, but I don't think that the remuneration to the Sheriff Court practitioners at present is too much; in fact, I don't think it is sufficient.

5251. Do you approve of the system on which remuneration is given under the Certain Debts Recovery Act?—Most decidedly not. I think it is quite unjust. It is making one litigant who has a light case pay for another who has a heavy one, because the charge is the same in all cases.

5252. Is it in the interest of the litigants that you object to it, or is it in the interest of the agents?—I object to it principally in the interest of the agents, but also in the interest of the litigants with light cases; and in the long run I conceive that what is justice to the agents must be of advantage to the clients.

5253. And the equity of the principle?—Yes.

5254. Mr. Harrison.—You are aware that litigants generally attach great importance to obtaining speedy decisions?—I am not aware that there is any great general complaint as to that. There are occasional complaints, and there are very unnecessary delays in a great many cases.

5255. Does the Debts Recovery Act, fixing ad valorem fees, not make the interest of the procurators the same as that of the litigants with reference to avoiding these delays?—I don't think so; it is quite the reverse.

5256. When the maximum expense is fixed, is it not the interest of the procurator that as little delay as possible should take place?—I think not; because if the agent has anything else to do, he naturally postpones the case that pays him worst.

5257. Are you aware that the ad valorem principle has been in operation in the County Courts in England?—Under a very different system from that established by the Debts Recovery Act.

5258. What is the difference?—The difference is, that the case in England is tried at one sitting.

5259. Does that apply to all cases in which there are ad valorem fees?—So I understand. The diet of trial is appointed, and the case is then tried and decided. Under the Debts Recovery Act there is a sort of a record, and there may be as many adjournments as need be,—a separate diet for making up the record and for the trial, an appeal to the Sheriff and to the Court of Session.

5260. Do you think that if the system in England were introduced into Scotland, the ad valorem fees would then work well?—I think the ad valorem fee is unjust in principle, and should not be introduced anywhere. The remuneration should be with reference to the amount of work done.

5261. Mr. Adam.—Is the Debts Recovery Act in point of fact much used in your county?—Very little. I have only had in my own practice three litigated cases under it.

5262. Do you think that the fact of the costs being paid as they are has anything to do with that?—I think agents don't think them worth their while, and would rather not have the cases.

5263. Do they discourage the use of the Act?—I don't know that they can do that, because we are compelled to adopt it when the cases arise.

5264. The Chairman.—Is the Sheriff Small Debt Court much resorted to?—There is a considerable business in the Small Debt Court in Inverness-shire.

5265. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—You don't desire to see jury trial introduced into the Sheriff Court?—Certainly not.

5266. You are averse to it even with the consent of the parties?—I think a jury is a very unsatisfactory tribunal for determining facts. The opinion of my brethren, almost without exception, coincides with my own, that jury trial should not be introduced into the Sheriff Court, and in fact that it should be abolished in the Court of Session. I think there is a general concurrence of opinion to that effect.

5267. Mr. Clark.—What do you find to be the expression of opinion on that matter of the clients who consult you?—I don't know that there is any general opinion among men who have had no experience.

5268. But when they come with their cases to you?—I tell my clients, as I believe all my brethren do, that if they go to a jury it is impossible to give them any sound opinion as to the result.

5269. Do you know whether there is any public feeling on the subject in your district?—I really cannot say that there is any public opinion about it, beyond a dread of the expense.

5270. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Your objection is chiefly to the uncertainty of the tribunal?—Yes.

5271. And the expense?—The expense in the Court of Session is enormous at present.

5272. But that would not apply in country places?—It arises in great measure from witnesses being brought from a distance, and from very large fees being paid to counsel, which would not apply if the trials were conducted in the Sheriff Court.

5273. Mr. Webster.—But still you object to the principle of a jury, as being an unsatisfactory way of ascertaining either fact or law?—So far as I can ascertain, it is the opinion of all who have had any experience of them, that they are unsatisfactory; and it stands to reason that twelve men chosen at random cannot be good judges of evidence.

5274. Lord Barcaple.—Do you know if there has been much saving by the abandonment of juries in a large number of cases where proof is now led in Edinburgh?—I believe the expense of a trial before the Lord Ordinary is very much less than a jury trial.

5275. Have you experience in that matter?—I have not much personal experience of it.

5276. Mr. Clark.—Have you reason to know that it is the fact?—Yes.

5277. Lord Barcaple.—Do you mean that you actually know that it is so, or that you have that impression?—I have heard it stated by people engaged in cases that it is very much less.

5278. There will be the same expense of witnesses?—The witnesses would cost the same; but perhaps there may be this in favour of it, that parties don't bring so many witnesses.

5279. Can you explain why?—Because they have more confidence in the judge who sits and takes the evidence.

5280. Mr. Clark.—And the jury part of the case is not brought up?—The case is not got up for popular decision.

5281. Lord Barcaple.—Is a jury less likely to be worn out by a multiplicity of unnecessary evidence?—A jury is much more likely to have dust thrown in their eyes than a judge. I apprehend that nobody would attempt to throw dust in the eyes of a judge, while everybody attempts to throw dust in the eyes of a jury.

5282. The Chairman.—Have you anything to say as to the privileges of agents?—I think it would be an advantage if there was only one class of agents.

5283. All over Scotland?—All over Scotland, entitled to practise in all courts, and admitted after sufficient examination in Edinburgh.

5284. Admitted by the Supreme Court?—Under the regulation of the Supreme Court.

5285. If the privilege were so conferred, do you think it would be much taken advantage of by parties practising in other localities than that in which they reside?—I don't think so, to any great extent. There might be cases in which they would practise in the Court of Session, if some modification of the etiquette of the bar was introduced, and if practice could be carried on by an agent in the country, corresponding directly with counsel in Edinburgh; and I think that the counsel's clerk might do nearly all that is at present done by an Edinburgh agent.

5286. What would you say as to the custody of processes and documents?—If the agent is subject to the Court of Session, and is an agent in the Court of Session, I don't see that the distance that he is at from Edinburgh would be matter of very great consideration, and the counsel's clerk might borrow the process. It would very seldom be necessary to transmit it to the country.

5287. The country agent, if he carried on the business, would probably require the process as often for that purpose as the Edinburgh agent would require it in carrying on the business in Edinburgh?—But the Edinburgh agent requires it very often merely to hand it to counsel.

5288. And you think the counsel's clerks could do that? That is putting them back partly into the position which they occupied a century and a half ago?—I may mention that one of the grievances which country agents have to complain of in the Court of Session is, that we are obliged to put the case into the hands of an Edinburgh agent, who is the only recognised agent. We are allowed no remuneration for our services; and the Edinburgh agent, as a rule, really gives very little assistance, and takes no responsibility. As a rule, they merely hand papers from the country agent to counsel, and in many cases they will not even advise or give you their own opinion on the case.

5289. There is a rule of law against participation in profits between the country agent and the Edinburgh agent?—Yes.

5290. If that were removed, do you think it would give you relief in some degree as to what you complain of?—I think it would be better that the country agent should be recognised as the agent, and paid for what he does. I would not be in favour of the English principle.

5291. Mr. Clark.—Which is?—Giving the country agent a share of the profits made by the London agent.

5292. Mr. Webster.—You have alluded to the mode in which business is conducted by the Edinburgh agents. I think it right to ask the extent to which you have had an opportunity of seeing business done by Edinburgh agents doing nothing excepting handing papers to counsel which they get from the country agent?—In this matter I am not speaking from my own experience alone. I stated what I said as a grievance that I find complained of by my brethren who have had experience, and which I can corroborate by my own experience.

5293. Is that applicable to cases originating in the Court of Session, and conducted there from first to last; or has it reference to the mere advocation process?—It has reference to all cases where the instructions are originally given by the country agent.

5294. For all kinds of processes?—In all cases of difficulty, I notice that Edinburgh agents at once resort to counsel, and take no responsibility either as to decision or advice.

5295. That is, those of the Edinburgh agents that you have been in communication with?—Not all of them. I have received very great assistance from some of them; but what I have stated is a general complaint in my branch of the profession.

5296. Mr. Clark.—You are not making it a universal complaint, but only a general complaint?—Yes; there are exceptions.

5297. Mr. Murray.—Are the country agents accustomed to decide matters of great difficulty without reference to counsel?—In all matters connected with cases in our own courts, we do all the work. It is very rarely that the opinion of counsel is taken in Sheriff Court cases, or any assistance got from them.

5298. Might it not be an advantage sometimes if the opinion of counsel was taken?—No doubt, if the case could afford the expense of taking the opinion of eminent counsel, it might be a great advantage; and if it were commenced as a rule, I have no doubt that we would very soon get into the practice of Edinburgh agents, of throwing all the responsibility on the shoulders of counsel.

5299. Mr. Webster.—You spoke of a modification of the etiquette of the bar: did you mean to permit the agent to supersede counsel in a discussion or in the preparation of papers?—No; I explained what my suggestion meant. It was, that the agent residing in the country should correspond directly with the counsel, or with counsel's clerk, instead of employing an agent resident in Edinburgh.

5300. Mr. Murray.—But an agent in the country at present may lay a case before counsel without the intervention of an Edinburgh agent?—Yes; but he cannot conduct any step in the Court of Session without employing an Edinburgh agent.

5301. The Chairman.—Would you allow charges to the counsel's clerk for correspondence?—Certainly; he must be paid.

5302. Then he becomes a sort of agent in the cause?—For merely formal steps.

5303. Mr. Murray.—Suppose he borrowed a process for the country agent, and the country agent did not return it, would you allow caption to go out against the counsel's clerk, or against whom should it go out?—I think the country agent would have to become responsible in that case.

5304. The Chairman.—While the counsel's clerk, who borrowed the process and gave the receipt, would not be responsible?—It would not be fair to make him responsible, any more than it is to make our clerks responsible now when they borrow processes.

5305. Mr. Webster.—You are aware that in Aberdeen, Glasgow, and some other towns, the procurators have exclusive privileges?—Yes.

5306. What is your opinion as to the maintaining or putting an end to these exclusive privileges, so far as regards practice?—I have stated that I think it would be advisable that there should be only one class of agents, entitled to practise all over Scotland, and in any court.

5307. The Chairman.—In Inverness-shire is there much judicial business, or any, done by Justices of the Peace? Do they hold Small Debt Courts?—They do, once a month, but very little business is done.

5308. They hold these courts in the town of Inverness?—Yes; and I think that might with advantage be abolished.

5309. Do you think there is any evil attending their existence?—I think so. There are what are called Justice of Peace constables, who really have that little practice in their hands; and it depends entirely on the clerk whether injustice is done or not.

5310. The Justices of the Peace trust to their assessor or clerk?—Entirely.

5311. But are they much resorted to?—Very little.

5312. In outlying districts, do you think it expedient that that jurisdiction should exist for settling disputes between country people?—I don't think that any jurisdiction of that kind should be extended to Justices of the Peace.

5313. You don't think it should be allowed to remain with Justices of the Peace?—I don't think so.

5314. You think it should be all absorbed by the Sheriff?—Yes; one strong reason is, that it is difficult to get hold of a Justice to hold a court on any matter, even where they have jurisdiction at present, such as poaching complaints, and cases of that kind.

5315. I was referring to small debt questions?—Even there it is difficult to get Justices to hold a court.

5316. In regard to licensing, do the Quarter Sessions hear appeals from the magistrates' decisions?—I think that is a system that might with very great advantage be improved.

5317. What would you suggest?—I would suggest that it should be left entirely in the hands of the Excise, with very strict regulations as to deprivation in the case of breach of certificate.

5318. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Practically, have not the Excise given licences in every case?—Yes; and I think that would be an advantage.

5319. Then you are against putting any restriction on licensing?—Except on the abuse. I would make very strict regulations as to breach of certificates.

5320. Are you aware that in England, where the Excise licences are given for beerhouses, they are given almost indiscriminately, with very little check, upon the application of two or three householders?—Yes; I don't know whether that is found to be a nuisance or not, but I think very great injustice is often done by the licensing magistrates.

5321. By a capricious exercise of their powers?—Excessively capricious. If a magistrate happens to have strong views on teetotal questions, he takes every opportunity of refusing a licence, and that often practically amounts to depriving persons of their means of subsistence.

5322. Mr. Harrison.—Are you aware whether in your district it is the custom of applicants for licences to canvass the Justices?—Yes.

5324. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Both for and against in some cases?—Of course the magistrates don't as a rule do it, but I have known them do it.

5325. The Chairman.—Do the magistrates of Inverness hold any Burgh Court for civil business?—The only cases that ever I have known in the Burgh Court were removings from burgh subjects.

5326. Mr. Clark.—Are these frequent?—Not now. They are frequently taken to the Sheriff.

5327. Mr. Webster.—Are you in favour of abolishing the civil jurisdiction of the bailies?—Certainly.

5328. The Chairman.—Have you any Dean of Guild in Inverness that exercises jurisdiction?—We have a Dean of Guild, but he holds no court.

5329. Who exercises the jurisdiction?—I don't know what his powers may be, but the Dean of Guild exercises no functions.

5330. Is there a special Police Act for Inverness?—Yes.

5331. Mr. Clark.—Who give decrees of lining?—I never heard of such a thing in Inverness. I never heard of a process in the Dean of Guild Court there.

5332. Who give such decrees in Inverness as are equivalent to the ordinary decree of lining in the Dean of Guild Court?—Since I went into practice, all these questions have come before the Sheriff.

5333. Mr. Murray.—Does a proprietor within the burgh commence to repair his tenement without any warrant?—Yes.

5334. Just at his own hand?—Yes.

5335. The Chairman.—Does any evil result from that?—I don't think so.

5336. Anybody who feels aggrieved may complain?—Yes. There may be a little litigation arising out of that, which might have been saved; but I don't think there is any serious inconvenience felt.

5337. Mr. Webster.—Do you think the Commissary Court should be kept up as a court, with a separate staff from the Sheriff Court and Sheriff-clerk?—I don't see any advantage in the separation, except that it supports a Commissary-clerk.

5338. Mr. Baxter.—Have you a separate Commissary-clerk?—Yes.

5339. Mr. Murray.—Do you see any objection to a party being entitled to obtain confirmation of personal estate in Edinburgh as well as in the country?—I see no great objection to it, but no advantage that could arise from it. I presume that would only occur where the agent originally employed is resident in Edinburgh.

5340. When a person dies domiciled in a particular county, confirmation of his personal estate can at present only be obtained in that county. Do you see any objection to make the principle which is applicable to a service to heritable estate, applicable also to personal estate, so that an executor might obtain confirmation either in the county in which the party died domiciled, or in Edinburgh, as the commune forum?—I don't see any great objection to that. It might be inconvenient if there was a competition for the office of executor.

5341. In what way, if proceedings had commenced before one or other court?—If the proceedings commenced in Edinburgh, and there was a contest, it might be more convenient that the litigation should go on in the district than in Edinburgh, assuming the Edinburgh Commissary Court to have no higher status than that in the country. The only advantage that I can see in that would be to give business to Edinburgh agents, which would at present come to the Sheriff Court practitioners.

5342. Mr. Baxter.—There is not much need for that, I suppose?—I don't think so.

5343. Mr. Murray.—Suppose it was a convenience to the public?—If it can be shown to be a convenience to the public, of course all other interests must give way; but I don't see that it would be any convenience.

5344. Mr. Shand.—What is the opinion in your district as to the administration of the Justice of Peace Court in game cases?—I think that ought to be taken from them. It ought to be confined to the Sheriff.

5345. Is that the opinion in your district?—Yes.

5346. In regard to licences being granted by the Justices, does the present system to any extent secure that the licences shall be given in accordance with the public opinion of the district?—Only to this extent, so far as public opinion can be brought to bear on the individual magistrates at the time.

5347. Do you not find that public opinion is brought to bear on them?—In our district the teetotal body generally send a deputation to the magistrates before each licensing court, to impress on them the duty of limiting the number of licences as much as possible.

5348. Is the result, do you think, that the licensing is carried out in accordance with public opinion or against it?—I think the opinion brought to bear is the opinion of the teetotal body, who take the trouble to exercise it, and the rest of the public are apathetic.

5349. Is the licensing not in accordance with public opinion?—The result is, that the magistrates have adopted a kind of rule, that they will take every opportunity of reducing the number of licences, and that power is often exercised in what appears to me to be a capricious way.

5350. So as to be injurious to individuals?—Yes.

5352. Does any system occur to you that would be better?—I would be inclined to leave it in the hands of the Excise, and to make it open to competition, like all other trades.

5353. Mr. Adam.—Does the Sheriff-clerk of your county do his duty personally?—No. He is not obliged to reside in the county.

5354. Mr. Baxter.—Does he reside in the county?—Not usually.

5355. Mr. Clark.—Inverness-shire is divided into four districts?—Yes.

5356. Are these districts observed with relation to civil processes?—No; civil processes from all the districts are brought at Inverness, and we have never had a decision as to whether that is competent or not.

5358. The Inverness district must contain the bulk of the Inverness work; but is the bulk of the work of the other three districts disposed of in Inverness?—The amount of litigation at Inverness, as compared with the other districts, is out of proportion to the population; but whether that is caused to any great extent by business coming from the other districts, I cannot say.

5359. But you do often find cases coming from the other districts at once to the Inverness district?—Yes, very often.

5360. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Does the opinion which you have expressed as to the tendency to reduce the number of public-houses apply to country or town districts, or both?—It applies to both.

5361. You think that both in the country and in the town the present tendency is to reduce the number of licences?—Yes; the burgh magistrates are Justices of the Peace for the county, and always sit in the county licensing courts, and they very often compose the bulk of it.

5362. You think the magistrates' jurisdiction in poaching cases should be taken away from them?—I think the present system is not satisfactory; that is the feeling of the public, and it is the feeling of all my professional brethren.

5363. That they pass more severe sentences than the Sheriff would?—Sometimes the one, and sometimes the other. I have heard a Justice refuse to convict on the evidence of one witness, on the ground that the Bible provides that there shall be two, and that it is higher authority than the Act of Parliament.

5364. Mr. Harrison.—Is the public feeling that the Justices in such cases are acting as judges in causes in which they are themselves specially interested?—I don't think there is any feeling as to proprietors sitting in the court. They very seldom do. There is no feeling on that point, so far as my experience goes.

5365. On what do you ground your desire that the power should be taken from the Justices?—Because they sit irregularly; and, in fact, the judgment is the judgment of their clerk, except in rare cases, and in these they generally go very far wrong.

5366. Mr. Shand.—Do you know that many Justices who are proprietors have expressed a wish that that jurisdiction should be taken away from them?—Yes, I believe they have.

SATURDAY, 9TH JANUARY 1869.

Members Present:—

LORD COLONSAY.	JAMES CAMPBELL, Esq.
THE LORD JUSTICE-GENERAL.	GEORGE HARRISON, Esq.
THE LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.	JAMES ADAM, Esq.
LORD BARCAPLE.	A. B. SHAND, Esq.
THE LORD ADVOCATE.	THOMAS GRAHAM MURRAY, Esq.
SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE.	JAMES WEBSTER, Esq.
EDWARD S. GORDON, Esq., Q.C.	JOHN B. BAXTER, Esq.
DR. HUGH BARCLAY.	ADAM PATERSON, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

Horace Skeete.

HORACE SKEETE, Esq., examined.

5367. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner before the Sheriff Court at Perth?—Yes; and also in Forfarshire.

5368. How long have you been a practitioner?—Seventeen years.

5369. In both places?—Seventeen years in Perth, and about ten in Forfarshire.

5370. You qualified as a member of the Society of Procurators in Perth?—I did.

5371. And the same in regard to Forfarshire?—The same.

5372. You served an apprenticeship, I suppose, before entering at Perth?—I served an apprenticeship at Perth.

5373. Did that apprenticeship qualify you, so far as apprenticeship was concerned, for entering in Forfarshire?—It did.

5374. Dr. Barclay.—Were you not also in Glasgow for some time?—I was four years in Edinburgh, in the offices of Hope & Oliphant, Mr. T. G. Murray, and Tods & Romanes. I was also for four years a principal clerk to Bannatynes & Kirkwood in Glasgow.

5375. The Chairman.—What is your opinion as to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of the Sheriff and his substitutes?—In reference to the Sheriff-substitutes, I think it is extremely important that their status should be raised, by giving them higher salaries than they have at present. We have in the country a good many inexperienced Sheriff-substitutes; we get them from Edinburgh. The salary is not large, and therefore it is not possible to get men of first-class ability; so that we have frequently gentlemen as Sheriff-substitutes who we think have not sufficient experience for the office. There are many exceptions to that rule. There is a strong feeling in our body, that if the Sheriff-substitutes' salaries were raised, we would get men of a higher status, and that would be a very great improvement to our courts.

5376. What body do you allude to as 'our body'?—The Society of Procurators in Perth. Procurators themselves are competent to hold the office of Sheriff-substitute; but they are seldom or never appointed. There are, however, some exceptions; and we find that these exceptions, generally speaking, form the best judges. If the salaries cannot be increased, we think that better judges could be got in Scotland from the procurators than are at present got, with these low salaries, from Edinburgh. In reference to the appeal from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff-principal, I think that if Scotland were divided into certain districts, with two judges for each district, sitting as an appeal court, it would be a great improvement on the system of the single appeal judge which we have at present.

5377. Have you thought of any arrangement as to the places where these judges would sit, and the number of times they would visit each place?—That is a matter of detail which would require to be marked out according to the statistics which might be got of the number of appeals from the various districts. Probably four districts would be sufficient; and I think the judges ought to sit at such places, and as frequently as may be found necessary for doing justice to the district.

5378. Do you think that by that means there would be obtained, in the first place, a better court, and in the next place, greater expedition in disposing of appeals?—I do.

5379. Do you think the cost of disposing of appeals would be diminished?—The cost in the Sheriff Court at present is exceedingly small, and I don't see how it could be diminished. It is very small indeed; and on that account it is greatly valued.

5380. It is next to nothing?—It is.

5381. It is a very simple form of appeal. Would you retain the same simplicity of form if there was such an appellate court as you have suggested?—I would.

5382. Would you have the appeal disposed of upon oral pleading or upon written pleading, or upon one or other, according to circumstances?—In most cases I would have it upon oral pleading; but there might be exceptional cases in which it might be necessary to adopt written pleading.

5383. Such as?—A case of interdict that was in a great hurry, where it was absolutely necessary, and for the interest of the parties, that there should be as speedy a decision as possible. In such a case, and probably with the consent of the Sheriff-substitute, who ought to be a good judge in such matters, I would allow a written pleading.

5384. How would the written pleading expedite the proceeding?—It would depend upon the number of times that the judges sat in the district. If they sat very frequently, a written pleading might not be necessary at all; but if the intervals between their sittings were lengthy, probably the written pleading might be quicker than the oral pleading. That, however, is a matter of detail, and would be determined according to the number of times the judges came to the place.

5385. Suppose that there was written pleading, how would you carry it through? Would you have a reclaiming note, and an answer to it?—I think so.

5386. And would you transmit that to the place where the judges were or might be expected to be?—I think it would be desirable that there should be some one in Edinburgh, such as an appeal clerk, to whom it might be sent. An arrangement might be made whereby the clerk could always know where the judges were, if they were on circuit, and he could send it to them.

5387. Do you contemplate that the residence of the judges should be chiefly in Edinburgh?—I think so. I think that would be better.

5388. Do you think they ought to be in attendance on the Supreme Court when they are in Edinburgh?—I think they ought not. I think they should have such a salary as would be amply sufficient for them.

5389. You think they ought not to practise?—I think they ought not to practise.

5390. Mr. Baxter.—That is what you mean by attendance?—Yes.

5391. Mr. Campbell.—But they would have the benefit of the professional society of Edinburgh, and of the libraries and other privileges?—Yes.

5392. The Chairman.—And if they chose to be present in court to hear the proceedings, I suppose you would think that no disadvantage?—I think it would be an advantage.

5393. Mr. Paterson.—In what respect do you consider that practising would be a disadvantage?—I think, when a man becomes a judge, the sooner he forgets that he ever was an advocate the better.

5394. And you contemplate that they would have a good deal to do?—Yes; and there is another reason, viz., that a man's practice necessarily comes into competition with his duty as a judge. In the one case he has a fixed salary, and is sure to get it; in the other case, unless he attends to his practice, he is not sure to get it; and in most cases there can be no doubt as to which he would give most attention to.

5395. The Chairman.—Human nature, you think, would lead him to do that?—I think so.

5396. Have you considered what finality, if any, should be attached to the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and what to the judgment of the appellate court?—In cases not exceeding £50, I think, if the three judges were unanimous, their decision should be final; but if one differed, there should probably be a right of appeal.

5397. You mean that if the two appeal judges were to affirm the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, that should be final?—Yes.

5398. Up to £50?—Yes.

5399. But if they either differed from the substitute, or differed from each other, you think there should be a right of appeal?—I think so.

5400. Do you apply that both as to fact and law?—I think so. I think it should apply to both.

5401. Do you think the Sheriff-substitute should dispose of the facts in the first instance, and how?—There is considerable difficulty in that; but if it was possible to get the three judges to sit together as a jury, I think that would be the most satisfactory disposal of the facts of the case. It would avoid the necessity of taking down the evidence at all, and great expedition would be got; and I think that three lawyers sitting as a jury would be extremely satisfactory to the public, and also to the profession.

5402. You would dispense with the taking down of the evidence?—I would; and if that were the case, I think there should be no appeal in point of fact to the Supreme Court.

5403. Mr. Webster.—Whether the three concurred or differed?—There could be no appeal, because there would be no record of the facts.

5404. Mr. Campbell.—Do you contemplate that they would frame something of the nature of a special verdict in each case after they had heard the facts?—I think they should, in the first place, make a series of findings in fact, and then they should apply the law to these facts. In that way there could be an appeal to the Court of Session on the law, and they could look at the facts found, and see if the law was properly applied.

5405. The Chairman.—As is now done in the Court of Session in reference to advocations where there has been a proof in the inferior court?—Quite so.

5406. Would you have any mode of correcting an erroneous conclusion in fact which might have been come to?—I cannot see that there could be any mode of doing that if what I have suggested were adopted; but the probability is that erroneous conclusions would not be come to by the three lawyers sitting as a jury. I think such cases would be extremely exceptional.

Horace Skeete.

5407. Mr. Adam.—Might not one of the three judges take notes, as the judge presiding at a jury trial does now?—That is perfectly possible, but it creates great delay.

5408. The Chairman.—You would hold the opinion of the majority of these three to be conclusive upon the facts?—I would.

5409. And however erroneous that might be found to be, or whatever error might have crept into their views, you don't think it necessary that there should be any mode of correcting it?—I would have such confidence in the opinion of three educated lawyers, that I think a mistake would not arise once in a thousand times; and therefore I think it would be unnecessary to have any mode of correcting it, the chances of mistake would be so small.

5410. You are not in favour of a jury in the inferior court, I presume?—I am not.

5411. In the Supreme Court, when a jury has gone wrong on matter of fact, there is a mode of correcting that?—There is.

5412. You think this would probably be so accurate and perfect a tribunal, that there would be no occasion for correcting its decisions?—I don't think so, and I don't see any mode of correcting it without introducing such an element of delay and expense that it would probably not be worth having.

5413. The finality of the finding would depend on the amount at stake?—The finality of the finding in point of law.

5414. But, in point of fact, it would go to any extent?—To any extent.

5415. Whether it was matter of pecuniary measure, or matter of right of a different kind?—If the mode that I suggest were adopted, I think that would be necessary; but I don't say that the mode I suggest is essential, because if the jury of three were found not to be workable, we could keep matters as they now stand, the Sheriff-substitute taking a note of the evidence. I have no great objection to that myself. It is remarkably done in the court in which I act, and I am perfectly satisfied with it.

5416. In that case you would have the facts reviewed by the appellate court, upon his notes of evidence?—I would.

5418. But assuming it to be the fact that a competent shorthand writer can read his notes with the same facility as ordinary manuscript, and suppose that the Sheriff-substitute dictated to the shorthand writer that which he now writes down himself, and that the shorthand writer read over to the witness before he left the box that which had been so dictated, would that not prevent any of the mistakes you speak of?—I have a great objection to other people dictating the evidence of a witness. I think it far better that the shorthand writer should himself take down verbatim every word as it comes from the witness' mouth, and then it might be read over to satisfy the witness that it was correct. I think that would be much better than interposing another mind between the witness and the shorthand writer. If I could get over the difficulty about expense, I would have no hesitation in saying that a shorthand writer is the best of all modes of recording evidence.

5419. It might be necessary that the parties should consent to that course being adopted?—I know quite well that they would not consent in the country unless the expense were greatly reduced. The agents would not consent, because they know quite well that their clients are unable to stand the expense.

5420. Are you aware that the power is given as a discretionary power in the Debts Recovery Act?—I never heard of its being used.

5421. The Chairman.—According to the present mode of taking evidence in the Sheriff Court, does the judge dictate?—He writes it himself with his own hand.

5422. Does not the witness often utter a great deal that is not worth putting down, and that should not be put down?—That is quite true, but the judge takes it down in such a way as to give the complete and absolute meaning of it.

5423. Supposing the same judge that you now have, who does it to your satisfaction, were to dictate to the shorthand writer just what he takes down himself, would that not preserve the absolute meaning, without incurring the great expense of taking down every question and every answer, relevant or irrelevant?—That depends very much on the judge. If he was a good judge, it would be well done; if he was a bad judge, there would be constant objection taken to what he was dictating; the agents would differ as to what the witness said, and the witness might be biassed very much by the statements which the agents made.

5424. You said that your own judge at present takes down the true meaning of what the witness has said. My question was, supposing you had the same judge dictating what he now takes down to your satisfaction, would that not be a great saving of expense?—If I had the same judge, I would be quite satisfied, but I cannot tell how long I may have the same judge.

5425. Mr. Webster.—As to the constitution of a jury of three, would you contemplate that a case should be exhausted at one continuous sitting, or that, in the event of any complaint of surprise or the like by either party, there should be a power of adjournment?—As far as possible, cases ought to be disposed of at one sitting, like a jury trial; but if the court was satisfied that either of the agents had conducted his case in such a way as to create surprise, or to spring a mine upon his opponent in a matter which could not possibly be anticipated, I think there should be a power of adjourning.

5426. You would make that the remedy, rather than any review of the findings, after the court had made findings?—I think so.

5427. Mr. Baxter.—You stated your opinion that the finding of these three judges should be final in point of fact. But supposing that were not thought expedient, do you see any objection to the evidence being taken down by one of them, or by a shorthand writer?—I see no objection to that. We would then just be in the same position as we are at present.

5428. The Chairman.—When evidence was in use to be taken by commission, the commissioner dictated it to a clerk?—He did; and that was a highly objectionable system. I think it was about the worst system that could be set up for getting at justice. I recollect it quite well. The commissioners were generally incapable of dictating what the witness said, and it was always a paraphrase of what he said. If it was possible to dictate something else than what the witness said, they always did it. I had a great deal of experience in that, and I never once saw a commissioner dictate anything correctly.

5429. Lord Barcaple.—Do you refer to commissions issued from the Sheriff Court at Perth?—Yes, and in Glasgow, previous to the present practice.

5430. Professional gentlemen?—Yes.

5431. Have you had any experience in the framing of such special verdicts or cases as you say the three appeal judges should frame after hearing the evidence?—At present all Sheriff-substitutes are bound, in pronouncing a judgment, to make certain findings in fact, and then findings in law applicable to the facts.

5432. They are bound to keep their findings in fact and their findings in law separate?—Yes.

5433. But I understood you to say that the findings to be pronounced by the appeal judges should be of the nature of what is called a special verdict or a special case. I suppose the question put to you was intended to imply this, that like a special verdict or special case, they should be findings of all the facts material to the cause?—Quite so.

5434. And of no facts not material to the cause, which were established by the evidence on either side?—Yes.

5435. That is to say, which would either be in favour of the judgment to be pronounced, or which one of the parties might afterwards say would be against the judgment. Now, have you had any experience in regard to the preparation of findings of that peculiar character?—No one can have experience of that except the judges.

5436. But you have no such findings in your court at present?—No, not exactly.

5437. Are you aware that there is extreme difficulty and delicacy in the framing of such a series of findings?—I have no doubt there may be considerable difficulty and nicety; but I think if a judge is fit to fulfil his office, he ought to be able to do that.

5438. May the three judges not differ very materially in regard to the framing of such a special series of findings?—Whenever a court consists of more than one, no doubt there may be difference, but that is incidental to all courts of more than one judge.

5439. Does the delicacy and difficulty of that operation not suggest some doubt as to the expediency of entirely removing all review in regard to the facts?—If there is to be review, there must be notes taken down, as is done at present. That gets rid of the difficulty entirely.

5440. Is it not obvious that the framing of such a series of findings must involve, or may involve, the determination of a great deal of law as well as fact; because all relevant facts established are to be inserted, and no facts except what are relevant, and the opinion of the appeal judges upon relevancy is an opinion upon a matter of law; but the result may be to affect their findings of fact, by either introducing or leaving out specific facts, which may be thought to be relevant, or may be thought to be irrelevant?—That is perfectly true. That might occur; and if it did occur, it would necessarily affect the result very materially.

5441. As a very general rule, are the questions of fact which arise in causes in the Sheriff Court, of a comparatively simple nature?—That depends on circumstances. The Sheriff has jurisdiction to any extent in all personal matters, and all sorts of cases come before him.

5442. Then you have pretty frequently questions where the facts are of a considerably complicated and detailed character?—We have.

5443. Mr. Paterson.—When you spoke of the three judges taking the evidence, that has not reference, as I understand, to the appellate jurisdiction, but it applies to the ordinary court?—Yes.

5444. You contemplate that the decision of a majority of the three judges should give finality to the judgment?—I think so, unless notes of the evidence are taken. If it should be thought better that one of the judges should take notes of the evidence, as is done at present, perhaps having them authenticated by the other two judges, it would not be necessary to make the judgment final, excepting to a certain amount, in matter of fact.

5445. Do you contemplate that the judgment should be final without reference to the amount?—I would greatly prefer a system whereby a record of the evidence should be taken, so as to have an appeal upon fact as well as law.

5446. A judgment by a majority of the court of three would be tantamount to a judgment of two judges?—It would; but if you had an appeal, you could carry it further.

5447. But in what respect would the judgment of these two be more satisfactory to the parties than the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute reviewed by the Sheriff? Have you not just two minds in either case applied to the cause?—If they both agree, that is satisfactory; but if they differ, it is one mind differing from another. In the other case, it is two minds differing from one.

5448. I am speaking of a case in which a judgment is carried by two out of the three judges. Would that be more satisfactory to the parties concerned than the present system, by which you get the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, and then the review of the Sheriff?—It is in the case of a reversal that the difficulty arises in the present system. If the Sheriff reverses the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, our clients are not satisfied, because there is a judgment on each side, and that necessitates to a large extent an appeal to the Supreme Court.

5449. Supposing the Sheriff-principal to affirm, you have then the judgment of two judges?—Yes; and that is frequently satisfactory, and very few cases in which they have agreed are appealed to the Supreme Court.

5450. In the appeal court which you suggested, if two out of the three judges come to a certain judgment, you have two minds agreed?—Yes.

5451. How is that better than having the two judgments as at present, if the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff-principal agree?—It is in the case of their differing that we require something more.

5452. I am speaking of the case where they agree?—In the case where they agree it may not be more satisfactory, but in the case where they differ it is more satisfactory. At present, if the Sheriff reverses the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute, it is just one mind against another; and in order to get a satisfactory decision, it is necessary to go to a higher court, and to incur large expense. But in the other case, if you have two of the three judges against you, you are likely to be satisfied with the decision.

5453. Mr. Baxter.—Don't you think it a great advantage that the Sheriff-substitute at present sees the witnesses, and that the court of three judges which you have suggested should also see the witnesses?—I think that is a matter of great importance.

5454. Would that give you more confidence than the present mode of review by a Sheriff of his substitute's judgment?—It would.

5456. The evidence would be necessary for the court of appeal?—Yes.

5457. And you would allow an appeal where each of the judges took a different impression of the evidence?—Certainly.

5458. The Chairman.—That would be an appeal to a court which did not hear the witnesses?—It would.

5459. Mr. Shand.—Would the arrangement as to three judges sitting together on proofs not be apt to lead to delay in getting a decision? Supposing a case of difficulty to occur, and the appeal judges were going on their circuit, they could not consult with the resident judge and come to their conclusion before leaving the place; and they must again meet with the resident judge before giving their decision. Would not the result of an arrangement of that kind generally be, that in cases of difficulty no decision would be got till the judges returned to that place again, and had a consultation with the resident judge?—In the great majority of cases they would have little difficulty in deciding at the time, just as a jury does at present.

5460. A jury now decides very much upon matters of fact; but supposing the appeal judges had to adjust an interlocutor both on fact and law, would it not frequently be necessary that they should take time to consider the case?—In some cases it certainly would be necessary that they should take time to consider, but that is matter of detail. The two judges could communicate their decision to the other judge.

5461. Would that not necessarily infer in very many cases considerable delay?—It would infer some delay, but not such great delay as we have at present.

5462. Would it not generally infer delay till the appeal judges came back to that place again?—Not necessarily. I think some plan might be hit upon whereby that might be avoided.

5463. There must be communication with the resident judge?—In cases of great importance, I think it is only right that a judge should have proper time for deliberation; and if the judges came round sufficiently often, the delay would not be great.

5464. Suppose there were several cases set down for proof, would you have a roll of proofs for the court of three to take up?—I think so.

5465. Would that not be very apt to lead to expense, from the necessity of bringing witnesses, in many cases, to the place where the proofs were to be led?—I think there would not be very great difficulty in that. The Sheriff-clerk could generally ascertain what number of witnesses would probably be examined in a case, and it could be arranged that certain cases should be taken on a particular day, and finished on that day.

5466. Would that not frequently lead to witnesses being kept waiting for two or three days?—It might occasionally do that; but that might be obviated to a large extent by a proper arrangement of details.

5467. Do you think it would be satisfactory to the country, if in each district there was a resident Sheriff, with an appeal directly from him to the Court of Session, and no intermediate appeal?—I don't think that would be satisfactory at all.

5468. Why?—Because the expense of going to the Court of Session is so great, that it is tantamount to giving no appeal at all.

5469. You don't think that arrangement would be satisfactory to the country?—I don't think so. It would, in effect, be entirely cutting off our right of appeal.

5470. Mr. Baxter.—Have you had any appeal to the Court of Session under the Debts Recovery Act?—I have.

5471. What did you find the expense to be?—In July 1868 I raised, in the Sheriff Court at Perth, an action for £43 under the Debts Recovery Act. The Sheriff-substitute decided in my favour. The Sheriff-principal, without hearing me, reversed, upon different grounds. The case was carried to the Court of Session, and upon 21st October 1868 the first hearing took place; and that day, simply for agent's and counsel's fees, cost £12, 17s. 2d. The court did not decide the case that day. I think counsel were not prepared, or something of that sort; and it was continued to a second day, the fees that second day being £9, 14s. 4d. The court did not decide the £43 case that day, but found it necessary to take it to avizandum. An interlocutor was pronounced next morning; and agent's and counsel's fees for the advising were £7, 1s. 10d. So that the one hearing in that small case cost £29, 13s. 4d. in the Court of Session.

5472. Lord Barcaple.—Was that the expense of one side, or both sides?—Both sides. I lost the case, for the Court of Session took a third view of it, and decided against me; and I paid altogether for that £43 case, £44, 15s. 10d.

5473. Lord Justice-General.—What was the name of that case?—Davidson v. Waddell Boyd.

5474. Lord Barcaple.—Do you know whether that was the first case under the Debts Recovery Act which had been taken to the Court of Session?—I am not aware.

5475. Lord Justice-General.—When was it decided?—In October 1868.

5476. Mr. Adam.—Was it not a case of anticipated payment of house-rent?—Yes.

5477. Mr. Baxter.—Have you got the account with you?—Yes.

5478. Does the account show the expense of getting the case into the roll?—Yes; the expense of getting it into the summar roll was £3, 13s. 11d.

5479. Lord Justice-General.—Give us the items?—[Witness read the items.]

5480. Mr. Webster.—That is without the printing?—Yes; and my fee for conducting the whole case from beginning to end was £4; and the country agent on the opposite side was allowed 10s. 6d. for his whole work in reference to the appeal to the Court of Session.

5481. Lord Justice-General.—Will you be kind enough to give in the whole of the account as part of your evidence?—Yes.

5482. Mr. Murray.—Have you the account on the other side?—I have the accounts on both sides.

5483. Have you ever had occasion to see an appeal under the Act of 1868 carried through in the same way?—I had a case lately; but I was afraid to come to the Court of Session with it, and I stopped it.

5484. Dr. Barclay.—Was that the Inch case?—Yes; it was a very important case; but I was afraid to come to the Court of Session with it. It might have ruined my client.

5485. The Chairman.—Was the stake great in that case?—It was a question of considerable importance to the public. It was as to the public use of the North Inch at Perth. The Sheriff-substitute decided in my favour, but the Sheriff-principal reversed. My client was not a rich man, and I advised him to go no further.

5486. Lord Justice-General.—Was he representing the public?—He was representing himself then. He had an interest in using the Inch for a certain purpose.

5487. Mr. Baxter.—Had you a good opinion of his case?—I had, and I have still; and if I could have come to the Court of Session satisfactorily, I would have done it.

5488. The Chairman.—You mentioned, in regard to the other case, that the Sheriff had altered the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute without hearing parties?—Yes.

5490. You consider that a blemish in the Debts Recovery Act?—I do.

5491. Dr. Barclay.—There is nothing to prevent the Sheriff ordering a hearing?—He is empowered, but not obliged to order a hearing.

5492. Mr. Baxter.—In your case he did not?—He did not.

5493. Mr. Adam.—In the case you mentioned, was not something saved by the agents taking payment of the account without obtaining decree for the amount?—I have given the results after deducting that.

5494. These expenses are not included?—They are not.

5495. Mr. Webster.—I see from the account that fees to two counsel are charged. Are you aware that the court and the auditor have been in the practice of allowing a fee to only one counsel in cases under the Debts Recovery Act?—This account was taxed by the auditor. I employed only one counsel; but there were two allowed on the other side.

5496. Dr. Barclay.—I thought you said it was not taxed?—It was taxed.

5497. The Lord Justice-General.—It was paid without a decree?—It was paid without a decree—without extract.

5498. Mr. Webster.—Does the account not show that the case was delayed on account of counsel not being prepared?—There is an entry: 'In respect so and so wished to look into cases.'

5499. Mr. Gordon.—That was your own counsel?—Yes, my own counsel.

5500. After two speeches, your own counsel asked that the case should be adjourned to enable him to look into some decisions?—That is quite true; but I think I should only pay counsel one fee for a debate.

5501. Mr. Adam.—A new ground was started which had not been pleaded in the inferior court?—I was not present in the Court of Session, and the only information I have on the subject is an entry in the opposite parties' account, to the effect that my counsel wished to look into cases.

5502. Mr. Baxter.—Why were you not present in such an important case?—There is no provision for paying the expense of an agent from the country. If I had come, I must have charged it against my own client; and in nine cases out of ten they won't pay you. They say you ought to get it from the opposite party, if you are successful.

5503. Dr. Barclay.—Your own client in that case was a bankrupt estate?—Yes; and I did not wish to incur any expense that I could possibly avoid.

5504. Mr. Webster.—Is there any necessity for a country agent attending a debate in the great majority of cases?—It depends on his Edinburgh agent to a large extent.

5505. Does it not depend upon the counsel?—It depends both on his counsel and agent.

5506. Mr. Gordon.—And the nature of the case?—It depends of course entirely upon his counsel and his Edinburgh agent. If they get up the case thoroughly without him, he is of no use. But in the large majority of cases they don't get it up thoroughly without him, and they look to him for information about the case.

5507. Dr. Barclay.—In law and facts?—In facts.

5508. Mr. Murray.—He has the selection both of his counsel and agent?—Some Edinburgh agents always select their own counsel. They claim that as a privilege.

5509. Lord Barcaple.—In what respect is it that it depends on his counsel whether it is necessary for the country agent to be present?—Perhaps I was wrong in saying it depends on his counsel. It depends on whether the Edinburgh agent thoroughly gets up the case. If he does thoroughly get it up, the presence of the country agent may not be necessary.

5510. Must not the case be within the record?—That is quite true.

5511. Then there is very little getting up about it?—There are constantly new points started in various ways.

5512. But they must be points of law. The fact is within the record, is it not?—That may be, and is so; but what I have stated does occur.

5513. Mr. Gordon.—Is your statement applicable to jury causes where evidence is in course of being led, or to causes where there is a discussion upon the relevancy of the record, or to causes where there has been a concluded proof in the inferior court?—I refer to appeals from the Sheriff Court. In jury cases I think the country agent is often absolutely necessary. I also think that in appeals from the Sheriff Court he is frequently necessary, because I have found myself that when I was not present, parts of my case had been missed. I cannot say why; but I have found in practice that important parts of my case had not been attended to as I thought they should have been.

5514. Dr. Barclay.—In the case which you have mentioned under the Debts Recovery Act, if you had been present, would you not have pointed out a section in the Bankrupt Act which was omitted to be referred to?—From the Court of Session decision it occurred to me that a clause in the Bankrupt Act, of extreme importance in the case, had not been pleaded to the court, and I think, if it had been pleaded to the court, a different decision would probably have been pronounced.

5515. The Lord Justice-General.—Mention the section, if you please?—I have not the Act here.

5516. Mr. Baxter.—What is the import of it?—It is to this effect, that the sequestration shall have the effect of a decree of maills and duties, and of poinding the ground, and also of a decree of furthcoming.

5517. And put you in the position of an heritable creditor?—Yes; and in this case it was a great hardship, because the property was bonded, and the trustee had paid all the interest for that half-year; but when he tried to get the rent to meet the interest, he found it was gone.

5518. Mr. Webster.—Did neither your counsel nor agent know of that clause, though the case was delayed for a day in order that they might look into it?—I don't know; but looking at the decision of the court, I find no reference to it; and the court proceeded on the principle of holding that the trustee, my client, represented the personal rights of the bankrupt.

5519. Might it not be upon this other theory, that they thought the section had no reference to the matter in dispute?—If the court had thought that, they would have decided it, and said so in the interlocutor.

5520. The Chairman.—I understand the import of what you have said to be, that in the case you refer to there was a clause in the Bankrupt Act which was very pertinent to the question, and which, I suppose, had been pleaded in the court below, that was not referred to in the Court of Session: the Edinburgh agent missed it, the counsel missed it, and the court missed it; but if the country agent had attended, the client would have had that additional protection, and it would have avoided any such miscarriage. Now, do you state that as a reason why a client should generally have the protection of his country agent in the Court of Session, for fear that the Edinburgh agent and the counsel should go wrong without him?—I only give that as an illustration. I don't say that it is absolutely necessary in all cases that the country agent should come to Edinburgh.

5521. But as a general rule?—As a general rule, I don't think it is absolutely necessary that he should come to Edinburgh; but in many cases it is of importance that he should be present in court. I was not present at the discussion; but in the decision of the court I can find no reference to that section of the Act which appeared to me to be of importance.

5522. Your remedy for that would be some provision by which the country agent might attend, and by which it might be worth his while to attend?—I think so. I think he ought to be able to attend if he thinks proper.

5523. And that in the costs of the suit provision should be made for that case?—I think so.

5525. You don't confine your statement to the experience of that particular instance?—Oh no! That is only an illustration of my experience.

5526. Do you think that the procedure in the Court of Session may not be susceptible of some amendment which would reduce materially that expense?—I think it is susceptible of very great amendment.

5527. In case of its being so amended, would that in any degree affect the opinion which you have given as to the necessity of an intermediate court such as you propose?—I don't think we shall ever be able to get it amended so far as to make the appeal to it sufficiently cheap to be taken in place of the appeal we have at present.

5528. In the account which you read, counsel's fees formed a very large item?—Yes.

5529. Do you not think that if a court of appeal, such as you have proposed, were established, whose judgments would in many cases be final, counsel would be retained to argue the cases before it?—I don't think they would ever be retained; at least it would be in very exceptional cases. The procurators would plead their own cases.

5530. You think the procedure before that court would probably be as cheap as it now is before the Sheriff?—Quite as cheap.

Horace Skeete.

5531. You stated that the appeal judges should reside in Edinburgh, but go circuits?—Yes.

5532. Do you conceive that their whole time would not be occupied with their judicial duties?—I think it would; but of course they need not be always on circuit.

5533. How often do you propose that these circuits should be held?—That is a matter of detail, which would depend on the number of cases coming up.

5534. Then they would go just as they were wanted?—I think so. I think they should go whenever they are required to do their duty in the district.

5535. I think you said that you would divide Scotland into four districts?—Probably four might be sufficient.

5536. Do you include Edinburgh and Glasgow in these?—I think Edinburgh and Glasgow ought to be excluded.

5537. Then the four districts would be independent of Edinburgh and Glasgow?—Yes.

5538. So that there would be eight appeal judges independent of these two counties?—Yes.

5539. Mr. Adam.—Would you allow the employment of counsel as a charge against the opposite party in these courts?—Yes, if allowed by the judge, as at present. We can move the court to employ counsel; and if the court approves, then counsel's fees are allowed. I would retain that power still.

5540. Mr. Webster.—Your theory is, that you would have one resident judge?—Yes.

5541. If he was permanently resident, would there not be great risk of local ties and connections militating against his usefulness?—As long as human nature remains what it is, I suppose that necessarily arises to some extent; but with the court of appeal, I think we would be quite safe to have any little aberrations of that sort corrected.

5542. The Chairman.—That may be one of your reasons for thinking that there should be an intermediate appeal between the resident Sheriff and the Court of Session?—I think so.

5543. To guard not so much against actual influence of that sort, as the apprehension of it?—Yes. It frees the public mind from all apprehension on that point.

5544. Mr. Webster.—Would you propose that the judge of appeal should have anything to do with the general administrative duties in the county?—I think not.

5545. You would leave these entirely to the resident judge?—I think so.

5546. Would you not deem it unwise to do so in purely rural districts?—I think they might be safely trusted to do these duties.

5547. Mr. Shand.—Can you form any idea how often the appeal court would require to sit in Perth, for example?—That is a matter of detail.

5548. Would so often as once a month be necessary?—I would not like to give an opinion on that.

5549. Mr. Adam.—Have you any opinion as to the time within which it would be satisfactory that they should come?—I don't think that it would be judicious to tie them down to exact periods; but if there is a certain number of cases, I think they should come and hear them whenever they are required.

5550. Beyond what time would you think it wrong that they should not come, even if there were few cases?—I think they should come at least once every six weeks.

5551. Lord Barcaple.—And the same at Aberdeen and other towns of that sort?—I think so. There is no difficulty in their going frequently, now that there are railways all over the country.

5552. Mr. Adam.—Should they go so frequently even if it were to hear a single case?—I think if Scotland were divided into four districts, there would be very little risk of their having only a single case to hear once in six weeks.

5553. Lord Barcaple.—What salaries do you think these judges should have?—I think they should have from £1500 to £2000 a year at least.

5554. Do you think that for such a salary as that, a suitable class of judges of appeal would be got to exercise the kind of functions and perform the constant journeys that you point at?—Yes, I think so, for £2000 a year.

5555. Would that be exclusive of their travelling expenses?—I think so.

5556. Mr. Shand.—If you made such a place as Aberdeen the centre of a large northern district, would it not add considerably to the expense of discussion if agents had to travel for four or five hours, and were obliged to leave home the night before?—I have not proposed to make Aberdeen, or any place, a centre. I think the appeal judges should go to the places where the cases are to be heard. When there was a sufficient number of cases in any town of sufficient importance, it might be arranged that the judges should go there.

5557. Would you have them sit in every county town where the Sheriff now sits?—That is matter of detail. It might not be necessary in every county town; but it would be seen how the thing worked, and what was required, and it might be altered to suit circumstances.

5558. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose you think that the great amount of business would be in the large towns, and in their neighbourhood?—It would.

5559. Lord Barcaple.—Would you make it compulsory that these appeal judges should reside in Edinburgh?—I think it better that they should not reside within their district.

5560. Your object in making them reside in Edinburgh would be to prevent them residing in their own district?—I think so.

5562. But you anticipate that if there was not such a rule, they might not improbably prefer to reside in their district?—Some might.

5564. The Chairman.—Have you thought of what salary the resident judge should have?—I think that depends a good deal on the amount of his work. If he has sufficient work, I think £1000 a year would not be an unreasonable salary.

5565. Mr. Shand.—What would you name as the minimum for such a judge?—I think in small counties they might be joined together, so as to give each of them £1000 a year.

5566. That is about the minimum?—Yes.

5567. Lord Barcaple.—Would you make any special provision in regard to the resident judge in the more remote counties,—in the Highlands and Islands?—I admit that there may be some little difficulty there.

5568. I suppose you would treat these as exceptional cases?—I think so.

5569. The Chairman.—Do you think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff ought to be extended?—I think it ought to be extended to all civil cases, except marriage and legitimacy.

5570. Would you extend it to divorce?—I think there is some little difficulty there; but I would even be inclined to say that the Sheriff Court ought to have that jurisdiction, from what I have seen of the hardships occurring from parties not being able to get a divorce. I know a case at present of a man whose wife has been on the streets for ten years, but he has been unable to get a divorce; the result is that he has for some years been living with another woman, and has a family by her. He came to me and asked what I could get him a divorce in the Court of Session for. I told him, and showed him an account in a case which I had had. He said 'I am quite unable to pay that, and I must just be doing;' and he has been doing ever since.

5571. Mr. Shand.—Are you satisfied that that is a type of many cases which exist in Scotland, particularly in populous localities?—Yes.

5572. Mr. Baxter.—May there not be the same hardship in the case of a woman who is really married, but cannot get a declarator of marriage in the Court of Session?—That is a thing affecting to a large extent the rights of other people, and it is so important that I would not be inclined to give such a jurisdiction to the Sheriff Court.

5573. Lord Barcaple.—And it affects the morals of the community?—Yes.

5574. Assuming the privative jurisdiction of the Court of Session in divorce cases to remain, would it materially lessen the expense if the proof were taken by commission in the district?—That depends on who the commissioner is. If he were to come from Edinburgh.

5575. Assume that the Sheriff-clerk depute was the commissioner?—The commissioner has very important duties to perform.

5576. Are you aware that in a very large proportion of cases of divorce there is no appearance?—I believe that to be so.

5577. And that if it is a divorce against the wife, she comes there quite readily, and exhibits herself before the witnesses, in order to aid the divorce?—I am not aware of that. I had a divorce case in the Court of Session not long ago, and my client did not do that. She had to be got hold of by the other party for the purpose.

5578. Mr. Shand.—Where appearance is entered, the husband has to pay the expense of counsel and agents on both sides?—Yes.

5579. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know that the expense debars poor people from applying for a remedy?—Yes. I know another case of a client of mine whose wife was a woman of the same description. She raised an action of aliment against him in the Sheriff Court, and she got 3s. 6d. a week; and though she was behaving in that way, he had to pay her that till she died.

5580. Mr. Webster.—Can you state the cost of the divorce in the Court of Session in the case which frightened your client so much?—I cannot recollect.

5581. What was about the expense?—It was about £60.

5582. Mr. Murray.—Was it an opposed case?—It was an unopposed case; but I had to bring all the witnesses from different parts of the country to Edinburgh. If I could have done it in Perth, I would have done it for probably £10 or £15.

5583. Were they witnesses from the county of Perth?—Yes; they were in different parts of that county.

5584. Mr. Gordon.—How many witnesses were there?—Six or eight.

5585. Mr. Murray.—If it had been in Perth, you would have had to bring the witnesses to Perth, and keep them there?—I would have sent them all back the same night, which I could not do in Edinburgh.

5586. Mr. Webster.—Have you not seen accounts in other undefended cases, where the amount was £20 or £30?—I never did.

5587. Mr. Shand.—For what sum do you think an undefended divorce might be got in the Sheriff Court?—A good deal depends on where the witnesses have to be brought from, but £10 would probably cover an ordinary case; it might be much less, it might be £5 or £6.

5588. Lord Barcaple.—If the witnesses happened to be in Perth, it would be very little?—Very little.

5589. The Chairman.—Would you extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to heritable rights of all kinds, however extensive?—I would.

5590. Mr. Baxter.—Do you know any cases of hardship from the Sheriff not having jurisdiction in regard to heritable rights?—There are two cases which were recently decided in the Sheriff Court,—one of them, a case of Robertson v M'Kinlay, which was in the Sheriff Court of Perth last year. The contention was about a small bit of ground, worth about 10s. a year, on the banks of the Tay. One person claimed it, and produced a sasine on it; an adjoining feuar also claimed it, and produced a disposition which he said included it, but he was not infeft. The Sheriff-substitute decided in favour of the pursuer holding the sasine; but the Sheriff-principal reversed, and held that it was a case which could not be brought in the Sheriff Court at all. The case is in abeyance, because the parties will not come to the Court of Session, so that the defender virtually holds possession of this piece of ground. It is not worth coming to the Court of Session about. The other case to which I refer is the Baptist Chapel v Whitelaw. About twenty-five or thirty years ago, according to the pursuer's allegations, the Baptist congregation in Perth bought a piece of ground, and built a chapel on portion of it, leaving a small bit which they did not require. A neighbour, seeing that it was not looked after, took possession of that small bit, and shortly afterwards got some one who had no earthly right to it to grant him a disposition. A disposition was accordingly granted, and infeftment took place on it. Some years afterwards the Baptist congregation began to feel that they were rather short of ground, and they proposed to this man to buy that bit from him, and they offered him a very considerable sum for it. He said he did not feel inclined to sell it, nor to show his papers. This excited some suspicion in their minds, and they looked at their own titles, and found that they were infeft in the ground. They immediately raised an action of ejection against the man; but they were thrown out of court because it was a contest about heritable right; and the man still retains possession, because the Baptist Chapel will not come to the Court of Session to fight about £2 a year. I may mention a third case. A client of mine was possessor of a small field. A neighbouring proprietor encroached, as she alleged, about two feet upon her ground, and she wished me to interdict him, and gave me a list of witnesses to examine. I was not satisfied that I could make out her case, and I told her she must go to the Court of Session, because it was a question about heritable right; and I would not raise the action for her, as I said she might be ruined. She shortly afterwards sold the field to a Mr. Gray, and he immediately raised an action against the neighbouring proprietor, or rather he pulled out a post belonging to the neighbouring proprietor, which he alleged was on his piece of ground. The piece of ground was not worth 20s. altogether. Mr. Turnbull, whose post was pulled up, raised an action against Mr. Gray, and on 19th July last the pursuer's account of expenses was taxed against Gray for £278, 14s.; so that there is really a case now, though there was not one to begin with, and probably your Lordship will have to decide it soon in the House of Lords, as it has gone there. Horace Skeete.

5591. Mr. Murray.—How does that case show the advisability of giving jurisdiction in heritable questions to the Sheriff?—If I could have raised the action in the first instance before the Sheriff, we would have had it settled for a few pounds, and it would probably never have gone further.

5592. The Lord Justice-General.—Provided the parties had acquiesced in the Sheriff's judgment; but suppose they had been animated by the same zeal that they seem to be now, would they not have gone to the House of Lords in the end?—I would not have allowed my client to be animated by that zeal, if I could have controlled her.

5593. Mr. Baxter.—But they would have had an opportunity of getting the case settled in the Sheriff Court?—Yes, for extremely little; and if after that they had liked to behave in that way, they must have taken the consequences. But at present we have no alternative; we are bound to go to the Court of Session.

5594. The Chairman.—Don't you think they might have referred the case to somebody to settle, if they had been animated by the spirit that you would have infused into them?—They might; but I had only control over one of them. The agent cannot control both sides.

5595. And he can only control by advice?—Yes.

5596. Do you know whether there was any suggestion from the court as to the propriety of settling that case without incurring expense about it?—I am not aware.

Horace Skeete.

5597. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Were you agent for either of the parties who ultimately had the case tried?—No; I was agent for the party who sold the field.

5598. Then your advice could have had no influence?—No. It had influence on the original possessor, whom I prevented from going to the court.

5599. Dr. Barclay.—The proof in that case was taken on commission in Perth?—Yes.

5600. Mr. Murray.—Although the value of the property in dispute in that case is very small, does not one of the parties consider that non-possession of it would materially interfere with his access to a mansion-house of considerable value?—It is not connected with a mansion-house at all. It is a grass field, and this was the entrance to it. I looked at it, and I found that the entrance to it was sufficiently wide to let in a cart without this small bit which was claimed. Of course, the wider the entrance the better.

5601. But the yearly value of the ground in dispute may not be a true test of the value of the subject in the opinion of the parties?—I don't know what opinion they held on the subject; but that is the opinion I held.

5602. The Chairman.—You looked at it, and saw that there was room for a cart?—I thought so.

5603. Are you aware, or not, that there was conflicting evidence as to whether there was room for a cart?—I know there was; but I saw it myself.

5604. And so did the witnesses who gave the conflicting evidence?—That is quite true.

5605. Mr. Shand.—Speaking, however, generally from your experience and observation, have you found that in a great many cases, parties who are owners of small heritable subjects have suffered injustice rather than come to the Court of Session?—I certainly have.

5606. And they have suffered injustice because, as the law at present stands, there is no remedy open to them without incurring large expense?—That is my experience. I have advised them against it.

5607. The Chairman.—You think the jurisdiction ought to be extended to heritage of whatever value?—I do. At present the Sheriff has jurisdiction to any amount of moveable property; and I cannot see any difference, so far as he is concerned, between £1000 in land and £1000 in a bank.

5608. Mr. Webster.—Would you make any difference on account of having the assistance of counsel available in the Court of Session?—No; I would not be inclined to make much difference on that account, because a large portion of the conveyancing of the country is conducted by country practitioners, who are now quite as good conveyancers, generally speaking, as counsel are.

5609. Mr. Shand.—Would you not give the defender power to remove the case to the Court of Session if it involved a question of considerable value?—No. If he found that the Sheriff-substitute and the appeal court decided against him, he would probably be satisfied with that decision, and would not go further; and it would be for his own good to restrain him.

5610. Suppose a case raised in such a county as Perth, involving right to large estates in that county, and that the defender is resolved that he shall not be satisfied with anything short of the decision of the Supreme Court, would it not be right that he should have the power of removing such a case as that at once to the Supreme Court, instead of leaving it to drag its way through the inferior court?—In a case of that sort, if all the doors of the courts were open, I think the public might safely be left to regulate their own rights and interests. If they have a large case, in which they are satisfied that the decision of the Court of Session will ultimately be taken, they will go there at once, and not to the Sheriff Court. It is only such cases as they think fit for decision in the Sheriff Court that they would take into the Sheriff Court.

5611. But you would leave to the pursuer the power of determining that without giving the defender any choice?—Certainly, because he has the power of appeal afterwards; and if he is satisfied with the judgment in the Sheriff Court, he need not use that power of appeal.

5613. Mr. Shand.—You are aware that, at present, power is given to either of the parties to remove the case to the Court of Session when proof is ordered, if the value is above £40?—I am aware of that.

5614. Do you propose to abrogate that provision?—I think it would be a good thing to take it away.

5615. Do not litigants often take advantage of it?—I never had any such cases. I have been told of one or two cases where the defender took advantage of it, and where the case has not gone further, because the pursuer would not follow the defender into the Court of Session.

5616. Are you not aware that in many cases pursuers take advantage of it?—I cannot say so. But it seems to have been meant to apply to cases intended for jury trial, although the Court of Session is not bound to send them to a jury. But a jury trial about £40 would be out of the question.

5617. The Chairman.—Would you allow it if the sum was a great deal higher than that?—I would not be inclined to allow any appeal to the Court of Session until the case was decided in the Sheriff Court.

5618. In regard to intermediate appeals in the Sheriff Court itself, have you any remarks to make? There are several stages now at which appeals may be taken from the Sheriff-substitute?—Yes, I think six appeals can be taken at present.

5619. Would you abridge the number?—I would not be inclined to abridge the number. There is a provision at the end of the 19th section of the present Sheriff Court Act, to the effect that an appeal taken against any interlocutor in the cause shall bring up all the previous interlocutors. I think it would be advisable to alter that to this effect, that it should bring up all previous interlocutors not previously appealable, so as to put matters into the position that when an interlocutor is pronounced which is appealable, if the parties don't then appeal against it, it ought to be held final.

5620. Dr. Barclay.—If they have acquiesced in it?—Yes. An important case on this point occurred in the Sheriff Court of Perth on 21st June 1859, Gall v Smith. It was an action raised by the mother of an illegitimate child. A preliminary plea was set up when the case came into court that the defender was not twenty-one years of age, and that his tutors and curators had not been called. The Sheriff-substitute repelled that plea, and the parties did not then appeal against that interlocutor, which they might have done. The case went to proof, and a very strong proof was led; and the Sheriff-substitute decided against the defender, finding that he was the father of the child. The case was brought up on appeal, and the Sheriff-principal, although concurring with the Sheriff-substitute on the merits, found himself bound under the Act of Parliament to consider the preliminary plea, and he altered the Sheriff-substitute's judgment upon it and sustained the plea; so that, after all that expense had been incurred, the case was thrown out of court, and in the interval the principal witness had died, so that they had no case; and at the present moment, I understand, the child is being supported by the parish. If they had been bound to appeal against the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor on the preliminary plea, all that would have been avoided. I think it advisable, therefore, to alter that provision of the Act.

5621. Lord Barcaple.—That alteration would have the effect of increasing the number of appeals taken in the Sheriff Court?—It would not have the effect of increasing the number which can be taken.

5623. And that would have the effect of encouraging that practice?—It would necessitate it.

5624. Are you aware that there is a considerable prevalence of opinion that the appeals taken at present in the Sheriff Courts are too numerous?—I know that that opinion does exist; and if it were possible to cut them down satisfactorily, I myself would be very much inclined to do it.

5625. Don't you think it to be very much a matter of expediency whether in particular cases it is better that these appeals should be taken or postponed? Sometimes they lead to unfortunate results, of which you have given us an instance; and sometimes, where they prove to be unavailing, they cause great expense and great delay?—They do.

5626. So that it is a balance of evils somewhat?—It is.

5627. Mr. Adam.—In point of fact, in the Sheriff Court of Perth, are these appeals taken for purposes of delay?—Frequently.

5628. Mr. Shand.—Don't you think that the present power of appealing upon preliminary defences might very well be left until the time when an order for proof is made? Power is given to appeal when a proof or a remit is ordered, and up to that time comparatively little expense has been incurred?—There would sometimes be a good deal of expense if you are to keep a long record; but if you can shorten the record, I think your suggestion would be very valuable.

5629. But even with the record as it is, is it not a less evil than deferring the pleas?—Yes.

5630. Don't you think, therefore, that that appeal might with advantage be dispensed with till an order for proof is pronounced?—I think so.

5631. Mr. Baxter.—Have you any experience of the expense of appointing factors and curators to insane persons?—There was a case from Perth in 1866. Mr. Logan was an old teacher, and his whole income was £52, 19s. 4d. a year. He became insane, and a judicial factor was appointed without opposition; and it cost £20, 14s. to appoint that factor. Mr. Logan remained in the asylum only six months, so that nearly half his income was eaten up during the six months he was insane by the appointment of the factor, and he had nothing to live upon.

5632. What would have been the expense if the case had been before the Sheriff?—£2 or £3.

5633. What was the expense of the discharge of the same factor in the Court of Session?—I think the expense of the discharge would be £10 or £15.

5634. Have you any other case to mention?—There was the case of William M'Laren, Comrie. It cost £150.

5635. Mr. Shand.—There was a long litigation there?—Yes; but if it had been in the Sheriff Court, the Sheriff could have decided the whole thing in twenty-four hours, by going out with a doctor and seeing the man, which he did ultimately.

5636. Mr. Baxter.—The court remitted to the Sheriff?—Yes. The question was, whether the man was insane or not.

5637. Mr. Shand.—And the judge had merely to look at him?—I think that was quite sufficient.

5638. Mr. Baxter.—Had you also a case of Cassidey?—Yes; there is a case of Cassidey where the appointment cost upwards of £30.

5639. What was the amount of the estate?—£2000.

5640. Do you know any case of lapsed trust?—Yes; there is a trust at present in Perth—Duff's trust—and the estate consists of only £80 in heritage, but it cannot be wound up. Nothing is being done in it, and it is hung up for years on account of the expense of coming to the Court of Session to get a trustee appointed, so as to get possession of the heritage.

5641. Dr. Barclay.—Is it £80 a year?—No; the capital is £80. It is a house. All the trustees have died, and it has lain for ten or fifteen years.

5642. Mr. Shand.—You are aware that factors for persons under disqualification are under the surveillance of the Accountant of the Court of Session?—Yes.

5643. Would you propose that that should continue?—Yes.

5644. The Chairman.—And that they should render an account to him?—Yes. I think that is a very salutary provision.

5645. Mr. Shand.—If such appointments could be made at considerably less expense in the Court of Session, would you think it an advantage that the jurisdiction should remain there, from the Accountant of Court being resident in Edinburgh?—I don't see how the residence of the Accountant in Edinburgh could affect the matter, because the factors in general are resident in the country.

5646. But it is the expense alone that causes you to make the suggestion?—Yes, it is.

5647. The Chairman.—Have you stated all the classes of cases in which you would extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff?—I have stated that I would give him jurisdiction in all civil cases, excepting the two I have specified.

5648. Mr. Gordon.—You said that a case which you mentioned could not be proceeded with, owing to the death of a witness. Was the deposition of that witness not available?—I don't know that it was. I don't know that it could be produced in any process of which it did not form part. The case never was raised again.

5649. Mr. Adam.—Would you be inclined to extend the system of jury trial to the Sheriff Court?—No.

5650. Mr. Baxter.—Have you any experience of Jury Court practice?—I had at one time.

5651. Do you know a case of Cameron?—I had a case of accounting before the Sheriff Court of Fifeshire. There was a remit to an accountant in Fifeshire, and he gave in a very long report, for which we paid him £130. He brought out a sum of £800 as due to my client, with a great deal of interest. The opposing party took the case to the Court of Session, and raised some outside pleas. They pressed very hard to get it sent to a jury, and it was ultimately decided that it should go to a jury, and we were ordered to adjust issues. But my client got so alarmed at a case of that description going to a jury that he gave it up, and he has never got a penny of his money yet. That took place twelve years ago. He was afraid to go to a jury lest he should be ruined. He said he had better give it up than risk it. The other party never moved further.

5652. The Chairman.—You don't approve of juries in the Sheriff Court?—No. I don't approve of a jury at all in civil cases.

5653. You stated that in that case £130 was paid to an accountant. Is that not a very large expense to incur?—It was a very large expense; but there was a great amount of labour, an enormous number of documents, and a most voluminous report, and we did not think that was too much.

5654. Mr. Gordon.—What was the nature of the case?—It was an accounting between the partners of a dissolved firm.

5655. Dr. Barclay.—A firm of common carriers?—Yes.

5656. Mr. Baxter.—Would you have any reliance on a jury in such a case?—No; neither had my client.

5657. Mr. Paterson.—You said that when the case came to the Court of Session, certain outside pleas were raised. What were they? Had they not been stated in the court below?—They were; and were decided in the court below. They raised the question whether the party was a partner, and what was due. These two questions were to be sent to the jury.

5658. Lord Barcaple.—Was not the misfortune there, that the great expense of accounting had been incurred before it was determined whether there was a partnership or not?—But that had been determined in the court below.

5659. That was subject to appeal. Was not the misfortune that that matter had not been exhausted before the remit to the accountant was made?—It was exhausted. We could not come to the Court of Session with it. It could not have been carried to the Court of Session till it was finally decided in the court below.

5660. Might it not have been brought up under the 40th section of the Judicature Act?—There was no proof. But I only mention the case to illustrate the objection that people have to go to a jury. At present that could not have occurred, because the remit was of consent; and now a remit of consent is final. The result of the accountant's report would have been final if the case had occurred now.

5661. Final upon the accounting?—Yes.

5662. That would not have settled the question whether there was a partnership or not?—No; but it would have been final in the accounting.

5663. And it turned out that the accounting was of no use, because it had not been finally ascertained that there was a partnership?—I only mentioned the case to show the objection which people have to the Jury Court. This could not occur now, because the report would be final on the question of accounting, and we would not have had much objection to go to the jury on the question of partnership.

5664. Was anything but the question of partnership to go to the jury?—Both the partnership and the amount due were going to the jury.

5665. The Chairman.—Then it amounted to this, that the expense frightened the party?—Yes.

5666. That is, a person with an accountant's report in his favour, finding a balance of £800 due him, would rather not go into the Jury Court with his claim of £800 backed by an accountant's report?—He was afraid of the expense and uncertainty.

5667. He would not go into the Jury Court with a claim of £800 fortified by the report of a neutral accountant, and with two judgments in his favour?—I was present myself when the case came before the judge in the Court of Session, and he expressed views against the report, which frightened me very much.

5668. Then the party began to get afraid on the merits of his case?—We did not know what a jury might do with a case of that description. We could not tell the result of going to the jury.

5669. Nor even of remaining with the judge?—We would at all events have fought the case to the end, and got a result, if it had been before the judge; but we never got that determined.

5670. You were startled because you thought the expense more than was suitable for a claim of £800?—My client could not afford to pay it.

5671. Lord Barcaple.—Had issues been adjusted?—No.

5672. Then you cannot say whether, if issues had been adjusted, they would have comprehended the accounting?—I was present and heard the points that were to go to the jury. They were, first, whether there was a partnership; and second, what sum was due, if any.

5673. That was in the Outer House?—Yes.

5674. You did not adjust issues?—No.

5675. You would have taken the judgment of the Inner House as to whether such an accounting should go to a jury?—I thought it should not, but the judge thought differently.

5676. But the judge had no power to settle that in the Outer House?—When I explained to my client the course which the case was taking, he said, 'I don't see my way to run the risk of a jury trial about that; if I lose the case, I may be ruined.'

5677. Mr. Baxter.—It was his terror of the Jury Court that prevented him from going on?—Yes.

5678. And the expense?—Yes.

5679. Mr. Adam.—What is the opinion of your clients about jury trial?—The general opinion of clients is against jury trial. It is extremely expensive and uncertain.

5680. The Chairman.—Do you approve of the principle on which fees are regulated in the Debts Recovery Act?—No, I do not approve of the principle.

5681. What is your objection to it?—My objection is that it is a slump payment, altogether irrespective of the work done.

5682. You think that is not a sound principle?—I think not.

5683. Is it unfavourable to the agents?—I think it is unfavourable both to the agents and to the clients.

5684. You mean that in some cases it is unfavourable to the one, and in some cases to the other?—In nearly all cases these slump payments under that Act I consider to be wholly insufficient, except for decrees in absence. I think a slump payment is a bad thing; because if agents have a slump payment for doing work, they don't take such an interest in the various details of their work as they would do if they were paid for the respective pieces of work they perform.

5685. On the general matter of costs in the Sheriff Court, have you anything to suggest?—I think that our tables of fees are not very correct at present. I think the whole table of fees should be revised.

5686. With what object?—With the object of putting them on a sound basis.

5687. What is the defect in their basis at present?—There are a good many of the fees which I think are not exactly applicable to our Acts of Parliament as they stand.

5688. Do you think that, taken as a whole, they are reasonable?—I think that the fees of the ordinary court are reasonable.

5689. You think they are not applicable in all respects to the present form of proceeding?—I think they are not.

5690. And in order to make them so, you think they should be adjusted?—I think so.

5691. But upon the whole, you think the amount is reasonable, though it ought to be differently distributed?—I think the amount is pretty reasonable.

5692. Have you any suggestions to make as to the privileges of agents?—I think all agents should pass the same examination, and be entitled to practise in any court.

5693. In any local court, or in the Supreme Court also?—Or in the Supreme Court if they think proper.

5694. Where would they be admitted as agents?—There should be some body appointed for the purpose of examining agents and admitting them.

5695. The admission of agents to practise in the Supreme Court should be regulated by the court, should it not?—I think it should.

5696. You think all agents should be so admitted, and should be allowed to practise wherever they please?—I think so.

5697. Do you think any difficulty would arise as to the conducting of causes in the Supreme Court from agents living at a distance?—I think the practical effect would be, that we would probably employ agents in Edinburgh, but it would give us much greater control than we have at present over the cause.

5698. What do you mean by more control over the cause?—We would be able to keep down expense. We ourselves would be the agents in the cause, and we would therefore have the power of regulating matters of expense much more than we have at present.

5699. You would employ an Edinburgh agent?—Yes; but having the power to come to the Court of Session if we thought proper, that would give us an influence and a power over the conducting of the cause and the expense of it which we have not at present. We are quite helpless at present.

5700. Mr. Paterson.—Would you charge less than the Edinburgh agent?—That is matter of detail. We would not charge more.

5701. Would you shorten the steps of procedure, or how would you have more control over the costs?—Counsel's fees are one very great expense.

5702. The Chairman.—You would have more control over them, you think?—If I fee'd counsel for a debate, I would pay him for the debate; and if he did not finish it, I would not pay him more next day. I would give him a fair fee for the debate; and if he liked to speak three days for his fee, I would not interfere with him. But if he liked to finish his case in two hours, I would give him the same fee if he did it satisfactorily; and I would pick out a counsel who would attend to my case, and go to the bottom of it, and do it justice.

5703. Mr. Paterson.—You think you would be better judges of these matters than the Edinburgh agents?—We know quite well about the abilities of counsel.

5704. You told us you disapproved of a slump fee being given under the Debts Recovery Act to the practitioners in the local courts?—I don't propose to give counsel a slump fee. I propose to pay him for each step he performs; but if he chooses to break one step into three bits, I would only pay him one fee.

5705. Mr. Webster.—Would you send the fee only after you had seen whether the work was satisfactorily done?—I think it would be a very good regulation to pay counsel after they had performed their work. I would not insist upon it, but I think it would be a very good regulation.

5706. Mr. Murray.—What would you do if counsel would not accept the employment under the conditions you imposed?—I would employ somebody else, unless there was a strike amongst the counsel, which I don't think likely.

5707. The Chairman.—Would you give counsel an action for recovery of his fee, if it was not paid to him?—I would. A counsel works for his money the same as anybody else, and it is quite a fiction to put it on other grounds. He lives by his profession just as other people do; and if he is not paid for the work he does, he should have an action for payment the same as any other man has.

5708. Mr. Webster.—Suppose you were not quite satisfied with the manner in which counsel had done his work, would you send him any fee?—Yes; I would send him a good fee. I would probably give him the same fee, but I would not give him any more fees.

5709. Mr. Paterson.—You think the agent should be the judge of how counsel does his work, and how counsel should be paid?—Yes, unless you make a table of fees for counsel, and I don't see any objection to that.

5710. Do you think it would be fair that a disappointed litigant should be the judge of counsel's remuneration?—You might have a table of fees, and pay counsel before he performs his work. All other practitioners have a table of fees, and I don't see any difference between a practising counsel and any agent who practises.

5712. Is that a matter that you have thought of before?—I have thought of it frequently, and I know that it would be extremely satisfactory to the public to have such a table. I don't wish to cut down counsel's fees. I wish to pay them well.

5713. Do you see no difficulties about it?—There may be.

5714. Do you see no risk of excessive hardship to the poorer class of litigants?—I don't think they would be in a worse position than they are at present.

5715. In the table of fees would you have reference to the value of the question at issue?—That is a matter of detail which I am not prepared to go into. All other Bodies have tables of fees framed upon some principle more or less satisfactory to them, and I don't think it is beyond the powers of the profession to frame a table of fees sufficiently elastic to meet these difficulties.

5716. It might be very satisfactory to the profession, but the question I was putting was whether it would ultimately be found to be satisfactory to the community, and especially to the humbler class of litigants?—It would be satisfactory in this way, that you would be able to see exactly from the table what fee counsel should have, and you could count the cost of a litigation to a considerable extent before entering on it.

5717. And you could not control it at all?—I would not wish to control it if it was fair.

5718. Mr. Shand.—Would you introduce a table such as there is in the Debts Recovery Act, applicable to counsel's fees?—No. I repudiate the principle of slump payments.

5719. Mr. Webster.—On your system of sending fees only after the work is done, how would you protect a losing party from being charged an excessive fee after he had lost his case?—I have not said that I would adopt that principle.

5720. Would you send the fee in anticipation that the counsel would do his work well, or how are you to regulate it if you don't delay sending or fixing it till after the work has been done?—If there is a table of fees, there would be no difficulty. If there is no table of fees, the best way would be to send the fee first. Horace Skeete.

5721. And where, as often happens, the case is decided by the court upon hearing the opposite counsel only, how would you judge of the fee for the counsel who had never been called on to speak?—I think such counsel would be entitled to the same fee as if he had spoken, because he was there prepared, and ready to speak.

5722. You would assume that he was prepared?—Yes.

5723. The Chairman.—If you did not send the fee till after the work was done, would you intimate to counsel beforehand what fee he was to get?—I think that would be fair to the counsel.

5724. Might it not have some effect in reference to the client that the counsel should know what fee he was to get? Do you think the counsel's efforts would be at all regulated by the amount of the fee?—I have no doubt that it might.

5725. Mr. Paterson.—In sending fees to counsel at present, an agent judges by the importance of the case, its bulk as involving evidence or otherwise, and in some degree by the circumstances of the party. How could you anticipate these so as to frame beforehand a table of fees for counsel?—We in the Sheriff Court act as both agents and counsel, and we have a table of fees found to meet all the exigencies of our court. If that is possible in the one court, I don't see that it should be impossible in the other. I am not prepared to go into the details of that; but we have that example of it.

5726. In the inferior court the agent is paid for each step of the cause in detail. The fee to counsel is generally a slump sum. How could you frame a sliding scale of such fees? Could you anticipate beforehand all the elements entering into the case?—You would pay him for the various steps that necessarily arise in each case. Each case goes through a fixed routine, and you pay counsel for each of the steps.

5727. Would you pay him according to the time occupied, without reference to the importance of the case?—I am not prepared to go into the exact details of how the table is to be framed; but in the Sheriff Court we are paid without reference to the importance of the case. We get a certain fee for the debate, whether the case is short or long, difficult or easy; and that is on the principle that one case must make up for another, I suppose.

5728. The Chairman.—In the event of the country agent conducting the cause in Edinburgh, would there be any difficulty as to the custody of the process?—We could get it borrowed by an Edinburgh agent.

5729. Then you would have to employ an Edinburgh agent?—That is what it would fall into; but we would have the complete control. We at present get copies sent to the country, and these copies would serve us without getting the process itself. There would be no more expense.

5730. Mr. Webster.—Do you not find it very material generally to look at original documents in conducting a process?—Where it was necessary, we would get that done for us.

5731. Mr. Baxter.—Have you anything to say with reference to making up records?—I think that instead of our present summons, a short writ calling the parties into court would be sufficient in nearly all cases; and when they appear in court, I think that if they were to state their case orally to the judge, he would be able there and then to frame an issue sufficient to send the case to proof, as is done at present in the Jury Court. That would save the expense and the delay of our present condescendences.

5732. The Chairman.—You would have the judge to frame an issue before proof?—After hearing the parties orally he ought to have sufficient information to enable him to frame an issue for the proof. Of course that would not apply to equity cases. In the case of a reduction it might be necessary for him to order the parties to give in a condescendence; but in common law cases I think that would be sufficient.

5733. Have you any suggestion to make as to criminal matters?—I think that the taking of the declaration of the prisoner ought to be abolished.

5734. The Lord Advocate.—Do you mean that the prisoner should not have any opportunity of making a statement?—I think he ought to be brought into court, and that probably, as is done in England, he ought to hear read over to him what has been sworn or stated against him; and then, if he chooses to make any voluntary statement, it should be taken down, and there I think the matter should end.

5735. That would be a declaration, with the exception that you would not ask him any questions?—I would ask no questions.

5736. Lord Barcaple.—You would just ask if he wished to say anything, as an English magistrate does?—That is all.

5737. Mr. Shand.—Would you allow him the privilege of having it read at his trial if he wished it?—Yes.

5738. You are aware that that privilege is not given to prisoners at present?—I am.

5739. Mr. Adam.—You wish his declaration taken after he knows what has been sworn against him, and not before?—Certainly. I think, before you ask a man to speak, he is entitled to know what you charge him with.

5740. You want him to hear the evidence against him as well as the charge?—That is the practice in England, and it seems to work well.

5741. Lord Barcaple.—He hears the evidence itself in England; the witnesses are examined in open court?—Yes.

5742. Would you propose that?—I think that is a good practice too. I think as much should be done in open court as possible. It satisfies the public.

5743. The Lord Advocate.—Have you considered the difference between the systems in England and Scotland in regard to that matter?—I have frequently considered that.

5744. What is your view as to the effect upon innocent persons, of having these inquiries conducted in open court?—I have no experience of that matter.

5745. What I mean is this. Is there not an advantage in the present system in Scotland, that it does not bring before the public cases of suspicion against parties who turn out to be innocent?—If there is any case against a man, it generally oozes out, and he has no means at present of clearing himself. When an accusation is made against an innocent man, I think it better that it should be made publicly, giving him an opportunity of clearing himself, than that it should be made sub rosa.

5746. Mr. Adam.—Have you in your own experience ever seen a case in which an innocent man suffered injury by the present mode of taking declarations?—It is difficult to know whether a man is innocent or not.

5747. Dr. Barclay.—Do you frequently find the prisoner's declaration refused when you have called for its production?—Frequently.

5748. And in these cases the prisoner thought it an advantage to have it read over to the jury?—Yes; and not only so, but when a man refuses to answer any questions, that is generally put to the jury as a proof of his guilt. I have heard it frequently stated to the jury.

5749. Not by the judge?—No, but I have heard it said by the public prosecutor, that if the prisoner had been innocent, he would not have refused to answer questions. I have heard that stated frequently, and a jury is very apt to think that there is something in it.

5750. Mr. Paterson.—You would entirely exclude the power of interrogating an accused party?—Certainly.

5751. You would take down his statement as given by himself?—Yes.

5752. Supposing it appeared to the judge that some part of the statement might be explained to the advantage of the accused, would you debar the judge from giving him an opportunity of explaining it?—I would give him an opportunity of making his meaning clear. If the judge did not understand his meaning, he might ask what he meant. But I would take down what the accused said as nearly as possible verbatim.

5753. The Chairman.—If a man is accused of an act of theft which has been committed an hour before, and he is found in possession of the stolen goods when apprehended, would you think it was right or not right to ask him how he came to possess these goods?—I would think it wrong to ask him any question whatever.

5754. It might give him an opportunity of clearing himself from that suspicion which the law attaches to the recent possession of stolen goods; but you would not put the question?—I would not put the question; but if he were innocent, he would probably take advantage of the opportunity to give an explanation voluntarily.

5755. Lord Barcaple.—He would hear the evidence as to his having been in possession of the stolen goods?—Certainly.

5756. Would you suggest that he should have legal assistance at that stage?—If there was a lawyer on the other side, I think the prisoner is also entitled to legal assistance.

5757. There is the Procurator-fiscal on the other side. You would give the accused legal assistance at that stage?—I think so.

5758. Dr. Barclay.—Have you any remark to make as to previous convictions?—Yes; I think previous convictions ought not to be libelled. They ought to be reserved until the jury have found the prisoner guilty, and then put in for the purpose of aggravating the sentence.

5760. Dr. Barclay.—Do you know that that does influence the mind of the jury?—It influences their minds very much. I have frequently spoken to them about it, and they have said, if there was not enough evidence in the particular case, the man had been often convicted before, and that the evidence was enough in these circumstances. They say he has a bad character, and that influences them.

5761. The Chairman.—Is the principle on which a prisoner proves good character, in order to make it improbable that he committed the offence?—It is.

5762. Then on what principle would you allow the convictions to be put in?—To counteract that.

5763. To make it probable that he did commit the offence?—To bring out the truth. I think the truth and the whole truth should be laid before the jury, as far as is relevant.

5764. Then it would be rather to prove that he had not that good character which raises a presumption of innocence?—Certainly.

5765. Would you give him notice that these convictions were to be produced against him?—Yes; I would give him notice, so as to enable him to investigate them.

5766. Mr. Shand.—Do you approve of the intermediate verdict of not proven which exists in Scotland?—Yes; I am inclined to approve of that.

5767. You think that should remain?—Yes; I think so.

5768. Dr. Barclay.—Is it your opinion that if that verdict were given up, juries would convict more than they do?—I think they would.

5769. Would it be for the benefit of public justice to give up that verdict?—I think it for the benefit of public justice that whenever there is a deficiency of evidence, so as to create a doubt on the minds of the jury, it is better that the prisoner should escape than that they should be driven to convict him.

5770. Is it a good thing for him to escape with a taint on his character, as he does with a verdict of Not proven?—It is better for him than being convicted.

5771. The Chairman.—Have you anything else to say as to criminal matters?—No.

5772. Would you extend the power of the Sheriff in regard to punishment?—I do not feel inclined to do that. I think the Circuit Courts are very satisfactory. I would sooner be tried in the Circuit Court than in the Sheriff Court, if I must be tried by either.

5773. Why so?—Because I think there is rather an undue pressure for convictions in the Sheriff Court, according to my experience.

5774. Do you not think the party is equally ably defended in the Sheriff Court?—I don't doubt that at all; but I think there is often a stronger pressure for convictions in the Sheriff Court than in the Court of Justiciary.

5775. Mr. Murray.—Do you think that Procurators-fiscal should be allowed to carry on private practice?—I think they should not.

5776. If the salaries were sufficient, you think they should be debarred from private practice?—I think so. If the salary is not sufficient, I think it should be made sufficient.

5777. Mr. Baxter.—And a large enough district given to them?—Yes.

5778. And a retiring allowance, I suppose?—Certainly.

5779. The Chairman.—Have you a Dean of Guild Court in Perth?—We have.

5780. Does it do any work?—It does a good deal of work; but it does it very unsatisfactorily I think.

5781. Is there an assessor?—There is.

5782. Is he practically the judge?—He is,—an irresponsible judge.

5783. What would you suggest in order to make it more satisfactory?—I think that in all towns, except perhaps Edinburgh and Glasgow, the Dean of Guild Court should be abolished, and the jurisdiction transferred to the Sheriff. In Glasgow the Dean of Guild Court is very satisfactory; at least it was so when I was in Glasgow. But other Dean of Guild Courts that I have experience of are not satisfactory. A case occurred in Perth, where a petition was presented for an interdict against a man building a stair on a piece of ground which the petitioner alleged to be his. He asked interim interdict; but the assessor said he did not like interim interdicts, and that they were dangerous things to meddle with. Accordingly interim interdict was not granted. The man completed his stair, and afterwards the court decided that he had no right to put it there; but they could not remove it; there was no conclusion to take it down; what was asked was merely an interdict against putting it up.

5784. Dr. Barclay.—There was a long proof in that case?—Yes.

5785. The Chairman.—Except in large cities, you would transfer the jurisdiction to the Sheriff?—Yes.

5786. Is there a Justice of Peace Court in Perth?—Yes, there are Quarter Sessions. They never exercise any small debt jurisdiction.

5787. What jurisdiction do they exercise?—Game licences, spirit licences, and poaching cases.

5788. Do you think it is a good jurisdiction for spirit licences?—Well, I would much prefer having all these transferred to the Sheriff.

5789. Why?—It does not appear to me to work satisfactorily. For instance, taking the town, the licences are first of all granted or refused by the magistrates; and when you go to the Quarter Sessions, they generally say that the magistrates ought to know much better than they do what should be done in their own district, and they almost universally affirm. They regard it as an interference on their part to touch the licences granted in town, so that the appeal is of no use.

5790. In country districts don't the Justices grant licences?—They do.

5791. Who would you give that jurisdiction to?—I think it would be better that all these things were transferred to the Sheriff.

5792. Do you think the Justices have not a better knowledge of the requirements of the district?—The Sheriff, in general, knows all the districts of the county remarkably well.

5793. Have you a Burgh Court in Perth for cases of debt?—We have; but it never sits. It is in abeyance.

5794. It is of no use?—It is of no use.

5795. I suppose the magistrates exercise police jurisdiction?—They do.

5796. Is that under a special Act for Perth, giving the powers of the general Act?—Yes.

5797. Is that a satisfactory jurisdiction?—It is not satisfactory at all.

5798. How would you remedy that?—I would transfer the whole of that jurisdiction to the Sheriff.

5799. What is unsatisfactory about it?—The criminal is usually brought up there in the first instance, and the person who sits on the bench is a bailie, who knows nothing about law or the rules of evidence. Sometimes he has an assessor, and sometimes not. The cases are therefore often decided in the most unsatisfactory manner. We find, as agents, that there is not the slightest use in speaking to a bailie, who is altogether ignorant of law, or evidence, or anything else, for he always takes his own way. Therefore we decline to go to that court, and the parties are often convicted without being defended by any agent.

5800. How often is that court held?—They hold it at any time, when there is anybody to try.

5801. Are there many cases brought before them?—A great many.

5802. Would that not be a very heavy duty to throw on the Sheriff?—It would increase his duty considerably; but if he could not overtake it, a stipendiary magistrate might be appointed.

5803. The Sheriff in Perth used to have a good deal to do?—That has not diminished of late.

5804. You think that in towns which cannot afford to have an experienced assessor, there should be a stipendiary magistrate appointed to deal with these matters where the Sheriff cannot overtake them?—I think so.

5805. Mr. Paterson.—On what grounds would you except the Dean of Guild Court in Edinburgh and Glasgow from your proposal to hand these courts over to the Sheriff?—Because I think they are better conducted.

5806. The courts over the country generally are constituted on the same principle?—Yes.

5807. The Dean is an elected magistrate?—He is.

5808. Holding his office only for one or two years?—Yes.

5809. In Glasgow the Dean is assisted by a certain number of liners?—Yes.

5810. Selected from the Trades' House and Merchants' House?—Yes.

5811. Both of these are large corporations in Glasgow, and hold considerable property?—Yes.

5812. And they may be parties to actions in the Dean of Guild Court before the Dean?—Quite possible.

5813. Have you known such?—No, I never knew it; but it might possibly occur, and that would be an objection.

5814. The liners chosen from the Trades' House are generally tradesmen in Glasgow in large business?—Yes.

5815. And they may be contractors for executing the very work which the court is considering?—That is very true.

5816. The assessor is generally one of the town clerks of the Corporation of Glasgow?—He is.

5817. And the corporation holds extensive property, and may be parties to cases before the Dean of Guild Court?—No doubt.

5818. The assessor of the Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow is also statutory secretary of the River Trust?—Yes.

5819. That is also a large incorporation?—Yes.

5820. And it also may be a party to causes in the Dean of Guild Court?—It may.

5821. So that the assessor in the Dean of Guild Court, if a River Trust case should come up before him, has to dispose of the case of his own employers, the River Trustees?—No doubt of it.

5822. Mr. Shand.—Do you know whether the Dean of Guild Court works well in Glasgow, and is a popular court?—When I was there it did work well, and it was satisfactory to the public at that time. There was a remarkably good town clerk.

5823. Mr. Murray.—Is the assessor of the Dean of Guild in Perth also the clerk of the Dean of Guild Court?—He is.

5824. Are there fees payable in the court?—There are.

5825. Payable to the clerk?—Yes.

5826. And he is also the judge?—Yes.

5827. Dr. Barclay.—He is also clerk to the Guildry?—Yes, and clerk to the police.

5828. In Perth, are there liners?—Yes, there are three or four councillors.

5829. Are they equally competent with the liners in Glasgow?—No.

5830. Have they a vote?—Yes; but they never have any lining in Perth. Any person may pull down a building, and build it up in any way he likes, till he is interdicted by his neighbours. In Glasgow, before you commence to build, you must present a petition to the Dean of Guild Court for a lining, and serve it on the adjoining proprietors; and the plans are seen, and can be objected to.

5831. The Chairman.—Is there a Commissary Court at Perth?—There is.

5832. Has it a separate clerk from the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

5833. Is there any advantage in keeping up that distinction?—I think it is better not to crowd too much upon one official, and the Commissary Court does its work in an extremely satisfactory manner, as far as my experience goes. I would therefore not be inclined to put them together, as the Sheriff-clerk has generally enough to do with his own duties.

5834. Mr. Baxter.—Does the Sheriff-clerk in Perth do his duty himself?—He does it by deputy.

5836. Dr. Barclay.—Would the public gain anything by the change?—The public would gain nothing by the change, because the whole of the Commissary-clerk's fees are paid by the public for what he does.

5837. Mr. Murray.—May what you have stated not partly arise from the present mode of paying Sheriff-clerks, by which there is a sort of contract with them to do the whole duties of the office?—I don't think it ought to arise from that, if they are sufficiently paid.

5838. But by the present system there is contract with the Sheriff-clerk to do the work; and it is therefore his aim to do it at as cheap a rate as possible?—It is.

5839. And perhaps not to have such efficient assistants as he would have if his salary was a fixed sum?—I think that his salary should be a fixed sum, and that there should be fixed sums for the clerks in the office.

5840. In that case, would you see any objection to joining the Commissary-clerkship with the Sheriff-clerkship?—If the Sheriff-clerks were to do the work of the Commissary-clerk as satisfactorily as the Commissary-clerks do at present, I would see no objection to combining them; but I see no public good to be got by it.

5841. Mr. Shand.—The nature of the two offices is such that they would admit of being combined?—Yes.

5842. Mr. Murray.—And a different mode of paying the Sheriff-clerk would probably remove the objection which you state to the mode in which his business is conducted?—It might.

5843. Dr. Barclay.—Very important records are kept in the Commissary-clerk's office?—Yes.

5844. Is it not an advantage to have a separate office where these might be consulted?—Yes.

5845. Lord Barcaple.—These, I suppose, should in any event be kept separate and very accessible?—Yes.

5846. The decrees of the Commissaries should not be kept along with the decrees of the Sheriff?—No; there ought to be separate establishments for them.

5847. Mr. Baxter.—In many counties the offices of Sheriff-clerk and Commissary-clerk are joined?—Yes.

5848. The Chairman.—Have you any further observations to make?—There is just one thing which I wish to bring before the Commission, and it is this: Under the Cessio Act, 6 and 7 Will. IV., chap. 56, § 2, it is provided that if a debtor has been or shall be charged to pay a civil debt, and a warrant to imprison him has been issued, then it shall be competent to him to apply for interim protection, and for decree of cessio bonorum in the manner hereinafter provided. The first objection that I have to this clause is, that the debtor cannot apply for cessio until a warrant to imprison him has been actually issued. He can never know when that warrant is issued; he has no means of finding it out; and the first thing he hears of it is when he is apprehended and put in jail. Great hardships arise from this; but if the provision were, that as soon as a man was charged on a decree he could apply for cessio, the difficulty would be got over. Under the Act, it is provided that a debtor shall be able to apply for interim protection, so as to prevent him being incarcerated at all, and for interim liberation if in prison; but the 4th section says that a day shall be appointed, not earlier than thirty days, for the meeting of his creditors at a certain place, and that he must send them notice to that effect; but an Act of Sederunt was passed on 6th June 1839, the 6th section of which is as follows: 'In processes of cessio, whether the creditors, or any of them, shall have been called by letters, or cited in terms of law, the cause shall not be enrolled, nor shall any procedure take place therein either as a cessio, or any application for interim protection or liberation, or otherwise, until the diet of compearance in the same.' Now, the diet of compearance in the Act is thirty days after the man may be apprehended and put in prison; so that the practical working of these two Acts is, that though the object of the Act is to give him interim protection, he cannot find out when the warrant is issued to put him in prison, and he is generally put in prison; and when he gets there, although it is intended that he shall be able to apply for liberation, and to get out of prison, this Act of Sederunt says that he shall not apply for thirty days. The result is, that every one put in prison under the Act of Parliament must remain thirty days at least in prison before he can move one step. There is at present a man in Perth jail in these circumstances, and I am sure I have had fifty of them since I have been in Perth. In that way a man suffers about thirty-five days' imprisonment whether he has been guilty of anything fraudulent or not. That is the only case with reference to bankrupts in which this can occur now, as, under the Sequestration Statute, the Sheriff can grant immediate protection.

5849. Dr. Barclay.—The Act of Sederunt applies only to Sheriff Courts?—Yes.

5850. The Lord Advocate.—How would the difficulty be got over?—By enabling a man to apply for cessio as soon as he was charged on the decree; and, second, on the petition for cessio, applying for interim protection, authorizing the Sheriff to grant it.

5851. Dr. Barclay.—And liberation without waiting the thirty days?—Yes. The 6th section of the Act of Sederunt should be abolished.

5852. Mr. Baxter.—It is different in the Court of Session?—Yes. They can do that in the Court of Session, but we cannot in the Sheriff Court.

ADAM PATERSON, ESQ.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD COLONSAY IN THE CHAIR.

JOHN NAISMITH, ESQ., examined.

John Naismith.

5853. The Chairman.—You are a practitioner before the Sheriff Court in Glasgow?—Yes.

5854. How long have you been so?—Since 1853. I have been a member of the Faculty of Procurators there since that date, and previous to the passing of the Sheriff Court Act I conducted business there as managing clerk of the firm of which I am now a partner.

5855. Do you hold any official situation?—None.

5856. Have you any suggestion to make as to the constitution of the Sheriff Court, as consisting of a Sheriff and his substitutes?—I consider that it is essential that a cheap and effective system of appeal within the court itself should be maintained. The system may be improved; but it cannot be improved, or even maintained, if the office of Sheriff be abolished.

5857. Does the constitution of the court as it exists give satisfaction in your district?—Upon the whole it does. We consider that there may be improvements introduced; but upon the whole it gives great satisfaction, I believe, both to the profession and to the general public.

5858. What are the improvements that you would suggest?—That if possible some plan should be devised by which the court of appeal should not be constituted of a single judge.

5859. Have you considered how that could be carried into execution?—That is a matter which several committees named by our society have considered from time to time at various periods during the last twelve years at least, and the idea which has been entertained is, that the court might be improved by arranging that in appeals upon the merits, from final judgments in the cause, the Sheriff should be assisted by two of his substitutes.

5860. How many Sheriff-substitutes are there in Lanarkshire?—There are seven substitutes, four of whom are in Glasgow.

5861. Mr. Paterson.—I suppose you are speaking of the appeal court at Glasgow alone?—Yes.

5863. Mr. Baxter.—Would you include in the two substitutes, the substitute who gave the decision appealed against?—Never, where it could be avoided.

5864. The Chairman.—What are the advantages which you would expect to derive from that arrangement?—There certainly appears to be an anomaly in an appeal from a single judge to another single judge; and by that alteration in the constitution of the court, I would expect that it would enjoy to a still greater degree than it now does, the confidence of the public.

5865. Are there many appeals from the judgment of the Sheriff of Lanarkshire to the Court of Session?—I don't think they are very numerous. I have looked into it for some years back, and they generally range considerably under two dozen; but since the recent Court of Session Act was passed, abolishing the obligation of the party appealing to find security for costs, I believe they have become considerably more numerous.

5866. When you say two dozen, do you mean to comprehend the whole county of Lanark, or only the Glasgow district?—Only the Glasgow district. I cannot speak as to the other courts.

5867. Mr. Campbell.—To what do you chiefly attribute the small number of advocations under the old system, and the number of appeals under the new?—To two causes: first, the confidence which the people have in the local court; and second, but in a minor degree, to the expense necessarily incident to an appeal to the Supreme Court.

5869. To what do you attribute the recent increase in the number?—I believe a very large proportion of them are brought for the purpose of obtaining delay. A party cannot pay, and consequently he is very indifferent on the subject of expense.

5870. You said that they had increased since the passing of the recent Court of Session Act; has that increased the expectation of delay?—No; I said that I did not believe the necessity for finding caution prevented any party, who was litigating in good faith—at least the cases are infinitesimally rare—from bringing an advocation to the Court of Session. In saying that they were brought for the purpose of delay, I did not mean to say that the delay in the Court of Session has increased; on the contrary, I believe it must have greatly diminished; but still there necessarily is a considerable delay, and a party who wants to put off the evil day of payment of his debt as long as possible will hazard an appeal when he has not to find security for costs.

5871. I understood you to say you were of opinion the appeals had increased in your district since the passing of the recent Court of Session Act?—I speak not as matter of opinion, but as matter of fact.

5872. To what do you ascribe that increase in the number?—To a very great extent to the abolition of the rule, which I consider a salutary one, that caution should be found.

5873. Mr. Paterson.—In how many instances have the appeals been carried out?—That I cannot tell, because I speak only from information which I have gathered in a rough way from the books of the Sheriff Court, and the statistics in the Sheriff-clerk's possession. When the appeal is intimated, he cannot tell its after fate.

5874. Even under the old rule, I suppose it was not an uncommon thing for parties to find caution, and yet not to carry the advocation to the Supreme Court?—It was far from uncommon. They got fifteen days' delay by doing so; and in many cases bonds might be lodged by parties who acted in perfectly good faith, just because they wanted to get that time in order to consider whether they were to advocate or not.

5875. A party wanting delay in that way was aided, also, if the court happened to be in vacation?—Yes.

5876. Mr. Adam.—Would you prefer the scheme which you have suggested, of the Sheriff-principal sitting with two substitutes, to the Sheriff-principal sitting with another Sheriff of equal status?—Upon the whole, I would. I think, practically, it would work better.

5877. Don't you think you might get into this difficulty, that you would have cases where the judgment of the Sheriff-principal and one of the substitutes would be overruled by that of two substitutes?—Certainly you might; but it is hardly possible to figure a court of appeal in which there might not be a result of that kind, when you reckoned up the whole number of judges who have given an opinion upon the case.

5878. Mr. Baxter.—Taking the appeal to two Sheriffs, the judgment would be two to one?—Yes.

5879. But according to your suggestion it might be two to two?—Yes.

5880. Don't you think it would be better to have two sitting in the appeal court instead of three?—I think it would be an advantage to have, as two members of the court, judges engaged in the actual taking of evidence, and in the other details of the office of Sheriff-substitute, which the Sheriff-principal does not take part in.

5881. Do you think it would give satisfaction to have a judgment by two to two?—It might or it might not. It would depend, to a great extent, on the reasons by which the judgment was supported.

5882. Sir E. Colebrooke.—On the whole, you attach importance to having a tribunal consisting of three judges?—Yes.

5883. And you think it would give perfect satisfaction if the two judges, in addition to the Sheriff, were Sheriff-substitutes of Glasgow?—I believe it would. Of course I speak only for Glasgow. As to how such a court might be organized elsewhere, I cannot venture to give an opinion.

5884. Do you confine your remark to the substitutes of Glasgow, as distinct from the middle and upper wards of Lanarkshire?—The cases from the middle and upper wards of Lanarkshire are argued and disposed of by the Sheriff at Glasgow.

5885. The Sheriff-substitutes of the middle and upper wards are Sheriffs for the whole county. Do you mean that the Sheriff-substitutes, in the appeal tribunal which you have suggested, should be taken from the city of Glasgow only, or from the whole body of the Sheriff-substitutes of Lanark?—They might be taken from the whole body.

5886. That is to say, the tribunal might be composed, from time to time, of Sheriff-substitutes taken from the county, and not of any two of them named specially?—Yes.

5887. Mr. Baxter.—Have you thought how the appeal court might be strengthened in other places than Glasgow, where there are not so many Sheriff-substitutes?—Any views I might state on that subject are purely speculative, and entirely my own. Hitherto I believe I have been speaking the mind of the profession in Glasgow. As to other places, it might be arranged by combinations of counties—making such combinations as would admit of a larger salary being given to the Sheriff-principal, so that you would be entitled to demand a larger share of his time.

5888. The Chairman.—If you gave him a larger district, you would aid him in disposing of appeals by allowing two of the substitutes of that larger district to sit along with him?—Yes.

5889. Mr. Baxter.—It has been proposed that the Sheriffs should be grouped into appeal courts of two, to review the substitutes' judgments?—I believe that would be a considerable improvement.

5890. In other places than in Glasgow?—I don't say that that would not command the confidence of the public even in Glasgow; but the scheme which I have suggested, and which has been suggested by our committees, appears to me to be better. What you are suggesting may be second best.

5891. Sir E. Colebrooke.—You attach great importance to the present appeal to the principal Sheriff?—Very great.

5892. Are the cases usually very carefully considered by the Sheriffs-substitute?—Yes; we don't complain that they are not carefully considered by the Sheriffs-substitute. Still we consider that a cheap and rapid right of appeal is necessary, or at all events desirable: first, as a check on the judge of the first instance, and as a stimulus to zeal and care on his part; second, the appeal judge has the advantage of the analysis of the facts and views of the law contained in the interlocutor of the judge of the first instance; and third, and perhaps beyond the other reasons, the first discussion and the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute tend to clear away irrelevancies, and to present the real questions for decision to the minds of the parties and their procurators, as well as of the appeal judge. In short, we consider that the second discussion is even more valuable than the second decision.

5893. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think the Sheriff-substitute has some advantages,—in the taking of the proof, for instance?—Yes; he has the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses.

5894. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Do you consider that those advantages which you have just stated would not be secured by a direct appeal to the Court of Session?—No; because the expense of an appeal to the Sheriff is a very small matter. At the utmost it can hardly exceed in any case £5, taking the costs of both sides into account; whereas the expense of an appeal to the Court of Session will probably, taking the costs of both sides into account, in very few cases be lower than ten times that amount, or £50, because a great many expenses are necessarily incident to the one which are not incident to the other.

5895. In the Sheriff Court is the expense of the appeal caused by written pleadings, or is it confined to the fees of the practitioners?—In our court, written pleadings—reclaiming petition and answers before the appellate judge—are practically unknown.

5896. It is done entirely by oral hearing?—Entirely.

5897. Does the Sheriff-principal ever direct new evidence to be taken?—I believe that in a few cases he has done so.

5898. But in the great majority of cases it is confined to a hearing of the parties after the Sheriff has made himself master of the proceedings in the lower court?—Yes.

5899. Supposing there were a cheap appeal to the Court of Session, don't you think that more frequent appeals would be made direct to it?—Of course it would be so; but I believe it is impracticable to reduce the expense of appeals to the Court of Session to anything approaching the cheapness of the appeal from the one Sheriff to the other.

5900. There are at present very few appeals to the Court of Session?—Yes, comparatively few.

5901. But they have increased to a certain degree under the late Act?—They have.

5902. Have you any information as to the extent to which they have increased?—I speak from memory, and I can hardly commit myself to any figure; but if my memory serves me right, they are at least doubled, if not more.

5903. Mr. Paterson.—You speak now of cases in which notice of appeal only has been given. You have not experience of how many of these have been carried through?—I speak of cases in which appeal has been noted.

5904. Mr. Baxter.—Do you mean that the appeal has actually been entered, or that notice of appeal has been given?—The actual entering of the appeal is by writing on the interlocutor sheet, in a few words, that the party appeals.

5905. Lord Barcaple.—That is no evidence that any step has been taken in the Court of Session at that time?—No.

5906. Sir E. Colebrooke.—With regard to the appeals to the Sheriff-principal, do many of them consist of matters of form, such as setting right some error on the part of the Sheriff-substitute?—A good many turn on points of form.

5907. That makes it a matter of great importance that the present cheap and easy appeal should be maintained?—Yes.

5908. And you entertain no fear that if there was a tribunal such as you propose, the proceedings would be rendered more expensive by the employment of counsel?—It is competent to employ counsel now.

5909. But do you think there would not be a desire to employ counsel more frequently?—I can hardly express an opinion on that subject.

5910. You stated that the subject had been long under the consideration of the body to which you belong. They have given an opinion on the subject more than once, have they?—They have.

5911. Have you with you the statement which they have circulated on the subject?—I have not; but I can procure a copy, and transmit it to the secretary.

5912. But it is a matter which has been long deliberated upon by your body?—Yes.

5913. Has their decision been a pretty unanimous one?—I believe on that subject it was absolutely unanimous.

5914. Were you present at former meetings when the subject was discussed?—At many of them. I believe I was a member of the committee. Indeed, on the occasion on which it was most elaborately gone into, and a long report drawn up, I recollect that I was a member of the committee.

5915. And that report was agreed to unanimously?—Unanimously, I believe.

5916. Mr. Adam.—Have the Sheriff-substitutes in Glasgow more experience in business than the other Sheriff-substitutes in Lanarkshire?—Necessarily they must, during the period of their service as Sheriffs-substitute.

5917. They have a greater quantity and a greater variety of business passing through their hands?—Necessarily they must have.

5918. Would it be desirable that the judgments of these Sheriff-substitutes should be subject to review by the other Sheriff-substitutes of Lanarkshire?—Although nominally the arrangement of the appellate judges might throw the office open to the other judges, so as not to throw any slight on them, or put them on an unequal footing, practically it would always be the Glasgow substitutes who would sit, I imagine, except in a case of emergency, at all events in Glasgow cases. But in point of fact one of the country substitutes does regularly sit in a Small Debt Court in Glasgow.

5919. If the time of the Sheriff-substitutes in Glasgow was very much occupied, do you not think it might happen that Sheriff-substitutes in the country, who were not so much occupied, might be taken in as appeal Sheriffs?—It might be so.

5920. And that would not be satisfactory?—It might or it might not. It depends on the gentlemen who hold these offices.

5921. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Was the proposal formerly made by your body exactly the same as that which you now suggest, namely that the Sheriff-principal shall have the assistance of two substitutes?—I believe it was.

5922. Was it not that he should have the assistance of Sheriffs of other counties?—Not as to Lanarkshire. I believe the plan formerly suggested was that the smaller counties should be grouped, but that Lanarkshire, and other counties similarly situated, should be kept separate.

5923. Could the work to come before the Sheriffs be done as efficiently as at present, supposing this court were established, without some increase of their number? If some of the substitutes were taken from their present duties to act in the court of appeal, would it require some addition to the number of Sheriffs?—Perhaps an additional Sheriff might be necessary; but I don't think it.

5924. At present they have to give their whole time to get through their work: their work is very heavy?—The work is heavy, certainly.

5925. Mr. Paterson.—Do you think the Sheriff-substitutes in Lanarkshire are over-worked?—No, I do not think they are. I don't think they are harder worked than the average of professional men.

5926. You think the experiment might be tried of giving them additional duties as members of a court of appeal; and if the result showed that the work was too heavy, you think an additional Sheriff-substitute should be appointed?—Yes.

5927. Mr. Adam.—Was the scheme of having another Sheriff of equal status with the present Sheriff-principal, as an appeal tribunal, considered by your body?—Yes; I may say that it was. I don't know whether it was formally considered, that is to say, whether anything was minuted on the subject; but I believe it was a subject of conversation at the meetings of committee.

5928. As a possible scheme?—As a possible scheme.

5929. Mr. Harrison.—Do you think it would be desirable, in any class of cases, to make the decision of the Sheriff-principal, with the assistance you propose to give him, final?—Perhaps there are some classes of cases in which it might be proper to do so; but that is really a question to which I cannot say that my mind has been directed. But one class of cases occurs to me just now, viz. cases of affiliation and aliment of illegitimate children, cases of which kind, turning on mere questions of fact, and seldom involving questions of law,—in these the decision of such a court as that might be declared final. However, I would not desire to commit myself to an opinion to that effect.

5930. The cases I was referring to are cases where the value in dispute is of small amount?—Nominal value is often a very deceptive test of the real interest at stake.

5931. Lord Barcaple.—There is at present finality at £25?—Yes.

5932. Does that include a large number of the causes brought in your court?—Not very large.

5933. You said that at present the time of the Sheriff-substitutes in Glasgow is very fully occupied?—It is fully occupied.

5934. Do you think that the present staff could possibly carry on the appeal business upon the footing that you have recommended?—Well, I think they could. I think there are a good many matters of office arrangement and detail by which a considerable saving of the time of the Sheriff-substitutes could be effected.

5935. I suppose the appeal court would necessarily occupy a very large amount of time over the whole session?—I should say that one day a week would do. The Sheriff-principal at present has two days a week; but what I contemplated was, that the appeal upon merely interlocutory judgments should be heard, as at present, by the Sheriff sitting alone; so that the proposed court would only be occupied with final judgments on the whole cause.

5936. How do you propose that the opinions of the appeal judges should be announced?—Of course there must be an interlocutor signed by the Sheriff.

5937. That is the formal judgment; but how do you propose that the opinions of the individual judges shall be announced, and the grounds of their judgment?—In the general case, in a note to the interlocutor, leaving it, however, to the judges, when they thought proper, from the nature of the case, to express their opinions orally from the bench.

5938. Then you would expect that, in the general case, there should be a note prepared by one of the judges?—Yes.

5939. Suppose the court not to be unanimous, how would you suppose the matter would be then?—It would be done by one of the judges selected by the majority.

5940. But would the dissentient judge also, according to the expectation of your committee, indicate his opinion in a separate note?—No.

5941. Where the opinions were given orally from the bench, do you anticipate that there would be any system of law reporting by which they would be preserved and made available, either to the parties or to the Court of Session, in the event of the case going there?—That is a matter which I have not considered.

John Naismith.

5942. Have you considered whether there might not be a good deal of difficulty and delicacy found in the preparation of a note stating the opinions of the court?—Of course there would be a certain amount of difficulty, as there always is, in deciding a case of difficulty; but I don't suppose it would be greater than in the case which frequently occurs, where a judge of the Supreme Court in Scotland delivers the judgment of the court.

5943. That is a case where the judges have found that their views were entirely coincident?—Yes.

5944. But where their views are not entirely coincident, although leading to the same result, do you think that it could be conveniently and systematically recorded in a note?—Where there was a difference of opinion or a difference of reasons, although arriving at the same result, each judge might give a separate note.

5945. Then you would rather anticipate that the system of notes in one form or other must continue?—I should think so.

5946. Is there a very large proportion of the causes in the court at Glasgow which depend upon evidence taken in the cause?—Of course there is a very large proportion.

5947. Can you give me any idea whether in your court the number is large in proportion to causes in general?—That is to say, questions turning upon evidence rather than upon law?

5948. Yes; where there are disputed facts cleared up by evidence taken in the cause?—Considerably more than one half of the whole cases.

5949. In those cases in which proofs are taken, is there a very large proportion of them in which, after the proof is taken, there really remains a matter of dispute about the fact, or is there a very considerable number of them in which the taking of the proof explains the facts so as to leave no real controversy?—Both classes are pretty numerous.

5950. Mr. Campbell.—Is the profession in Glasgow on the whole satisfied with the mode in which the evidence taken in the Sheriff Court is recorded?—In one sense they are. We are generally pleased with the result; but the way in which it is taken occasions occasionally considerable delay, and I shall revert to that in speaking of the procedure.

5951. Lord Barcaple.—In the causes which come for advocation to the Court of Session from Glasgow, and where the advocation is really prosecuted, do you find that the bringing of the advocation depends mainly upon the serious value of the suit?—In most cases it does. In others, of course, it depends considerably upon the temper of the litigants.

5952. You have cases of large amount in your court?—Yes.

5953. Occasionally cases involving directly thousands of pounds?—Yes.

5954. Do you find that cases of that sort, as an almost invariable rule, go to the Court of Session?—On the contrary, it is seldom that that class of cases go there.

5955. Can you explain that?—These cases are generally more thoroughly dealt with in the Sheriff Court than cases where a smaller amount is at stake; and, I believe, from the thorough investigation of the facts, both on the part of the procurators employed and of the judge, matters of fact are cleared up, and matters of law are discussed in such a way as to satisfy both parties, one way or other.

5956. Probably in that class of cases also it may pretty generally happen that the parties interested are parties of a superior position and superior intelligence?—It may be assumed that the parties interested in such cases generally are so.

5957. And therefore they come to recognise the fact that the true merits of their case have been ascertained?—Yes.

5958. Mr. Paterson.—Your theory of the appeal court is, that it should apply only to judgments of the Sheriff-substitute on the merits?—Yes.

5959. You would propose that all incidental interlocutors should be reviewed, as at present, by the Sheriff-principal alone?—Exactly.

5960. Might not a hardship arise in some instances, that is assuming your appeal court to be the better of the two, where the interlocutor involved the maintaining or the dismissing of the action?—Of course, where it involves the dismissing of the action it is the end of the cause, and is a final judgment. And as to the sustaining of the action unduly, which is the case you put, or other similar judgments, you have just a choice of inconveniences. It is impossible to devise a court of appeal which shall be absolutely perfect.

5961. You used the expression, 'interlocutors on the merits,' and it was that which I wished explained?—I meant final judgments.

5962. What is your opinion as to making the Sheriff-substitutes in other counties than Lanark members of the appeal court?—The suggestion which I made, I think, was, that by grouping the counties an arrangement similar to that suggested for Glasgow might be made in other districts. But that was a mere suggestion. I put the case for Glasgow on entirely independent grounds. It is as well that uniformity should be preserved if it can be preserved; but if an improvement can be got for the court of so extensive a city as Glasgow, and county as Lanarkshire, I don't think it should be objected to merely because it introduces a court differently constituted from the courts for the other counties of Scotland. In short, utility should not be sacrificed to uniformity.

5963. Mr. Baxter.—Would you not prefer an appeal court consisting of two principal Sheriffs, in other counties than Glasgow, to a court consisting of a Sheriff and his substitute?—I think that the latter probably, even for the other districts of Scotland, would be preferred; but I defer to the judgment of those better acquainted with these other districts.

5964. The Chairman.—As, for instance, if three counties were grouped together, that the Sheriff, who is the Sheriff of these three counties, should have the assistance of the Sheriff-substitutes of two of them?—Yes.

5965. Mr. Paterson.—Would you explain a little more fully the grounds of your hesitancy about the Sheriff-substitute of the upper and middle wards of Lanarkshire being eligible as members of the appeal court? The cases in these two wards are not of the same importance generally?—They are not of the same importance; and there is another circumstance, viz. that we in Glasgow have a large class of cases in which, as yet, they can have had no experience,—for example, maritime cases,—the Sheriff-substitute of an inland division of the county can have no practical experience in these cases.

5966. The character of the cases in the two upper wards is materially different from those in the lower?—Of course the lower ward embrace cases of the same class as the others; but it embraces numerous cases of other classes.

5967. Are there in the two upper wards cases of the same commercial character that you have in Glasgow?—Rarely. But we have cases of importance,—commercial cases connected with the mining interests often there.

5968. However well qualified the Sheriff-substitutes at Lanark, Airdrie, and Hamilton might be, you would hesitate about making them eligible as members of the appeal court?—There would be a difficulty about that, certainly,—at all events at first. After new appointments came to be made, and judges were appointed with the view of taking their share in the appeal court, the same objection might not apply; but the gentlemen who have long held these situations, can of course have had no experience in the class of cases to which you allude.

5969. Mr. Campbell.—But if the Sheriff-substitute at any of these three places was a competent lawyer when appointed, and sat habitually in the appeal court, would he not become as competent an appellate judge as any other Sheriff-substitute?—Certainly; and that was what I pointed at in my last answer,—that when new appointments came to be made, the judge who was appointed would keep up his knowledge of these branches of law; but it would be rather too much to expect that gentlemen who have held for twenty or thirty years the situation of Sheriff-substitute in the inland counties, should have kept up their reading of branches of law which could never by any possibility come before them.

5970. Mr. Paterson.—You said that the Sheriff-substitutes' time at Glasgow might be economized by some office details and arrangements: will you explain what these are?—There is one which I believe creates now a good deal of inconvenience and loss of time to every one, and that is, that the whole work is divided, as far as may be, equally amongst them; that is to say, that each takes his share of work of every description. Now I think their time could be considerably economized by appointing one of them to do such duties as taking prisoners' declarations, precognitions, granting pro forma warrants, proceedings under the Poor-law Acts, and matters of that kind. A great deal of time is lost by interruptions.

5971. At present the business is distributed without regard to its peculiar character or class?—Yes; substantially that is so. There are attempts made to classify, and to say that one Sheriff-substitute should take a certain duty for a particular day; but practically these rules are every day broken through, and great inconvenience is felt.

5972. The only classification you have just now is numerical?—Yes.

5973. Do you think it could be greatly improved and time saved were the cases classified?—Well, the classification would require to be very simple.

5974. Therefore it could be more easily made?—Yes. One Sheriff should be appointed to do routine and detail work. That should be done by the junior Sheriff-substitute, so that the time of the others might not be wasted by interruptions.

5975. The Chairman.—That might not improve his qualifications for sitting as a judge of appeal in the other class of cases?—No.

5976. But he, being the junior, might step on when his turn came?—Yes.

5977. Mr. Adam.—Do you think it would be satisfactory to take Glasgow by itself—to separate it from the rest of the county, and provide for it in that way?—So far as the rest of Lanarkshire is concerned, I don't think that the whole duties incumbent on the Sheriff are very serious. I don't think they take up any very large share of the Sheriff-principal's time.

5978. Mr. Campbell.—And the commercial interests of the whole of Lanarkshire are very much bound up with the transactions in Glasgow?—Yes; and the mining district, which is growing and spreading over the whole county.

5979. And also the manufacturing interest?—Yes. Of course the Airdrie district is completely joined with Glasgow in its interests, and the mining and public works are spreading now both into the Hamilton and Lanark districts.

5980. The same remark applies to Renfrewshire very much?—Of course it does.

5981. Sir E. Colebrooke.—The question as to the division of the county has been occasionally considered, has it not?—I believe it has; but more by the Commissioners of Supply or other county bodies than by us.

5982. You have not heard any complaint made as to the rest of the county being neglected in consequence of the Sheriff's time being absorbed by attention to cases in Glasgow?—No; I never heard any complaint of that kind.

5983. Nor that the Sheriff is at all overtasked to superintend the executive duties of his office in the rest of the county?—No; I cannot say I have ever heard that.

5984. Mr. Paterson.—The county is accessible in almost every direction by railways?—It is.

5985. The Chairman.—Would you extend the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court to any class of cases?—There are various classes of cases to which it might be extended. There is one subject which has been a good deal discussed, and I believe even bills have been brought into Parliament about it—viz. the extension of the Sheriff's jurisdiction to certain questions of heritable right. It is a subject that is very difficult to deal with. There is sometimes great hardship in the necessity for having recourse to the Court of Session in questions as to property of small value. On the other hand, it would appear anomalous to give jurisdiction to an inferior judge to dispose of a right to estates of miles in extent. Practically it is impossible to draw a line of demarcation between the two classes of cases, the one shading gradually into the other. The only suggestion which occurs to me is, that the pursuer might be allowed to bring his action in either court; but if the action be brought in the Sheriff Court, that the defender should be allowed at once to transfer it to the Court of Session if he sees fit. Things would thus in practice right themselves, and the cases appropriate to the Supreme Court would be at once transferred to it; in short, the provision proposed would in effect amount to this, that the parties might prorogate the jurisdiction of the Sheriff. On various previous occasions an attempt was to draw a money line; but the objection to that is, that in every case the question would arise, What is the value of the subject?

5986. Mr. Baxter.—You say that it is anomalous to allow the Sheriff to have jurisdiction in regard to large estates; but you give him jurisdiction to any extent in moveables. Where is the anomaly?—I did not say the Sheriff, but I said any inferior judge. I refer to matters affecting large territory, where the feeling, both in the profession and I believe out of it, would be against committing the jurisdiction to any court but a supreme court.

5988. Would there be any impropriety in giving the Sheriff jurisdiction to a large extent in regard to heritable subjects?—I would not see any impropriety in that; but the extreme cases which I looked at were cases in which large estates of very great extent, perhaps extending into several counties, might be involved, and which cases would be almost certain to go to the Supreme Court in the end.

5989. If the cases extended into several counties, you could not bring the action in one county?—Not at present; but I have a suggestion to offer upon that subject.

5990. I suppose you don't think any such case would be brought into the Sheriff Court naturally?—No; and that is what I meant to convey in my first answer, that between that class of cases and the smaller cases involving moderate amounts, you cannot draw a hard and fast line; but by some suggestion, such as I offer here, the thing might right itself.

5991. Why would you give the defender a privilege in regard to heritage which you don't give in regard to moveables?—Because prima facie I think the Supreme Court is the proper court for deciding questions of land; whereas prima facie I would say that in commercial questions the judge ordinary is the proper judge in the first instance.

5992. Why do you think the Court of Session is the only court for properly adjudicating on heritable rights?—I did not say it was the only court; I said that prima facie it appeared the most eligible; and I believe that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the country has always been mainly the jurisdiction which ruled questions of heritable right.

5993. Mr. Adam.—Supposing either party had a right to appeal from a final judgment in a matter of heritable rights, would the ultimate judgment of the Court of Session be affected by the fact that it had commenced in the inferior court? Would the record be deficient?—The record is frequently made up in the short form in the Sheriff Court.

5994. Is it not just a matter of the difference of expense?—Mainly it is so; and therefore I suggest this plan, by which I think matters may right themselves, and the cases appropriate to each court go to each.

5995. The Chairman.—There is such a power at present in a certain class of cases under the 40th section of the Judicature Act, by which a party may have his case removed to the Court of Session when a proof has been allowed?—That is for jury trial.

5996. Not necessarily to be followed up by jury trial; but that is so far a precedent for what you have suggested?—Yes.

5997. Sir E. Colebrooke.—That would take place at an earlier stage in the suit?—Yes.

5998. The Chairman.—Before any expense is incurred?—Yes.

5999. You think that the defender should have that right?—Yes.

6000. Mr. Paterson.—Is there not a considerable class of persons who prefer that cases of importance, whether heritable or moveable, should originate in the Supreme Court?—I have met gentlemen who take that view, but not frequently.

6001. You don't think it is a prevailing view?—I don't think it is in our community.

6002. Do you consider that questions of feudal law are better understood in the Parliament House, or at least that the lawyers there are more familiar with the practice of them than lawyers in the country?—Of course, seeing that at present the jurisdiction of the Court of Session in that class of cases is exclusive, it is to be expected that practitioners in that court should be more skilled in these particular questions.

6003. Do you attach any weight to the circumstance that you have a greater number of minds applied to cases of that character in the Supreme Court than in the Sheriff Court?—Of course both in the Supreme Court and Sheriff Court the judge of the first instance is one.

6004. Mr. Webster.—In the preparation of cases before you come to the judgment in the Court of Session, there are always at least two, the agent and the counsel, and it may be a senior counsel; is there any advantage, in your opinion, in having that sort of assistance in preparing cases for decision?—Of course there must be a certain advantage, and even a considerable advantage; but the question is, whether the public would prefer to want the advantage of many counsellors in order to get justice at a cheaper rate.

6005. Mr. Baxter.—That is not an advantage peculiar to cases relating to heritage?—No.

6006. Mr. Paterson.—You think, then, it might make a material difference if the procedure in the Court of Session were more economical?—Of course it might; but however much you might reduce the expense of procedure in the Supreme Court, litigation there must remain an expensive matter.

6007. Supposing the expense in the Court of Session, and the despatch, were made all you could wish, do you think the Sheriff Court would still be preferred?—You ask me to assume what can never be the fact. So long as the constitution of the court remains what it is, and the relations of counsel to agents, and of agents to country practitioners, you can never minimize the expense in the Court of Session so as to reduce it to anything approaching the expense in the Sheriff Court.

6008. You consider it needless to give an opinion on an assumption which you think impracticable?—It is quite impracticable.

6009. Mr. Baxter.—Are you not in the daily habit of dealing with difficulties of heritable title and conveyancing?—I cannot say that I am; my partners are.

6010. But the agents in Glasgow are?—Yes.

6011. And examining titles?—Yes.

6012. Mr. Webster.—Looking at the body of agents in Glasgow, or over the country generally, what is your opinion as to their capability of conducting all cases connected with feudal rights, without the aid of the bar, which is always had in Edinburgh?—I believe that they conduct, to the satisfaction of their clients and the community, the great bulk of the commercial litigation of the country; and if they are capable of doing that, I don't see any special difficulty in Scotch feudal law to render it a matter of impossibility or difficulty for them, when they have once fairly got into the system of it, to conduct the other class of litigations to which you point.

6013. My question had reference to the present state of matters,—whether, at present, the general body of practitioners in the Sheriff Court are, in your opinion, qualified to conduct difficult feudal cases, which in the Court of Session are practically conducted by counsel with the assistance of agents?—Of course I can speak only specially for our own body, and I don't see any difficulty in their doing so. They deal already with questions of at least equal difficulty and intricacy.

6014. Mr. Campbell.—And as conveyancers, they are intimately acquainted with the theory on which titles to land rest?—Yes.

6015. And they habitually prepare these very conveyances which would form the subject of discussion in questions of heritable right?—Yes.

6016. The Chairman.—Is there any other class of cases to which you think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff ought to be extended?—To consistorial cases.

6017. Of all classes?—Yes.

6018. Declarators of marriage and declarators of legitimacy?—Yes; subject perhaps, however, in these particular cases, to a similar safeguard to that which I suggested in the case of heritable property—viz. that if a defender objected to being brought into the Sheriff Court in an action of that class, he should have the immediate right to transfer it to the Court of Session.

6019. Mr. Baxter.—Supposing that a man prosecuted a divorce against his wife, and that she should take it to the Court of Session, do you think he should be mulcted in a sum to cover Court of Session expenses, when he was willing to be content with the Sheriff Court?—That is a hard case; but it is impossible to make a rule which would not involve the occurrence of hard cases.

6020. In humble life, when a case of divorce was brought by a husband, would you allow the woman the power to transfer it to the Court of Session?—That is a power which I should anticipate would be very rarely exercised in such cases as you suggest.

6021. Lord Barcaple.—Would you not be apprehensive that the paramour, who may be called as a co-defender, would suggest to the principal defender to take that course?—It might be so.

6022. Is there not a delicacy and a difficulty about that rule applicable to this class of cases, which did not apply to the class of cases which you formerly mentioned?—There certainly is; and therefore I make the suggestion with considerably more hesitancy in the case of divorce. There is one class of cases to which I think the jurisdiction of the Sheriff might be extended without any such provision at all, and that is actions of separation and aliment. The exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Session must in that class of cases very often operate as an absolute denial of justice; and in cases also where a deserted or ill-used wife is authorized to apply to the court for protection for her earnings against her husband or his creditors.

6023. Mr. Baxter.—Questions under the Conjugal Rights Act?—Yes.

6024. Protection to a wife's earnings, and provision to her in case of desertion?—Yes; in England magistrates have that jurisdiction, and it might safely be entrusted to the Sheriff.

6025. At present that can only be done in the Court of Session?—Yes; and that is practically refusing it altogether in the greater proportion of cases.

6026. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Is it within your experience that much injustice has arisen in consistorial cases from the want of a power to apply direct to the Sheriff Court?—In the cases of separation and aliment, the way in which the law is evaded in Glasgow is by raising an action which upon the face of it concludes only for interim aliment till the rights of parties should be determined by the sentence of a competent court. Of course that sentence is never pronounced, and in most cases the decree operates as an absolute decree for aliment.

6027. Mr. Baxter.—Have you been driven to that as an expedient?—Yes; I believe the agents for the poor raise hundreds of these cases in a year.

6028. Mr. Webster.—And practically they serve the purpose?—In some cases they do; in others they do not. It depends upon what defence is set up. If the husband is cunning enough to offer to receive his wife back into his house, of course they won't serve their purpose.

6029. The Chairman.—Would you extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to the appointment of judicial factors and factors loco tutoris?—Yes. We think that the local judge, familiar with local circumstances, is the proper person to appoint to these offices; and we occasionally find that the Supreme Court remits to the local judge to suggest a proper party, which is practically delegating their jurisdiction to him. Of course any appointment or decision of the local judge would be subject to the review of the Court of Session.

6030. Mr. Campbell.—How would you propose that factors loco tutoris should be controlled, in the event of their being appointed by the Sheriff?—They might either be controlled as at present, or they might be under the control of the Sheriff, as trustees in bankruptcy are to a considerable extent; but I prefer that they should be as at present.

6031. Lord Barcaple.—Would that imply that application for special powers should necessarily be made in the Court of Session?—No.

6032. Would you allow the application for special powers to be made in the Sheriff Court?—Yes.

6033. By 'control' you mean that in the event of there being any complaint, it should be made to the Court of Session; that is, I suppose, from the accountant being an officer of court?—Yes; and to prevent the possibility of appeals. In such a case as that, it would not be proper that the judgment of the court having control should be liable to be carried from court to court by appeals; and it is very important that, when the accountant makes a complaint, the court to which he complains should be in the position of stepping in peremptorily and saying what should be done.

6034. That is not a very frequent step of procedure, fortunately?—Fortunately it is not.

6035. How would you do as to the ultimate discharge of the factor?—That might be given by the judge who appointed him, on the report of the accountant.

6036. The Chairman.—Would you have the factor to account to the accountant of the Court of Session?—Yes, in the same way as a trustee in bankruptcy is subject to the control of the accountant in bankruptcy in Edinburgh.

6037. But you would have the factor to lodge his periodical accounts with the accountant of the Court of Session?—Yes.

6038. Mr. Webster.—Who would deal in the Sheriff Court with the matter of caution, which is dealt with in the Court of Session by the Principal Clerk of Session?—It could be dealt with by the Sheriff-clerk, who is probably in a better position to do it than the Principal Clerk of Session, knowing more of who are to be cautioners.

6039. Mr. Baxter.—The Sheriff-clerk adjusts bonds of caution now?—Yes.

6040. The Chairman.—Is there any other class of matters to which you would extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction?—There is that class of cases in which the jurisdiction of the Sheriff is excluded rather from the form than from the nature of the action, such as actions of suspension, actions of reduction, and the like. Of course, speaking of actions of reduction, I mean not actions of reduction of decrees in foro, or even decrees in absence in the Supreme Court; but actions of reduction of writings, or decrees of registration.

6041. Mr. Baxter.—And provings of the tenor?—Yes. These differ only in form from the classes of cases which the Sheriff at present disposes of.

6042. What do you say as to the jurisdiction against a foreigner, which is founded at present by warrant of the Sheriff Court?—As to jurisdiction in that way against a foreigner, there is a considerable anomaly about it altogether. A foreigner would decidedly object to be subject to the jurisdiction either of the Sheriff Court or of the Supreme Court; but I see no objection to extending the jurisdiction of the Sheriff Court to questions against foreigners generally, in the same way as it at present extends to jurisdiction against foreigners in maritime cases. The Sheriff already possesses that jurisdiction, and there can be no harm in extending it to other mercantile questions with foreigners, subject perhaps to power to the foreigner to advocate the case at once to the Court of Session, if he prefers doing so.

6043. Mr. Adam.—You say you would introduce reductions into the Sheriff Court. There are some cases of reduction which are tried by juries; would you propose to introduce jury trial into the Sheriff Court, or would that affect the question of introducing all reductions into the Sheriff Court?—What I pointed at was merely questions of a similar character to those involved in the generality of actions daily raised and disposed of in the Sheriff Court. The difference is only a difference in form; but perhaps you will be good enough to explain what class of actions you point at as those which must necessarily be tried by jury.

6044. Reductions on the ground of fraud?—I don't see why these should not be tried in the Sheriff Court without a jury, in the same way as other questions where allegations of fraud are made are tried there, without a jury.

6045. The Chairman.—Reductions on the ground of deathbed?—Yes, these also. That is a fact which it is generally pretty easy to ascertain.

6046. You would try them without a jury?—Yes. There is one class of cases in which a jury might be introduced with advantage in the Sheriff Court, and that is actions of damages for libel and slander, and perhaps actions of assythment, and actions of damages for personal injury.

6047. Mr. Webster.—For what reason would you introduce jury trial in these cases?—Because the verdict of the jury would seem to be the natural and the proper way of ascertaining the amount to be awarded to a party who has been injured in any of these ways.

6048. Do you find that juries, in assessing damages, give more satisfactory, or less satisfactory decisions than you get from the Sheriff in such questions?—I dare say the decisions of a Sheriff are likely to be more satisfactory to a neutral party looking on; but in that class of cases, I think the parties themselves are generally better satisfied by the verdict of a jury.

6049. The Chairman.—Do you think the defenders are better satisfied?—Both parties.

6050. Is it your view that both parties are better satisfied?—What I point at rather is, that parties in general look upon that as a natural way of deciding a question of the kind.

6051. It is not so very old an institution as to have become part of the nature of the people of Scotland?—No, it is not; but still the questions involved in cases of that kind are liker those involved in criminal matters, in which the people of Scotland have been accustomed to jury trial for ages.

6052. They have been accustomed, in criminal matters, to have the verdict of a jury as to the fact, but not as to the awarding of the consequences of it?—No.

6053. But this has reference to the consequences of the fact. Do you think that these things are better left to the general feeling of a number of persons than to one mind?—Yes.

6054. Would you apply that to other cases in which damage came to be assessed?—No; because in other cases you have generally got definite principles on which to proceed.

6055. You would extend the Sheriff's jurisdiction to the class of cases you have mentioned, and you would have them tried by jury; you would give the Sheriff power to try the cases with a jury?—Yes; and not necessarily a jury of 12.

6056. What number would you suggest?—Five or seven.

6057. Would you make any provision for a new trial in case the jury went wrong?—Yes; much in the same way as in jury cases in the Court of Session.

6058. Would you give power to the Sheriff to decide whether there should be a new trial?—Either to the Sheriff, or it might be done on a motion to the Inner House.

6059. How would you record the evidence so that it could be submitted to the Inner House?—By the Sheriff's notes.

John Naismith.

6060. In that case you would have the Sheriff sitting as a single judge, trying the question with a jury?—Yes.

6061. With a motion to the Inner House if there was any complaint that the verdict was against evidence?—Yes.

6062. And in the event of there being an objection to law laid down by the Sheriff, what would be the course?—The same.

6063. And as to a ruling in regard to evidence?—The same.

6064. Then you would try cases before the Sheriff and a jury, with a review of that kind by the Inner House?—Yes.

6065. Mr. Webster.—Should the jury be unanimous, or how would the verdict be given?—By a majority, after an hour's deliberation.

6066. Would you prefer a verdict by a majority of a jury of either five or seven on a question whether damages were due, and fixing the amount, to the decision of a judge?—I don't say that I individually would do so; but I believe litigants in such cases generally would have that feeling,—I mean before the verdict is pronounced. They might have another idea upon the subject afterwards.

6067. Does it not enter into the question whether there should be such a system, that there is a probability of the parties being entirely dissatisfied after the verdict?—It would be the same thing probably after the verdict, whether the verdict had been pronounced by the Sheriff disposing of the question of damages, or the jury doing it. I speak of the matter of confidence before the verdict.

6068. Mr. Baxter.—Without regard to the feelings of parties at all, do you think the case would be better adjudicated on by a jury or by the Sheriff?—In that class of cases it would be at least as well, if not better; because in such a matter a judge has no definite grounds or data to go upon; it must be in great measure a matter of feeling and discretion.

6069. Mr. Paterson.—From what class would you select the jury of 5 or 7? From the same class that juries of 12 are selected now?—Say 2 special and 3 common jurymen, or the same proportion out of 7—3 to 4.

6070. According to your theory, the verdict might go by the opinion of 3 out of a jury of 5, or 4 out of a jury of 7?—Yes.

6071. Have you any predilection as between the 5 and the 7?—Well, 5 would be cheaper than 7; but on the whole I would prefer 7.

6072. The Chairman.—As to economy, it would be cheaper to dispense with the jury altogether?—Yes.

6073. Mr. Paterson.—You have had experience in jury trials?—I am fortunate enough to say that I have not had very much.

6074. The Chairman.—You don't approve of jury trial except in cases of the class you have mentioned?—I do not.

6075. Mr. Paterson.—Don't you think there might be a risk, with so small a jury, of the result being arrived at rather through management than through the real justice of the case?—I don't see how that is likelier to happen with a small jury than a large one.

6076. You have more minds to convince with the large jury; perhaps that does not weigh in your view?—No; I think 7 is a sufficiently large number.

6077. The Chairman.—You say that lookers-on are generally better satisfied with the judgment of the Sheriff than with the judgment of a jury?—Yes.

6078. Does it not follow from that, that they think the Sheriff is right and the jury wrong?—Yes; but in cases of that kind, when it comes to be a man's own cause, somehow he has a predilection, generally speaking, for jury trial.

6079. If you are to yield to his predilection, why limit it to that class of cases?—Because it is only in that class of cases that this predilection exists.

6080. Mr. Webster.—Do you find that the predilection exists on the part of defenders, or mainly at least on the part of the pursuers, particularly in cases of personal damage from what may be called accidents and the like, involving matter of principle between master and servant, and such cases? Is it not the pursuer alone who has a predilection for a jury?—Generally speaking it is, and people of the same class as the pursuer: the people of that class would be satisfied with the verdict of a jury, where they would not be satisfied with the adverse judgment of a single judge.

6081. But do you not find, in practice, that in that class of cases verdicts of juries are often given in favour of the pursuer, and oftener set aside afterwards, than any decision by the Sheriff in similar questions?—It may be so; but I cannot pretend to have had any very great experience in that class of cases myself; and in speaking of them, I am speaking more of what I have gathered from others by conversation than from my own experience.

6082. The Chairman.—Have you any notion as to whether the judgment of a jury is considered wrong more frequently when it is given for the pursuer than when it is given for the defender, in the class of cases that you have talked of?—I should say most frequently when it is given for the pursuer.

6083. That is, the jury is more favourable to a pursuer than the public think right?—Yes.

6084. Sir Edward Colebrooke.—Do you think jury trial is a discouragement to entering causes in the Court of Session?—Probably it is, to some extent; or rather, I should say, it was so some years ago more than it is now.

6085. You have oftener been in favour of the judgment of the Sheriff as against that of a jury. Would not that equally apply to the judges of the Court of Session as against a jury—that your clients would prefer a judgment by the judges rather than by a jury?—And accordingly we find it is so.

6086. Therefore, if jury trial were restricted, the Court of Session would probably be more largely resorted to?—I understand it is, in practice, greatly restricted now. In very numerous cases, the evidence is now taken by a shorthand writer, while a few years ago there would have been trial by jury.

6087. The Chairman.—Do you understand that that economizes money?—I cannot tell. That is more a matter for persons connected with the court to state. I may say, however, that in the few cases I have had of that description, the costs have been very heavy, but then they were very heavy cases.

6088. Lord Barcaple.—Can you give us any idea of the relative heaviness of the costs as between that system of taking the proof, and taking the proof by commission, which prevailed formerly?—I really cannot.

6089. You said that you think the pursuers, in the main, in a certain popular class of cases, are more in favour of a jury, and the defenders rather dislike juries?—Yes.

6090. Is it not odd, in that state of matters, that the existence of jury trial in the Court of Session should discourage cases coming into the Court of Session, seeing it is the pursuer who must necessarily choose his court?—That applies only to that class of cases.

6091. And that is a considerable proportion of the cases tried by jury?—I believe so.

6092. In regard to cases of a different kind, which have not that element of popularity in them, do you think that the parties are more satisfied with the opinion of a jury, or with the opinion of the court—cases of breach of mercantile contract, for instance?—In that class of cases, I think the parties are better satisfied with the judgment of the court.

6093. And in cases as to the obtaining of contracts or other deeds by fraud, do you think that the parties are better satisfied with the court, or with the jury, as deciding upon the existence of a fraud?—These cases are not so very numerous as to give one any very definite data to proceed upon, but I should think the parties would be as well satisfied at least with the judgment of the court as with that of any jury.

6094. Is there any class of cases that occurs to you, in which you think there are good grounds for preferring the determination of a jury to the determination of the court?—In that class of cases to which I have alluded, when there are no precise grounds on which a judge can proceed in forming his opinion, and where he must decide just according to his own views of what is right, it really does seem that the verdict of a jury, as representing what might be assumed as the opinion of an average of mankind as to what was right in the circumstances, might be said to be the most proper way of settling such a matter.

6095. Do you confine that to the assessment of damages? Are there not matters of absolute fact where the question is indefinite, as to which you think the same principle would apply?—No. I do confine it to these cases.

6096. Are you aware that the local courts in England assess damages with the aid of a jury?—Yes; I believe they do.

6097. Mr. Webster.—But with the fact first ascertained that there is liability, the jury having nothing to do but fix the amount?—Yes.

6098. But your principle is to leave it to the jury to ascertain liability, and also to fix the amount?—Yes.

6099. Mr. Paterson.—You think that the value of a jury in assessing damages in the class of cases you mention is this, that they in some measure reflect the feeling or opinion outside; and you think they are better qualified in that respect than a single judge to say what the amount of the damages should be; but suppose you had a very limited jury of five or seven, do you think that would be a safer tribunal for assessing the damage?—I think it would be equally safe with a larger jury. You would have the disadvantage of having fewer minds applied to the case, but you would have the advantage of the fewer minds being directed to the facts with a deeper feeling of responsibility.

6100. Mr. Webster.—Would you withdraw from the jury the question of liability, or would you have that fixed first, and leave to the jury only to assess the damages, as is done in England sometimes; or would you prefer to leave the jury to fix the liability, and also to assess the damages?—I would prefer the former course, but for the fact of its involving the necessity of two inquiries.

6101. Where liability is denied, your opinion is, that the question of liability should be decided by the court, if that did not involve a separate investigation?—Yes.

6102. The Chairman.—You spoke of another class of cases?—There is a provision which has crept in, I believe, by mistake or accident into the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. Previous to that Act the Sheriff had jurisdiction in salvage cases to any amount, as he had in other maritime causes; but the 460th section of that Act makes the jurisdiction of the Court of Session privative in cases above £200. It does so in the shape of conferring jurisdiction upon the Sheriff, if I recollect rightly. It has evidently been in the mind of the framer of the Act that he was conferring a power on the Sheriff which he had not before; but instead of doing that, it restricts the Sheriff's jurisdiction to the same extent as that of Justices of the Peace—to £200 in salvage cases.

6103. Mr. Campbell.—You think there is no principle for that?—No; and I believe it has crept into the Act by a mere mistake. Then, if the diligence of inhibition on the dependence of costs is to be kept up, I do not see any reason why, instead of raising the action in the Sheriff Court, and passing signet letters for inhibition, a warrant to inhibit should not be included in the Sheriff Court summons, in the same way as it now is in a Court of Session summons.

6104. The Chairman.—The inhibition being recorded?—Yes; the only difference would be, that it would save the expense of passing the letters of inhibition under the signet.

6105. Mr. Paterson.—Do you think additional facilities ought to be given for the use of that diligence?—That is more a social question. I have not considered it in that point of view.

6106. I suppose there are instances where you have known inhibition and also arrestment to found jurisdiction against a foreigner used oppressively?—I have; and I have also known instances where in no other way could payment of a just debt have been got.

6107. The Chairman.—But the question is not quite irrelevant to the present inquiry, because you are going to give a greater facility for the use of inhibition. Now that suggests the propriety or expediency of doing so?—It is merely a pecuniary facility.

6108. But it is a facility?—Certainly.

6109. Mr. Webster.—If you were to obtain that facility, what facility would you afford for getting rid of such inhibitions? Would you confer on the Sheriff a power to recall?—Certainly, in the same way as he has power to recall an arrestment.

6110. Mr. Paterson.—Have you considered the question whether inhibition is a diligence that ought to be allowed at all on the dependence, or rather a diligence that ought to be confined to the case where there has been a final judgment?—I cannot say that I have considered that question so maturely as to warrant me in stating an opinion.

6111. Lord Barcaple.—Do you conceive inhibition to be in any way a more oppressive diligence than arrestment?—In this way, that it affects the whole heritable estate of the party, whereas arrestment merely affects a particular fund.

6112. But does it not affect the whole available fund?—It may do so by accident, but inhibition necessarily does so.

6113. Is it not common to arrest money in bank, which may be all that a party has available for his subsistence?—Yes, there are certainly many cases in which the diligence of arrestment operates harshly.

6114. But the Sheriff has power to recall the arrestment, or to restrict it, and you would give him the same power in regard to inhibition?—Yes.

6115. Mr. Paterson.—In cases of arrestment, would you approve of the schedule of arrestment being served upon the debtor, as well as laid in the hands of the arrestee? Should he not have notice of it?—It is desirable that he should have notice certainly; but practically, I suspect, he generally hears of it soon enough—the debtor generally hears soon enough that his funds are arrested.

6116. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion?—Not under that general head.

6117. Mr. Paterson.—Would you approve of actions being served at the commercial domicile of a debtor, as well as at his residence?—Yes, where he has such.

6118. Mr. Baxter.—Where he has a known fixed counting-house?—Yes, a counting-house of his own—not a place where he is merely a clerk or servant.

6119. The Chairman.—But where he is a partner?—Yes.

6120. Lord Barcaple.—May there not be many cases where it is difficult for the public to know that he is a partner? His name may not appear in the firm?—I apprehend Mr. Paterson's question went merely to this, not that that should be substituted for service at the domicile, but that where it was more convenient, the pursuer should have the option of doing so. Therefore it gives him an additional facility.

6121. Have we not had quite a sufficient number of grounds for technical objection to service of summonses? His name may not appear in the firm, but it may be that his name does appear in the firm; and he has transactions in the ordinary course of life with thousands of people that don't know of the existence of the firm?—The question, as I understood it, and the understanding on which I answered it, was, whether an additional facility should be given to a pursuer of calling a defender into court by serving the writ or summons at his place of business, instead of at his dwelling-house, thus giving the pursuer the choice of which plan he should adopt.

6122. Mr. Paterson.—Supposing the common case, that a man is sued upon a transaction entered into at

John Naismith.

Glasgow, where he carries on trade, and that that man has his domicile at a distance of two miles, in Renfrewshire, would it not be useful to make a citation at his counting-house in Glasgow lawful?—Yes.

6123. Mr. Baxter.—Or take the case of Dundee, where a number of the procurators live in Broughty Ferry and in Fifeshire, would it not be proper in a case of that sort?—Certainly.

6124. Mr. Webster.—Suppose a defender held a share in one of the banks?—That is the case of a joint-stock company. I mean the case of a private partnership.

6125. Take the case of a large private partnership, where I presume one or two partners take the active charge, the others taking no charge, and being seldom there; would you think it right to allow such parties, who might have places of business in another part of the world, and live in another part of the world, to be cited at the place of business of the company?—Yes; I think you may reasonably suppose that the partners would take care to communicate it. Certainly the risks of that are much less than the risks under the present system arising from lock-hole executions.

6126. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Do you disapprove of the lock-hole mode of serving?—Yes.

6127. What would you substitute for it, if a person has his house locked up?—Of course you cannot altogether dispense with some such system as a last resort. But it might be provided that, in place of serving the copy, whatever it might be, in the lock-hole of the door, that the pursuer should in the first place exhaust every other possible mode of service—for example, the mode of service suggested by Mr. Paterson,—and that where a lock-hole execution was resorted to, it should be necessary also that the pursuer or those representing him should send by post a notice that such and such a document had been served in such and such a way at the locked-up dwelling-house.

6128. The Chairman.—Mr. Webster's question, as I understood it, related to the case where the party had no lock-hole within the jurisdiction?—I think I said, and I certainly intended to say, that it might be reasonably expected that the partners of the firm would transmit the copy or give notice to their partner; and I added that a copy in that way was much more likely to find its way to the party for whom it was intended, than if left in the lock-hole of his dwelling-house.

6129. Do you think that where several parties are interested in a cause, and are to be made defenders, they should be brought within the jurisdiction of one Sheriff?—Yes; I see no reason why they should not; but I would suggest the same qualification that I suggested in the case of a question of heritable right, that any defender in such a case as that should have the right to carry the case immediately to the Court of Session, in place of stating a defence.

6131. Have you any suggestion to make as to pleadings and procedure?—Yes; I may say that at Glasgow we have found, generally speaking, the procedure under the Sheriff Court Act, 1853, exceedingly satisfactory; but there are one or two matters which may be amended. The first is the form of the summons, on which the ground of action is stated in the conclusion. Now this seems illogical and clumsy, and it makes it very difficult indeed to state the case in many instances; in short, I see that some gentlemen adopt this sort of form—the summons runs in this way: that the defender ought to be decerned to pay a sum of so and so for the reasons stated, and then they embody a condescendence in the conclusion. That has crept in as a very common practice, and it is almost necessitated by the form of summons.

6132. You don't approve of that form?—No; a very slight alteration would suffice, and make it run more in the form of a criminal indictment, stating the cause of action first, and the conclusion next.

6133. Mr. Webster.—Like the old Court of Session summons?—And like the old Sheriff Court summons prior to 1839.

6134. Mr. Paterson.—Have you any objection to put in a form of the short summons that you would suggest?—No; but it would just be the present summons transposed.

6135. Mr. Campbell.—Might it not be as convenient to put it, 'in respect of the schedule hereto annexed?'—Statements annexed in that way have a great tendency to become voluminous.

6136. The Chairman.—Have you anything to state as to the procedure?—On the defence being stated, the Sheriff-substitute should have power either at the same diet, or a subsequent diet, when necessary, to minute a reply by the pursuer to meet any separate case set up by the defender. Suppose the defence is compensation, he should have an opportunity of stating a short reply.

6137. Lord Barcaple.—Have you found, in practice, the want of such an opportunity?—Yes, in this way, that it often necessitates orders being pronounced for condescendence and defences which might otherwise be avoided. Then, third, the power to amend the summons and record should be granted subsequent to such conditions as to expenses as may be just.

6138. Mr. Campbell.—You mean, should be granted to the Sheriff-substitute?—Yes; and the result of its non-existence at present, that occasionally a good deal of procedure takes place, and then an appeal is taken to the Sheriff, and a motion is made to him to have the record opened up, and an amendment made, and very frequently that affects the intervening procedure. Fourth, I think that documents not specially referred to in the record should be allowed to be produced after the record is closed; but on the condition of paying expenses if any, or such other condition as may be just. By expenses, I mean the expenses which the non-production at a previous stage may have occasioned the opposite party.

6139. Mr. Paterson.—You would not apply that to documents which were under the control of the party?—Oh yes.

6140. Mr. Webster.—And withheld on purpose?—I don't propose that absolutely, but that it should be allowed under such conditions as may be just as to payment of expenses or otherwise.

6141. Lord Barcaple.—Do you propose that the judge is to have a discretion in that matter?—The parties to have an absolute right to produce the documents; but the judge is to say on what terms. The extreme of these terms would be, that he would allow them to be produced on payment only of all previous expenses. In such a case as Mr. Webster points at, that would be the result, whereas he might allow it to be produced in other cases on payment of nominal expenses.

6142. Mr. Webster.—I was not pointing at the expense; but that the defender, seeing the case which the pursuer had made on one set of documents, makes his case in one way; whereas if the pursuer had made his case on the documents which he ultimately founds on, the defender would have made his case in an entirely different way,—is it fair to the defender to give the pursuer an absolute right or power of that kind?—You put a very strong case, and one amounting to something very closely approaching fraud on the part of one of the parties.

6143. Mr. Paterson.—But put the milder case, that the court was satisfied that the production of the document after the record was closed was equal to a surprise, would you give him power to reject the document?—No; in such a case I think a fair application of the rule would be to allow production of the document; but only upon a payment of all previous expenses, and of course to open up the record, and enable the other party to put on the record any such statement as might be called for under the circumstances.

6144. Would not the risk of all that be obviated under the present rule, that a litigant having documents under his own control, and intending to found on them in the suit, should put them in?—The difficulty is to ascertain what documents should turn out to be really necessary or useful for the purpose of the case. You must bear in mind that I point in this suggestion mainly to those cases in which the record is closed in the short form provided by the statute, that is to say, closed on the very day after the inducice expire by the statement of a short defence.

6145. The Chairman.—Would you confine it to that class of cases?—No, I would not.

6146. Mr. Campbell.—Are you aware that a change has been made by the recent Act, in the rule of the Court of Session, in reference to the production of documents?—I understand so.

6147. I suppose you think the same facility for production after the closing of the record should be granted in the inferior court which is granted in the Court of Session?—Yes, that is simply what I mean to say.

6148. You can see no distinction between the practice of the Supreme Court and the inferior court in that matter?—No.

6149. Sir E. Colebrooke.—And you think it should be a discretionary power?—Discretionary as to the conditions on which the exercise of the power is to be allowed.

6150. Do you apply that remark to the power of amending the summons?—Yes.

6151. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion to make upon that head?—The second matter as to procedure, which I was asked to call the attention of the Commission to, is the delay which sometimes occurs, particularly in our court, in the conduct of cases, and to notice that that delay is almost invariably occasioned by repeated adjournments of the diets of proof. There is no delay, or very seldom any delay, at any other stage. One cause of that delay is that, as it is interpreted at all events by our Sheriffs, the Sheriff Court Act of 1853 gives them no power to grant commission for the recovery of documents between the period when the record is closed and proof allowed, and the actual proof; the result of which is, that in very many, and these always important cases, the first diet of proof is occupied entirely, or almost entirely, as a diet for the examination of havers. We get, perhaps, a considerable time allowed us by the Sheriff-substitute for taking the proof. We cite a number of witnesses and havers to produce documents, and of course we take the production of the documents first. We find that they put in perhaps two, or three, or fifty, or sixty, or a couple of hundred documents,—letters, invoices, account sales, and the like; and of course you cannot proceed with the proof till these have been examined. The result is an adjournment. Therefore I would suggest that the Sheriff should have power, when allowing the proof, to grant commission and diligence to each party to recover the documents which he proposes to put into process.

6152. How would that save time and expense?—Because we could, in the interval between the date of the interlocutor allowing proof and the date fixed for taking the proof, recover under a diligence, and put into process, all the documents which were in the hands of havers, whereas now we recover them on the first day of the proof. They cannot then be examined; and the result is an adjournment till the Sheriff's next open day for a proof, which may be three weeks, and in some cases has been as long as two or three months after the original diet, the whole intervening time being filled up by other engagements.

6153. You would recover the documents between the time when the judgment is pronounced allowing a proof, and the time when the diet arrives for taking the proof?—Yes.

6154. Lord Barcaple.—Would you accompany that with a provision that the documents, when recovered, should be lodged some specific time before the date of taking the proof?—That might be desirable; perhaps three days before.

6155. Your object would not be fulfilled apparently, unless they were lodged so as to be seen by the opposite party?—No, it would not.

6156. Mr. Paterson.—The commission would be reported immediately, and the documents put into process, and be accessible to both parties?—Yes.

6157. Mr. Campbell.—Do I understand you to mean that the examination of havers, as a general rule, should not take place before the Sheriff-substitute himself, but before a commissioner?—Yes, that the Sheriff should have power to appoint a commissioner. If he has time to take the examination of havers himself, let him do so.

6158. Lord Barcaple.—But it is the main object of your proposition, that the opposite party shall see the documents before the proof comes on?—Yes.

6159. Which he would do if there is a day fixed for reporting the proof?—According to our practice, where a commission as matter of necessity is granted, it is made to be reported within a certain number of days or weeks.

6160. You would make it before the proof comes on?—A few days before the proof.

6161. Mr. Shand.—Under the present practice, do not the witnesses come to the first diets of proof when it is expected that documents are to be recovered?—They may or they may not come. If an agent knows beforehand that there is a large number of documents to be recovered, and that the time will be fully occupied in that way, he does not cite witnesses to come; but it more frequently happens that the agent calls for an extensive production, and he finds it more extensive than he expected, and that he cannot do justice to his case without looking over the documents. He has then to send away his witnesses, and get another diet of proof fixed.

6162. Is that a common occurrence?—Yes, it is a very frequent occurrence.

6163. In cases where there is not such a recovery of documents required, do the proofs go on continuously from day to day?—No; they can only be continued until the next open day.

6164. Have you only one day allowed for the proof?—Yes. In the first instance the procedure is this: Each Sheriff-substitute keeps a roll of diets to be fixed; that is called each court day; and he asks the procurators of the parties to say what they estimate as the probable time to be consumed in the proof. They say two, or three, or four hours, as the case may be, and the Sheriff gives them that time. If they exhaust that time, or if the diet is cut short in any way from an unexpected occurrence, he has to postpone it to the next day that he has convenient for taking the proof, which varies from a fortnight to upwards of two months.

6165. Is there any arrangement that you could suggest which would save that constant adjournment of proofs?—There is this suggestion, that in important cases, where the parties desired it, I would give the Sheriff-substitute power to dictate proof to a shorthand writer, instead of taking it in his own hand.

6166. That is, to shorten the time?—I don't think it desirable to make that compulsory in any case, or to give the Sheriff-substitute power to say, 'It shall be done;' but I don't think it would do any harm, and it might do great good, to give the Sheriff-substitute power, when both parties concurred in asking it, to dictate the proof in that way.

6167. Do you not think it could be arranged, that where a cause is in possession of the judge, it should go on continuously, and that any other business should stand over until he concluded the particular case, or that another of the Sheriff-substitutes should take it up?—I believe that is impracticable with us. There is such a number of witnesses who are required for these cases continually going on, that we could not get them to attend, or to wait on hour after hour in that way.

6168. Supposing there are twenty witnesses in attendance for a case to-day, and only ten of these are examined, could it not be arranged that the other ten should be taken to-morrow, and that any other business that the Sheriff-substitute had intended taking should stand over until he disposes of the case, he being in possession of the parties for that case?—No. The difficulty is, that the parties to the case the next day would just be thrown back in the same way. It would be merely shifting the inconvenience instead of remedying it.

John Naismith.

6169. Mr. Paterson.—And that would be after these parties had made their arrangements?—Yes.

6170. Mr. Shand.—Would that not be better than adjourning cases in the middle, or could not the evil be obviated by calling in one of the other Sheriff-substitutes to take the new case?—No; because the time of each is pretty fully occupied.

6171. Lord Barcaple.—And the next day does not mean the immediately following day?—No.

6172. But the next day for proofs?—Yes.

6173. Mr. Campbell.—In Glasgow it would be an equal chance if the next day was not the Sheriff's ordinary court day, or Small Debt Court day?—Yes.

6174. And neither of these courts could be taken for him by anybody without inconvenience?—That could not be done without throwing the arrangements into confusion. However, there is no doubt that adjournments are too frequent,—a great deal more frequent than they ought to be; and I believe one reason of that is, that adjournments, though they cause delay, really cause very little expense; the result of which is, both that the Sheriffs are apt to give the adjournment with consent, and the parties, or rather agents, are too apt to be good-natured, and to agree to adjournments of consent. Of course the charge for attending proofs is very low; and consequently, as a mere matter of expense, the cost of an adjournment is not great, but merely nominal.

6175. Mr. Paterson.—You mean that the agents have more lucrative business to attend to, and they unite in asking the Sheriff to adjourn the proof?—Well, it amounts to something like that in many cases, or one of them has that reason.

6176. And the other obliges him?—Yes.

6177. Mr. Shand.—Does the debate occur at the close of the proof?—The cases are exceptional in which it does.

6178. What is the usual interval between the close of a proof and the debate on the merits?—From three to ten days, I should say.

6179. Do you think that in many cases it might be possible to take the debate on the same day as the proof?—Oh yes; but I don't think that really causes any appreciable amount of delay.

6180. Mr. Webster.—Or expense?—There is no expense.

6181. Lord Barcaple.—Do you get the Sheriff's notes, and copy them before the debate?—Yes.

6182. The debate does not proceed on notes taken by the practitioners themselves?—No; in practice it does not, except sometimes in cases which are particularly urgent.

6183. And where you discuss it immediately at the end of the proof?—Yes.

6184. Mr. Shand.—In that case there is the additional expense of copies of the evidence?—That is always required for the debate before the Sheriff-principal; at all events, it is only got a few days or weeks earlier.

6185. And you find that all cases are appealed?—All cases are appealed. I have pretty extensive experience now, and I don't think I could find half a dozen cases that are not appealed.

6186. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestion to make?—I have to suggest that witnesses should be examined in open court in all cases. With us it is a matter of necessity at present, from the deficient court-house accommodation; but the practice has hitherto been to examine the witnesses in the Sheriff-substitute's chambers. The Sheriff sits at one side of the table, the witness opposite him, and the procurators on each side. Now I feel, and I believe indeed, and know that others have felt, that that is a practice which is indefensible, and that the examination of witnesses should be set about with somewhat more formality. Of course there is a number of witnesses that it does not matter how you set about their examination, because they will tell the truth. There are other witnesses who will tell what is not true, or what is convenient for them to tell, under any circumstances. But the greater number of witnesses it is desirable to examine with some degree of formality, and to put in a witness-box.

6187. Mr. Paterson.—Do you feel that you have more control of the witness in the box?—Yes.

6188. The Chairman.—I suppose no person is excluded from being present?—Nobody is excluded, but the size of the room is a practical exclusion.

6189. Mr. Campbell.—But the accommodation in Glasgow is about to be increased?—It is about to be increased; and it was with reference very much to that increase that I make this suggestion. Of course it would have been vain to have made the suggestion but for the hope of that increase of accommodation, because it could not have been practically carried out.

6190. Lord Barcaple.—Does the debate take place in court or in chambers?—In court.

6191. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion?—My next suggestion is, that reclaiming petitions and answers should be altogether abolished wherever there is a resident Sheriff.

6192. Resident Sheriff-principal?—Yes. Then I would suggest that no party appealing be allowed to object to the citation or execution; that is a provision of the recent Court of Session Act which should be extended to the Sheriff Court. There is also a provision in the Sheriff Court Act, to the effect that a cause shall fall if not moved in by either party before three months, and that it may be revived if moved in within three months further; but if not moved in within six months, it falls altogether. Now we object to that provision, as we find it practically operates as a sort of trap. A cause may be allowed for very good reasons to lie over for a period of months; it drops out of sight perhaps; and it is rather hard, after a great deal of expense has been incurred, to hold that it is to fall altogether, merely because the agent of one or other of the parties has not seen fit to make a pro forma motion in it once in three months.

6193. What is the remedy you suggest?—Just a simple repeal of that section.

6194. Do you think it would be expedient to allow the opposite party to move for the dismissal of the case, and to require the party who allowed it to stand over to show cause why he should have allowed it to stand over?—Such a proposal might be reasonable or judicious; but if both parties choose to allow a cause to stand over, I don't see why it should not be done.

6195. Lord Barcaple.—Would it not happen in many cases, that no cause could be shown why it should have lain over, and yet would it not be a misfortune that all that expense should have to be gone through again? He may have no cause to show, and yet it might be a great misfortune that the whole expense incurred in the litigation should be lost, and the parties obliged to begin de novo?—Yes; but it would be good cause to show that throwing the action out would be merely increasing expense to both parties, and doing no good to any one.

6196. You were asked whether it might not be well that the party who had not allowed it to lie over should move for its dismissal, but that the other party should be allowed to show cause why he had not moved in it?—But there must be two parties to allowing it to lie over: either party can move at any time.

6197. But one of them wishes to get rid of it altogether?—Then I would be inclined to ask why he did not move in it.

6198. Mr. Paterson.—Does it not come to this, that where the two parties, or even one of them, is in earnest about the case going on, the case can go on with perfect facility and despatch?—Certainly.

6199. So that you find no practical utility in this provision?—Certainly not.

6200. Mr. Webster.—Only mischief?—Only mischief.

6201. Mr. Paterson.—You must have experienced in not a few cases, that very good reasons existed in the interest of both parties for allowing a case to stand over—a compromise, for example?—Yes, in many cases you could not say that the party has been absolutely blameless, but he had a fair excuse. Take a case—the only case in which I ever was a sufferer myself—a case which had been judicially referred. The judicial referee was laid aside by illness, and during his illness the six months elapsed. I had not observed that fact, and we therefore lost the whole procedure. The case could not be revived even of consent.

6202. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion?—Nothing further about procedure in the Sheriff Court.

6203. Do you think that the number of appeals allowed from the Sheriff-substitute to the Sheriff in the course of the procedure is too great?—There are about five different stages at which appeals may be taken.

6204. Do you think that these could be reduced in number?—I don't think it would be judicious to do so. I think that they really tend to save time and to save expense.

6205. There is an appeal upon a preliminary defence, and there is an appeal upon the order for proof; do you think it would be expedient to delay the appeal on the preliminary defence until the order for proof has been pronounced, and then take up the two together?—It more often happens that these two orders are combined into one.

6206. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose that, having a resident Sheriff, you get your appeals very summarily disposed of?—Yes; it is seldom that a case is beyond a month.

6207. Mr. Webster.—And always on oral hearing?—Yes.

6208. Mr. Campbell.—I asked you before as to the amount of satisfaction given by the present method of recording the evidence taken before the Sheriff-substitute. Have you any remark to make on that subject?—No complaint.

6209. Do you think that, where the parties consented to it, it would be desirable that the Sheriff-substitute should have power to employ the assistance of a shorthand writer?—I have said so.

6210. Lord Barcaple.—Have you any impression as to the average number of appeals that may be taken in ordinary causes in your court? There is one on the final judgment. Is there generally one or more appeals taken, one case with another?—You might average them at two appeals altogether; but that is a very rough estimate.

6211. You think that would be a fair conjecture?—I think so.

6212. Mr. Shand.—Where delay is an object with the defender, do you find that he takes advantage of the power of appealing?—He does, in many cases.

6213. Appealing on a preliminary plea, and again on an order for proof?—In our practice the debate on the preliminary plea and the debate on what proof is to be allowed is one debate, so that there is just one interlocutor.

6214. And that upon the closed record?—Yes.

6215. The Chairman.—Have you any observations to make on the mode of bringing cases by appeal into the Supreme Court?—It could not be simplified more than it is probably, except that it has been suggested that a power might be given to the parties in an advocation, instead of printing a long record and proof, to state the facts, if they were agreed upon them, in a joint case. I have a further suggestion to make on this matter: by the recent Court of Session Act, the period within which a decree may be extracted is lengthened to twenty days; we consider that is too long, and that it should be reduced to six, or at most eight days.

6216. Mr. Paterson.—Supposing either of the parties to desire an opinion from Edinburgh, as to whether the case should be appealed, would not six days be too short a time?—Yes; but there is a much larger class of cases where the parties never dream of appealing at all, and where, notwithstanding, the pursuer is made powerless in that way not merely for twenty days, but for the period of the running of a charge, fifteen days afterwards. So that at present a Sheriff Court decree is not actually enforceable for thirty-five days after it is pronounced.

6217. Mr. Campbell.—Have you had much practice under the Certain Debts Recovery Act?—There has been a considerable number of cases brought in the Glasgow court, but personally I have not had much practice in them, though I have had a few cases.

6218. Do you think the operation of the Act has been satisfactory?—No; I should say it has not. It is an awkward combination of the ordinary court procedure, and of the Small Debt Court procedure. When the parties agree to take the decision of the Sheriff-substitute as final, and do not require him to take the evidence in writing, of course it is satisfactory: you get a more deliberate hearing than in the Small Debt Court, and you get an immediate and final judgment; but I have found that in a great majority of litigated cases the parties require the Sheriff-substitute to take the evidence in writing, the result of which is, that you have just to go through the procedure of the ordinary court, or very nearly so, with this disadvantage, that you are put into all sorts of corners, and treated as in a manner subordinate to the business of the ordinary court.

6219. And the agent conducting such a case, where the notes are taken down, though he has all the trouble of an ordinary action, is paid by a slump sum for the whole case?—Yes.

6220. The Chairman.—Is that mode of payment good in principle, in your opinion?—It is thoroughly bad in principle. In a few cases there may be a great overpayment, but in the general case the remuneration is on the very lowest scale. It can hardly be called remuneration for the time occupied.

6221. Then you object both to the principle and to the rate?—To both.

6222. Mr. Campbell.—Don't you think it has a tendency to make a busy man slur over his cases, when such a rule is applied as to remuneration?—It is hard to say that; but still there is no doubt that cases of the kind must be carried on to a great extent with a sort of grudge in a man's mind. Though he may conscientiously do his duty to his client, yet he feels that he is losing time.

6224. Mr. Adam.—Do you think the smallness of the costs under the Debts Recovery Act induces parties to bring actions when they would not otherwise do so?—I daresay it does. There must be a great many cases where decrees in absence are obtained in that court, which either would not have been brought, or the sum would have been reduced to £12, and the action brought in the Small Debt Court.

6225. Do you think the certainty with which the pursuer knows what he has to pay as costs induces persons to bring actions under that Act who would not otherwise do so?—That view of the matter has not occurred to me. I have not heard any one express an opinion on the subject. It may have a tendency in that way.

6226. Mr. Harrison.—Do you consider the procurator's fee for obtaining decrees in absence sufficient?—I really forget what it is.

6227. 7s. 6d. under £25, and 10s. above that?—Well, certainly that is inadequate.

6228. Is there much trouble to a procurator when decree is obtained in absence?—There may, or may not be. There is often a good deal of previous correspondence. Those cases under the Act which I have had, have been principally for clients in England, and I had often a good deal of correspondence before the case came into court.

6229. The Chairman.—And perhaps some investigation?—Yes.

6230. Mr. Paterson.—Even in moving for decree in absence, is not the detention considerable?—Yes.

6231. You may have to wait a two hours' proof in a previous case?—Yes; you have to wait till the case is called in the roll.

6233. Mr. Baxter.—Have you a satisfactory appeal under the Debts Recovery Act? There is no oral hearing?—Yes; we have an oral hearing.

6234. Under the Debts Recovery Act?—Yes; the

John Naismith.

Sheriff puts the case out for hearing as a matter of course. He is certainly not bound to do it, but I presume he is entitled to do it.

6235. The Chairman.—Does anything else occur to you about the costs of litigation in the Sheriff Court?—No. Perhaps it might be reasonable that the expense of necessary correspondence should be allowed as betwixt party and party. In short, one does not very well see how, as connected with the actual litigation from the commencement of a suit to the close of it, any distinction should be drawn betwixt legitimate expense as between agent and client, and as between party and party.

6236. By correspondence do you mean correspondence between the agent and his client?—Between the agent and his client, or any other parties with whom he may have necessarily to correspond.

6237. Have you any observation to make in regard to costs in cases appealed to the Court of Session?—The result of the present system simply is, that in all these cases the great bulk of the expense incurred in the country falls to be paid by the winning party to his agent in the country, under the name of extrajudicial costs. Under the present system, double agency is in no way recognised, or rather the services of the agent in the country are in no way recognised. The matter is dealt with on the assumption that the client himself corresponds with and employs the agent in Edinburgh; but of course, almost universally, that is not the fact.

6238. You think that the client is not fairly dealt with, inasmuch as he does not get the expenses of his country agent against the unsuccessful opponent?—Yes; I mean in those cases where the employment of the country agent was reasonable and proper.

6239. Mr. Baxter.—I suppose there are not many clients able to conduct their own cases?—Not many, and least of all those who fancy they can.

6240. Mr. Adam.—Do you think cases are kept from coming to the Court of Session by the mode in which country writers' accounts are taxed?—No, I cannot say that.

6241. Mr. Paterson.—I suppose you are aware that, in your own practice, if a client inclines to go to the Court of Session, you tell him that should he go there and win, he will have to pay something equivalent to a bonus, viz. your account?—Yes, of course.

6242. The Chairman.—The country agent, having the best opportunity of seeing and communicating with the client, could probably make his meaning more clear to the Edinburgh agent than he could do himself?—Yes.

6243. Have you anything to say as to the privileges of agents?—Nothing.

6244. Mr. Baxter.—Has your body an exclusive privilege to practise in Glasgow?—We have.

6245. What privileges has it?—The exclusive privilege of audience in all the courts held in Glasgow, under the reservation of the privileges of the Faculty of Advocates.

6246. What are the qualifications for admission?—They are the service of an apprenticeship—not necessarily to a member of our own body—and I think attendance as a clerk for one or two years, in addition to the apprenticeship.

6247. With whom?—With any practitioner.

6248. In Glasgow?—In Glasgow or elsewhere; and attendance in two separate sessions at any three classes of the Faculty of Arts—Logic being one of these classes,—and attendance on the classes of Scots Law and Conveyancing. I think I am right in saying that these are the qualifications.

6249. Is there any money payment?—There is.

6250. What is it?—It has recently been reduced. Formerly there was a distinction drawn between gentlemen who had served apprenticeships to members of the Faculty of Procurators in Glasgow, under their charter, and strangers; but we have recently abolished that distinction, and all are admitted upon equal terms. I think the total expense at present is something like £170.

6251. Before they are admitted?—Yes, exclusive of stamps.

6252. What is the length of the apprenticeship?—Three years. Of course I have been giving the total payments.

6253. But the party has no privilege of practising till he pays that sum?—No.

6254. The Chairman.—By paying, he has other privileges besides practising?—Yes.

6255. Mr. Baxter.—But without paying, he cannot practise?—No.

6256. The Chairman.—By paying, he has the privilege of your library?—Yes, and of our widows' fund.

6257. Mr. Webster.—The exclusive privilege does not apply over the whole of Lanarkshire, but only to courts held within Glasgow?—Only to courts held within the city of Glasgow.

6258. Mr. Baxter.—Do you think that a person being admitted to one court should have the privilege of practising anywhere?—I think not.

6259. Why?—Because the qualifications which it would be reasonable to exact from a man before allowing him to practise in Dundee or Glasgow, could not be reasonably exacted from a practitioner in a small village.

6260. You are aware that they are all examined by a central board?—I am aware that that has been so for a short time.

6261. There is no difference in the examination?—I cannot speak to that.

6262. Assume that that is so?—Assuming that that is so, I say that is an experiment which has only been tried for a year or two, and it has not been tested.

6263. You think that, though found qualified to practise generally, they should be excluded from Glasgow?—That is hardly the way to put it. I put it in this way—that your test is too high if it would exclude from practising in small country districts men because they are not qualified to conduct the extensive business we have in our large cities; and, on the other hand, if it is not so high as to be harsh on those first-mentioned parties practising in smaller towns, it is too lax for those practising in large towns.

6264. Don't you think it a hardship to make a person pay £170 before practising?—I don't think so, because he gets other privileges besides that of practising.

6265. He may not desire them?—It is only by keeping up a corporation of the kind that you can have several things which are absolutely necessary for the profession in such a place as Glasgow.

6266. Might you not keep up the privileges of the corporation without comprehending every practitioner?—We don't comprehend every practitioner.

6267. You don't allow them to practise in the courts?—No.

6268. The Lord Justice-Clerk.—Does the general examination supersede any examination by your corporation separately?—No; we have a subsequent examination.

6269. And an admission according to the qualification which your corporation thinks necessary for practising in Glasgow?—Yes.

6270. Mr. Paterson.—It is a pretty thorough examination?—Yes, and has been for many years.

6271. Mr. Baxter.—You don't recognise the central examination at all?—No; we cannot legally do so. I may mention that very careful inquiry was made by the committee of our faculty, a few months ago, into the state of the funds, with the view of endeavouring to do the utmost, consistently with the objects of the corporation, to lower the fees of admission; and it was agreed to lower them by £80 or £90, as an experiment; and if we find that the number of entrants makes up for the smaller entrance-money, we are prepared to reduce that amount still further, as may be prudent, after we have tested the matter.

6272. Mr. Webster.—Was not the amount at one time much higher than it is now?—It was.

6273. With a very low scale for the sons or sons-in-law of members?—I believe so.

6274. And a very high scale for strangers?—It was so; a considerably lower scale for the one, and a higher for the other. I entered on the very highest myself.

6275. The Chairman.—Now it is the same for all?—It is.

6276. Mr. Paterson.—Have you never felt any inconvenience, when business called you into the neighbouring Sheriff Courts of Greenock, or Paisley, or Dumbarton, from finding the doors shut against you there?—Well, I may have felt a little inconvenience in that way; but still I thought, and I think, that that inconvenience is to be borne for the countervailing good.

6277. Mr. Harrison.—If a practitioner in Aberdeen finds it convenient to remove to Glasgow, has he to pay the whole of the fees you have mentioned, and to pass an examination in addition?—Yes, if he desires to practise in the courts. In the same way, I suppose, that would be done if a practitioner in Glasgow removed to Aberdeen.

6278. Mr. Webster.—With this difference, that a practitioner cannot get admitted in Aberdeen unless he has served an apprenticeship there?—Yes, I believe so.

6279. The Chairman.—Are the qualifications prescribed by your faculty the same as those of the General Council?—No; they are higher.

6280. Your prescribed qualifications are higher?—Yes.

6281. What is the difference?—I think the General Council exact no attendance on classes in the Faculty of Arts at the University. We do.

6282. Mr. Baxter.—You are aware that the examination of the General Council was sanctioned by the Court of Session after a report from the Sheriffs?—I presume it must have been.

6283. Mr. Webster.—Are the regulations of the Glasgow Faculty of Procurators made by the faculty itself?—Yes.

6284. Not subject to any review?—Not subject to any review. Although the charter dates only from the end of last century, I believe it is understood that we are a corporation by prescription.

6285. There have been three litigations, I think, in the Court of Session about the nature and extent of the exclusive privilege, and of the Sheriff's power to admit procurators?—I believe so.

6286. The Chairman.—Do you think you are at any disadvantage from not being able to follow your cases into the Court of Session, and to practise there?—I don't think it. We must in any case employ an Edinburgh agent.

6287. Are there any other points on which you have anything to suggest?—There are one or two points connected with the minor courts to which I would call attention. In regard to the Small Debt Court, the Police Courts, and other courts whose judgments are not subject to review, I would suggest that the judge or magistrate in these courts should have power to state cases for the opinion of the Supreme Court on matters of law.

6288. Both civil and criminal?—Yes; particularly criminal. I understand there are cases in which a number of our local police and other courts have taken a different view of matters in regard to the construction of particular statutes, from the view which has been taken by the superior courts in England. In England the opinion of these superior courts has been got in that way; but our police magistrates don't recognise the opinions of the superior courts in England as in any way binding on them, and there is no way in which a party can take the judgment of the Supreme Court in Scotland.

6289. These opinions given in England are not opinions on the same statutes?—Not on the same statutes, but often on the construction of the same words in a different statute—in pari materia.

6290. Would you allow parties to be heard by counsel on the case so stated?—If the Court ordered that ex proprio motu.

6291. You would not allow it as matter of right to the parties?—I think not. There might be a hardship in that case.

6292. A hardship by reason of the expense?—Yes; very often it might be a very poor man whose interest was involved, although the question at issue might really be of great importance to the community.

6293. Mr. Campbell.—There are precedents for the judges of the Supreme Court disposing of questions of law on special cases under the Valuation Act, and some other statutes?—I think there are.

6294. And under some of the revenue statutes, two judges receive the special case, and dispose of it without argument?—I believe so.

6295. The Chairman.—Have you any further suggestion?—The next suggestions I have to submit refer to a court of which I cannot speak from personal knowledge. They were suggested to me, however, by a gentleman who has experience in regard to them—I mean as to the Justice of Peace Court. One of them is, that the fees payable by defenders in Justice of Peace Small Debt Courts, on appearance, should be abolished. It seems that that often operates as a hardship to the poor. Before a defender can be heard, he requires to pay the clerk of court sixpence. It also appears that, before a decree in absence obtained in the Justice of Peace Small Debt Court can be opened up, the whole of the principal sum in the decree must be consigned. That also is considered objectionable, and a hardship.

6296. Is there a good deal of business done in the Justice of Peace Small Debt Court in Glasgow?—I really cannot tell.

6297. Do you know whether, generally, the business that is done there is satisfactorily done?—I really cannot tell.

6298. The Justices have an assessor, I suppose?—They have.

6299. A professional gentleman?—A professional gentleman of great experience.

6300. Is he the clerk of the court?—He is.

6301. Sir E. Colebrooke.—Is he paid by fees?—He is.

6302. The Chairman.—Do the fees go to him, or is he paid out of the fees?—I suppose the fees go to him. They are his property.

6303. Sir E. Colebrooke.—The amount of the fees is regulated by statute?—Yes.

6304. Mr. Campbell.—Don't you think it very anomalous and objectionable, that the person who is clerk of court, and draws the fees, should also be the assessor?—No doubt of it. It is an anomaly which has existed for centuries; but still it is an anomaly.

6305. It is a favourite pursuer's court, I presume?—I cannot tell. I never was within the walls of it.

6306. The Chairman.—Have you any other suggestions?—No, I don't think so.

6307. You have a Dean of Guild Court in Glasgow?—Yes.

6308. Is that a useful court?—It is necessary that some court should exercise its functions; but I am inclined to think that, in the whole procedure in that court, the wrong party is put in petitorio. The petitioner applies to the court to give him leave to erect certain buildings; when a defender appears, he lodges defences, just like the defender in an ordinary action. It appears to me that that is to reverse the real and substantial position of parties, and to give the defender of that action what amounts virtually to an interdict, without his becoming responsible in any way in the consequences of wrongous interdicting. I think there is great hardship in that, because the party may state a defence that is frivolous; and by doing so, without incurring any responsibility himself, except for a trifle of costs, he may prevent his neighbour from building for months, perhaps till the building season is over, or it may be for years.

6309. He is maintaining the status quo?—He is.

6310. You think that ought to be reversed?—The status quo is, that the petitioner in such a case as that is just in the position of a proprietor of any other ground.

6311. It depends on the nature of the application?—I take the ordinary case of an application for leave to erect buildings.

6312. Mr. Paterson.—You are supposing the case that a proprietor in good faith wishes to renew his buildings; and although he is not to alter the building line, he must go as a petitioner to the Dean of Guild Court?—Yes.

6313. And get permission from that court to exercise that right of property?—Yes.

6314. Have you any method to suggest by which the Dean of Guild Court might be superseded, and its functions performed by some other tribunal?—The suggestion that occurred to me was this, that instead of presenting the petition, the party who desires to build should lodge his plans at the office of the Master of Works, or some other public office, for a certain number of days—ten to fourteen; and at the time he lodges his plans he should give notice to the adjoining proprietors that the plans were to be seen at that place, that the adjoining proprietors should then at their own risk, if they desired it, take action by applying to the judge ordinary or the Dean of Guild Court for interdict.

6315. Might it not be a further improvement if a short notice was given in the newspapers, in a column appropriate to the purpose, that the proprietors had lodged their plans and titles?—It might be. That suggestion did not occur to me.

6316. That would not cost much?—No.

6317. Is there not this much to be said for your plan, that in the vast majority of applications to the Dean of Guild for lining, the lining is granted as matter of course?—Yes.

6318. Whereas the expense may be 40s. or 50s. of presenting the application, paying clerk's fees, and calling the parties?—Your estimate is too low.

6319. But that expense, whatever it is, might be saved in that way?—Yes.

6320. Has it never struck you that there was anything anomalous in the constitution of that court?—Of course there is a considerable anomaly in giving jurisdiction in matters relating to questions of heritable right to the president of the Merchants' House—an elective officer.

6321. Holding office for how long?—For a year, I think.

6322. And assisted by an assessor?—By the town-clerk as assessor.

6323. Who may hold other municipal offices?—He may.

6324. And does?—I don't know whether they are strictly municipal offices, but he holds other offices connected with public bodies in Glasgow. One of the assessors does.

6325. Mr. Baxter.—Is there not a council also for the Dean of Guild?—It is understood that they have no power of any kind. They are ornamental. The Dean is the court.

6326. Mr. Paterson.—Assisted by liners?—Yes.

6327. And these are taken from the Merchants' House and the Trades' House?—Yes.

6328. Holders of large property in Glasgow?—The Trades' House are, I know, and I believe the Merchants' House is also.

6329. And requiring occasionally to be petitioners to the Dean of Guild Court?—Yes.

6330. The Chairman.—Does the Dean of Guild exercise any duty as to superintending the condition of buildings, and ordering dangerous tenements to be taken down?—Yes, he has very extensive jurisdiction of that kind.

6331. How does he exercise that?—Upon the petition of the Procurator-fiscal of his court.

6332. Is there any person whose duty it is to go through the town and examine buildings, to see whether they are in a safe condition?—I presume that is the duty of the Master of Works and his assistants.

6333. Do you think it would be any advantage to have a stipendiary officer who should be the superintendent of buildings, and who should discharge the duties that the Dean of Guild now discharges?—I am afraid that it would hardly be practicable to get a suitable man. The offices are somewhat incompatible—that of the actual inspector or surveyor of buildings, and the judge of the court having a jurisdiction at all approaching to that of the Dean of Guild Court.
